

Historical Society of Pennsylvania

Presented by Geo. W. Taylor

Haddon, Pa.

8 Mo. 1876.

Wiederholungs-Übung

aus dem 1. Buch

der Bibel

1. Buch

THE
NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

"WHOSO GIVES THE MOTIVE, MAKES HIS BROTHER'S SIN HIS OWN."

EDITED AND PUBLISHED BY

ABM. L. PENNOCK, SAMUEL RHOADS, AND GEO. W. TAYLOR.

---

VOLUME I.

---

PHILADELPHIA:
MERRIHEW AND THOMPSON, PRINTERS.
1846.

INDEX.

A.		Slavery abolished by Abstinence from
American Free Produce Association, Report	20	its products, - - -	76
of - - - - -	20	The English Deputation, - - -	78
Anti-Slavery cause, Retrospect of - - -	42	The (London) Anti-Slavery Reporter, -	78
Apostle Paul, Vindication of - - -	47	New York Yearly Meeting, " - - -	78
Agents, List of - - - - -	96	The Slaver Pons, - - - - -	78
Anti-Slavery, (from Boston Christian Re-		Cruelty to Slaves, - - - - -	79
gister,) - - - - -	118	British Abstinence, - - - - -	89
Abolition, Progress of - - - - -	121	War with Mexico, - - - - -	92
American Free Produce Association, Report		American Manufactures, - - - -	93
of - - - - -	161	The late Daniel Neall, - - - -	94
An Appeal to Abolitionists, &c. - - -	163	Charles T. Torrey, - - - - -	94
Abolitionism Retarding Emancipation, -	184	Letter from Gerrit Smith, - - -	94
B.		Slave cotton paper, - - - - -	94
Birmingham A. S. Society, Meeting of -	15	Friends Free Produce Association of
Banbury, " " " " - - - - -	16	New York, - - - - -	95
Benezet, Letter to R. Shackleton, from A.	51	First annual meeting of " - - -	107
Birds, by L. M. Child, - - - - -	85	Thomas Clarkson, - - - - -	107
C.		Taking a Boat, - - - - -	107
Cotton, Manufacture of Free grown (Ad-		Oregon Treaty, - - - - -	108 dress of J. J. Gurney and others) - - -	33	The late Wm. Allen, - - - - -	108
Clarkson, T. Letter to J. Sturge, from -	46	Cruelty to Slaves, and Slave Pauline,	108
Cowper, - - - - -	87	British Free Labour Cotton Manufac-
Cotton Crops, - - - - -	159	ture, - - - - -	110
D.		London Epistle, - - - - -	123
Duty of abstinence, - - - - -	2	Christian Non-Resistance, - - -	123
D. L., Letter from - - - - -	144	Duty of Abstinence, and Apologies for its
E.		Non-Observance, - - - - -	123
Editorials.		The Slave Pauline, from the London
Mortality of Slavery, - - - - -	10	Pictorial Times, - - - - -	125
British Abstinence, - - - - -	10	Free cotton goods, - - - - -	125
Mexican Sugar, - - - - -	11	Preventing Cruelty to Animals, -	126
Culture of Cotton in British India, -	11	British Ministry, - - - - -	126
J. G. Whittier, - - - - -	11	William Allen, - - - - -	126
Texas annexed, - - - - -	11	Admission of slave grown sugars into
New York Yearly Meeting, - - - - -	23	Great Britain, - - - - -	140
American Free Produce Association,		Important events in Congress, - -	142
Immediate Emancipation, - - - - -	23	New Hampshire Free, - - - - -	143
Our Power and Duty, - - - - -	24	Disconnection from evil, a Gospel duty,	144
Notice to Readers and Agents, - - -	26	The British sugar duties Law, - -	144
Address to the friends of the abolition		The existence of Slavery dependent on of the Slave Trade and Slavery, - - -	39	a Commerce in its productions, -	151
Slavery in Egypt, - - - - -	40	Free Produce Association of Friends
Our Course, - - - - -	40	in Ohio, Notice of - - - - -	153
Free Groceries, - - - - -	40	The acquisition of new Territory, and
Postage, - - - - -	40	extension of Slavery, - - - - -	154
British Abolition and Abolitionists, -	41	Encroachments of the Slave power, -	156
Correspondents, - - - - -	54	Poems of Henry Wadsworth Long-
Anthony Benezet's Letter, - - - - -	57	fellow, - - - - -	157
The Slaver Pons, - - - - -	58	Consumption of Free Labor Goods, -	158
Supply of Free Goods, - - - - -	59	Religious instruction of the Negroes,	169
First Annual Meeting of the Free Pro-		Minutes of London Yearly Meeting, duce Association of Friends of		Negro and Aborigines Fund Re-
Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, - - -	76	port, - - - - -	173
		Capt. Hamurn, and the passing fugitive,	175
		Death of Thomas Clarkson, - - -	175
		The War against Mexico, - - -	175
		The Elective Franchise in the State of
		New York, - - - - -	176

War, Slavery, and Capital punishment, -	191	Naylor, James -	69
The New York Constitution, -	191	New Hampshire, Letter from -	49
Effects of the change in the British Sugar duties, -	192	New York, Letter from -	49
The Randolph Slaves, -	192	North Carolina, Letter from -	113
The Quaker of the Olden Time, -	193	New York Convention, Debate in -	179
Decision of Judge Edmonds, -	193	O
Our Prospects, -	194	Oregon, -	75
Edmonds, Decision of Judge -	194	Observer, The African -	81
F.		P.
Friends Free Produce Association, Circular of -	6	Prospectus, -	1
Friends Free Produce Association, Constitution of -	9	Profession and Practice -	21
Fry, Death of Elizabeth -	29	Principles, Influence of true Christian -	53
Free Produce Association of Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, Report of Fairs, -	65	Pons, Capture of the Slaver -	60
Free Produce Association of Friends' Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, Report of -	97	Portugal, Anti-Slavery movement in -	76
Freedom, Are Slaves unfit for -	115	Pennsylvania, Letter from -	50
French Emancipation, -	121	Proceedings in Boston relative to Capt. Hannum, -	158
Free Labour Cotton, -	146	Poetry, Original: -
G.		The Quaker of the Olden Time -	16
Glasgow, Anti-War meeting in Government, How to reform -	103	Keep to the right, -	32
Hayti, -	183	Little Lucy's Dream, -	111
Henry, Letter of Patrick -	95	The Cloak, -	112
Hannum, Letter of Capt. -	182	Moving before the Body, -	127
H. G., Communication from -	190	Death of Thomas Clarkson, -	199
J.		Poetry, Selected: -
Jay, Letter from Wm. -	35	Mother, From an Appeal for the Bond Woman to her own sex, by Elizabeth Lloyd, Jr. -	47
Interference, British -	36	The Arsenal at Springfield, -	80
India, Culture of Cotton in -	74	Pity for poor Africans, -	95
Jamaica Cotton, -	76	The Witnesses, -	160
Illinois, Letter from D. -	83	The Slave singing at midnight, -	160
Indiana, Letter from -	49	Te-morrow, -	200
Jones, Address of Dr. -	101	R.
Jefferson and the Cooper's shop, -	118	Resist not Evil, -	113
Irish, Letter from D. -	186	Results of Emancipation, -	147
Isaac E. Morse's Letter, -	190	S.
K.		Slavery, Negro, in the United States, -	14
Kirkwood, Letter from Wm. -	129	Slaveholders, Who are the -	21
L.		Slavery, On the immediate abolition of -	26
Louapre, Case of Joseph -	19	Slavery, Wm. Penn and -	39
Lafayette, -	26	Slavery, All pervading influence of -	53
London Yearly Meeting, Epistle from -	115	Slave, A white -	64
London Yearly Meeting, Minute of -	162	Sugar, Rejection of Slave grown -	63
M.		Sugar, Protest relative to Slave grown -	130
Mothers, Faithfulness of -	14	Sugar duties, Joseph Sturge on -	132
Meeting for Sufferings, Memorial of London -	59	Sugar duties, Reduction of -	134
Missouri, Free coloured persons in -	64	Smith, Gerrit, Address to the voters of New York, by -	165
Massachusetts, Letter from -	50	Society of Friends, Slave trade and Slavery in the -	188
Mergui, Letter from Missionary at -	88	T.
Michigan, Capital Punishment abolished in -	95	The Society of Friends as it was and as it is, -	12
Mexico, War with -	159	Truth, -	29
Morse, Letter of Isaac E. -	177	Thomas Clarkson, Letter from -	99
N.		Tunis, Abolition of Slavery in -	62
Norris, Extract of a letter from Isaac -	6	The Slave trade -	145
New York Yearly Meeting, Minute of -	17	V. and W.
		War, Wayland's views on -	30
		Virginia, Emancipation in -	37
		Virginia, Letter from -	50
		Vermont, Letter from -	51
		West Indies, The British -	136

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

"Whoso gives the motive, makes his brother's sin his own."

VOL. I.]

PHILADELPHIA, FIRST MONTH, 1848.

[NO. 1.]

PROSPECTUS.

TO OUR EXPECTED READERS AND PATRONS.

Friends of the Oppressed.—We lay before you, without previous notice, except to a few individuals with whom we have consulted, the first number of a Journal intended to be published monthly, and of which this is a specimen, except in the number of pages, which we hope to extend, should the subscription list warrant our doing so.

We are opposed to slavery. It is the crying sin of this land and of large portions of this hemisphere, and we seek its overthrow by all just and peaceful means, "in season," and, as some will think, "out of season," but "with all long-suffering and doctrine."

Among the means appropriate to this end is one which seems to us to have been much overlooked, and yet, in our view, elementary. It will be admitted by all observers that a vast amount of anti-slavery effort has been expended, for years past, in the church and out of the church, in associations and by individuals, and yet slavery is more rife than ever! It is true that the African slave-trade has been professedly abolished by laws of most of the civilized nations of the world. It is true that Great Britain has abolished slavery from her dominions. It is true that what of it sparsely existed in the northern of these United States has been also abolished. But does not the African slave trade really continue with greater extension, and with atrocities of a much deeper die, than when it was legalized? Is not the number of slaves actually and largely increased? Is not the disappearance of slavery merely a geographical change? And does it not luxuriate in its newer dominions with unprecedented vigour? Is it not the prominent business in some of the southern states to rear slaves, as cattle are reared for a market, to be transmitted to yet more southern states, there to be worked to death, or, at best, till death, without tasting the free air of liberty? Has not our nation from time to time erected new slave states within its original or purchased boundaries?

Has it not just risen from dedicating to Slavery a new territory, taken by robbery from a people who once consecrated it to Liberty—attaching it to this already guilty Union? Does it not look forward to a still further enlargement of the area of slavery by other annexations? And is it not time for us to pause and inquire why it is that the vast efforts which have been made are so inert against this onward-rolling and accumulating evil?

If we are at fault among ourselves for the appropriate answer, let us go South for it. An enemy has keen eyes for the defects of his opponent, and often tells him very wholesome, though very unpleasant truths. We then ask the slaveholder—why is it that we do not reach you by our energetic appeals in favour of the bondman? Why is it that the more we do for the slave, in love both for him and his master, the more you wrap yourselves up in the ample cloak of your self-complacency, bidding defiance to the blast that we direct against you? His reply is: "Your theory and your life are antagonistical! You use the result of that which you denounce as a crime! You may amuse us with your philanthropy, vex us with your more importunate intrusions, and even convince us of your abstractions, but you fail to convert us to a higher ground than you yourselves occupy! Nay, you repel and disgust us by your insincerity! You use slavery, just as we do, to the extent of your convenience! You don't technically hold the slave, but you give the gold which makes him to be held! We are but your servants! You supply the motive, and are therefore the true slaveholders!"

The much overlooked means we would then apply to the overthrow of slavery, is a consistent life. Let the principle of non-participancy be adopted and carried out by a body of people, not nominally greater than the Religious Society of Friends, and it would make the Belshazzar of slavery tremble on his throne, for he would see written on the wall of his palace, "TUY KINGDOM IS DIVIDED." Not only would the five thousand slaves now bleeding and toiling for such a body of people be emancipated from his control, but so much of his dominions as that body wanted for free cultivation, and so much as others wanted, incited by this high example, and a similar motive, that of being clear of their brother's wrongs, would be irrevocably taken from him, and he would read in the growing increase of this sentiment the further inscription, "GOD HATH NUMBERED THY KINGDOM AND FINISHED IT!"

Not neglecting any of the other just modes for the slave's liberation, the doctrine of abstinence from the productions of his toil will be prominently held up to view. We regard it as necessary to give the proper force to all proper modes for accomplishing that purpose.

Directing our operations mainly against slavery, we shall not be precluded from occasionally advertising to parallel reforms—thus to those which seek the avoidance of war and the abrogation of the death-penalty. Life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness are inalienable rights, and scarcely separable.

We shall not hesitate also, when our limited space will allow, to diversify our pages with other matter recommended by its literary excellence.

We feel aware of the importance of the task we have entered upon. We rely much on those we now address for moral, literary, and pecuniary aid. We humbly ask for that higher assistance which imparts the faith that can remove mountains, and, believing in the omnipotency of Truth, we can say, slightly varying the language of Bryant:

"We nerve our spirit to the great,
And baffle not at our chosen lot—
The timid good may stand aloof,
The sage may frown—yet false we not.
Nor heed the shaft too surely cast,
The blessing, alluring lull of scorn;
For, with our side shall dwell at last,
The victory, of odourance born.
Truth, crushed to earth, shall rise again;
The eternal years of God are hers;
But Error, wounded, writhes with pain,
And dies among his worshippers.
Yes, though we lie upon the dust,
When they who helped us seek their life;
We die in hope, and higher trust
Than those who fall in mortal strife.
Another hand our sword shall wield,
Another hand the standard wave,
Till from the trumpet's mouth is peal'd
The blast of triumph o'er our grave."

The Non-Slaveholder will be issued on the first Fourth day of the week in each month, at the price per annum, payable in advance, of one dollar per copy, or five dollars for six copies to one address. Subscriptions will be received by the publisher, HENRY LONGSTRECH, 347 Market street, Philadelphia, to whom payment should be made, and all communications intended for the editors, or relating to the publication, addressed.

ABRAHAM L. PENNOCK,
SAMUEL RHODES,
GEORGE W. TAYLOR.

COMMUNICATIONS.

DUTY OF ABSTINENCE.

On the duty of abstinence from the productions of slave labour, especially in reference to the destruction of human life which Slavery occasions.

In addressing the class of persons for whom this essay is intended, we have no need to press upon them the serious truth that we are bound to cast the weight of our influence in favour of virtue and against vice, on all occasions in which, having the power of choice, we are called upon to act. The obligation is imperative, "Whether therefore ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God." As moral and accountable agents we cannot dispense with it. This obligation makes it our duty to do whatever we can against slavery; and in favor of human liberty, if the one be wrong and the other right, and makes the following enquiry not merely a very proper, but also a very necessary one—Do we throw the weight of our influence in the right scale when we unhesitatingly use the productions of the bondman's constrained and unpaid toil, and neglect the opportunities which are in our power of giving our needed countenance and support in favour of the opposite system of voluntary and compensated labour?

If the only wrong inflicted by slavery were to rob its victims of the avails of their life-long exertion, that would be a sufficient reason for pronouncing upon the outrage a just and indignant condemnation, and for separating ourselves as widely from any connection with it, except to oppose it, as possible. We speak in terms of severe reprehension of those who take from others, without their consent, the productions of much shorter periods of labour, and we show our disunity with their act by refusing to partake of the fruits of the trespass: but slavery invades all rights—moral, social, intellectual, natural—and hence there is much additional cause for carrying out the same rule of action respecting it, which we have found safe and right in the simpler and inferior wrong.

Of these invasions, that upon human life is prominent, and yet but little adverted to in discussions which relate to the impropriety of using the productions of slavery. The destruction of life which belongs to the foreign slave trade is especially overlooked; and yet the trade in slaves, and the holding of them in bondage, rest upon the same ultimate basis—the demand for the productions of their labour—this demand first inducing slavery, then the slave trade. So strong, indeed, is their affinity, that it has become an admitted truism, that the slave trade can only be suppressed by the abolition of slavery itself, and why is it not as true that slavery can only be suppressed by the destruction of its cause—the market now allowed to its productions?

The Meeting for Sufferings of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, in a memorial to Congress on the subject of the African slave trade, dated the 17th of the Fourth month, 1840, makes the following statements:

"We are fully aware that this traffic is prohibited by the laws of nearly all the governments in the civilized world, whose subjects or citizens have ever been engaged in its prosecution; and that the two most active and extensive maritime nations of the globe have denounced it as piratical, and prescribed for those who may be found employed in it the awful punishment of death; yet the information which we have obtained from various sources of unquestionable authenticity, has led to the sorrowful conviction, that this iniquitous commerce has, for several years past, been prosecuted to a greater extent, and in a manner more destructive to its victims, than it ever was before.

"Under all the difficulties attendant upon this inquiry, and with ample allowance for all the questionable cases, an estimate, founded chiefly on official documents, leads to the conclusion that one hundred and fifty thousand African slaves are annually landed on the coasts of Brazil, Cuba, and Porto Rico. A large number is known to be carried into Texas; and we have reason to apprehend that many are also introduced into the United States.

"It is needless to expatiate upon the scenes of havoc and desolation from which this commerce is supplied; the sanguinary conflicts, the midnight conflagrations, and the toilsome march through inhospitable deserts, and under a burning sun, must be familiar to the mind of every person who is conversant with the history of the slave trade. From the concurrent testimony of numerous witnesses, we are warranted in the conclusion, that the number who perish by fatigue, famine, and the sword, considerably exceeds the number who reach the coast alive.

"The diseases generated in the holds of slave ships, while the traffic was tolerated, are well known to have given to the march of death more than ten times its usual speed.

"But the circumstances under which it is now prosecuted, have greatly increased the horrors and mortality of the middle passage. The ships engaged in it are constructed for rapid sailing; hence the space allotted to the slaves is more limited now than before the prohibitory laws were enacted. Other causes, sufficiently obvious, augment the suffering and mortality attendant upon the passage across the Atlantic. A comparison founded upon a considerable collection of ascertained cases, appears to support the conclusion that rather more than one-fourth of the number embarked on the African coast perish before they reach the place of their destination in the western world. Connecting this conclusion with the estimate already given of those who perish in procuring the slaves actually disembarked, we are brought to the dreadful conviction that the African continent is annually despoiled, by means of the slave trade, of from four to five hundred thousand of its inhabitants; or considerably upward of a thousand a day."

From these statements, which we may well suppose the Meeting for Sufferings adopted with great caution, we are authorized to conclude, that for every African slave acclimated in this western hemisphere, two of his countrymen have fallen in death!

The condition of the survivor and his kindred in bondage here, is but too frequently the continuation of a death-struggle, in which they too must fall!

The legal principle that "slaves are chattels personal to all intents and purposes whatsoever," leads inevitably to the conclusion that their lives are subject to the absolute disposal of their masters; at least so far as is deemed necessary to make them the most available property. It is a simple fact that on some large estates the estimate has been carefully made, as to the precise period during which slaves may be "worked up" with the greatest pecuniary gain to the capitalists holding them. Such, indeed, is the terrible wickedness of the human heart, when under the influence of sordid motives that we cannot doubt the estimate is more frequently made and acted upon than is avowed to others, or than the persons acting upon them are willing to avow to themselves. The effort to get from the slave the greatest amount of labour and profit, with the least expense of time and money, issues in a waste of human life to an extent not commonly appreciated. This result will be sufficiently indicated by the following facts and observations.

The annual import of negroes into Brazil, was rated by Dr. Morse, in 1810, at "as many as 40,000." A vast extension soon followed. According to Macqueen, the slave population in 1808, was 600,000; in 1833, 2,100,000; in 1839, 2,500,000. At a period antecedent to 1841, T. Fowell Buxton, supposed the number of slaves "brought annually into the five Brazilian ports" would be "moderately estimated at 100,000." "Others who have long resided in the Brazil, give it as their opinion that 130,000 are annually introduced into that empire; that is, nearly a million every seven or eight years." The report of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society says: "The mortality is ascertained to be in the ratio of five in the hundred beyond the annual births." This percentage on a population of two and a half millions, shews an annual waste of life in the production principally of sugar and coffee, of 125,000 human beings. Merely "to keep up the strength of the gangs," slaves to that amount must be yearly imported, at an expense to Africa of three times that number of her inhabitants.

Dr. Madden in his appendix to "Cuban Slavery," furnishes a series of important questions addressed by him to a distinguished resident at Havana, with the answers he received to them. From this document we collect the following facts:

The number of African slaves imported into the island of Cuba was,

From A. D. 1523 to 1821	391,776
" " 1821 to 1840	360,000
Making a total of	751,776

By the census of 1827, the whole negro race "in life" in Cuba, was 393,436. Dr. Madden's respondent assumes it to be in 1844,

	500,000
--	---------

Shewing during the whole period an excess of deaths over births of

	251,776
--	---------

The same individual says that if the slave trade were stopped, the slave population would be extinct "in twenty years or thereabouts," provided the system of management remained unaltered. He adds that "the ordinary mortality is calculated at 5 per cent., although it is certain that on the sugar plantations the mortality is much greater; while in the towns, on coffee properties, and other farms, the deaths are much less." Dr. Madden, in a note, says, he thinks the mortality "is underrated; that on sugar estates being about ten per cent., and on coffee estates 5 per cent." At the lowest ratio given, the excess of deaths over births, in a population of half a million, would amount to 25,000 per annum, to be made up by importations, which in Africa will bring death or exile to 75,000 human beings.

The great waste of life occurring in Cuba and Brazil, where slavery is unquestionably strung to its greatest degree of tension, is fully confirmed by the past history of Jamaica, in which, of 890,000 slaves, imported when the slave trade was legal, with their increase by birth, only 350,000 survived in 1835.

One of the causes which make this waste so excessive in Cuba, undoubtedly is the fact that a great majority of the imported slaves are males. The proportion of men to women usually found on the sugar plantations is about 3 to 1; on the coffee plantations 3 to 2.

This cause does not operate in the United States to any great extent. Our tables exhibit a sexual equality, nearly. We have no systematized foreign slave trade, and for the comparatively few slaves thrown illicitly upon the southern, there is a probable equivalent in number and sex, in those escaping from servitude on the northern boundary of slavery. The internal slave trade is moreover too recent to have produced marked developments of its ultimate influence on human life. We may, therefore, consider slavery, as now exhibited in the United States, to be, so far as it regards that influence, in the least unfavourable position in which it could be preserved.

By a singular perversity, as if to baffle any attempt at comparison between the blacks and whites, the columns of the census exhibit the enumeration of the blacks, whether free or bond, at ages different from those at which the whites are enumerated. We are compelled, therefore, and probably it is the fairest parallel which could be made, to contrast the slaves with the free coloured inhabitants. The result follows:

By the census of 1820, for every hundred of each class under fourteen years of age, there was a gain of more than 4 slaves between 14 and 26 years; a deficiency of nearly 7 slaves, between 26 and 45 years; and a deficiency of nearly 17 slaves, above 45 years; making an aggregate deficiency in the class of slaves above 14 years of age, of 19½ per cent. on a population of 668,196, equal to 130,298 persons.

By the census of 1830, for every hundred under ten years of age, there was a gain of nearly four slaves between 10 and 24 years; a deficiency of nearly one slave between 24 and 36 years; a de-ciency of more than eleven slaves between 36 and 55 years; and a deficiency of more than seven-teen slaves above 55 years; making in the aggregate a loss of 25.6 per cent. on a population of 701,183 slaves above 10 years of age; equal to 179,498 persons.

By the census of 1840, for every similar hundred under 10 years of age, there was a deficiency of nearly 2 slaves between 10 and 24 years; of nearly 4 slaves between 24 and 36 years; of more than 15 slaves between 36 and 55 years and of 16 slaves above 55 years; making an aggregate loss of 37.3 per cent on a population of 844,049 slaves above 10 years of age; equal to 314,830 persons.

On summing these results for the three decennial periods named, we find an aggregate deficiency of 624,626 slaves. There must, however, be some abatement made from this number, on account of the re-appearance in subsequent enumerations of persons included in previous ones, so far as the effect would be to give to the class of greater longevity, numbers not represented in the class of lesser longevity. Making all due allowances on this account, and conceding something for possible errors in the census, though the balance of errors may have been contrariwise, there is to our minds the evidence that at least half a million of persons, during a period of thirty years, have disappeared prematurely within the limits of this republic, in consequence of the existence in it of the upas tree of slavery!

We read that, in ancient times, "David longed and said, Oh that one would give me drink of the water of the well of Bethlehem, which is by the gate! and the three mighty men brake through the hosts of the Philistines, and drew water out of the well of Bethlehem that was by the gate, and took it and brought it to David; nevertheless he would not drink thereof, but poured it out unto the Lord; and he said, Be it far from me, O Lord, that I should do this: Is not this the blood of the men that went in jeopardy of their lives? Therefore he would not drink it." (2 Samuel 23: 15-17.)

Reader! Dost thou feel no call to make unto the Lord a similar offering of those comforts and luxuries which are brought to thee, not at the peril merely, but at the abundant cost, also, of human life?

To the Editors of the Non-Slaveholder.

Regarding the existence of slavery in this land as an evil of vast magnitude, for the removal of which every Christian should earnestly labour by all the means in his power consistent with his religion, and from which each individual should anxiously seek to disconnect himself as far as practicable; and having long believed a suitable channel was needed through which information on the subject of slavery might be readily diffused amongst our members, I heartily approve of the proposed attempt to establish the Non-Slaveholder.

It is true that many papers devoted to emancipation already exist, but their circulation amongst Friends is small; and however useful each may be in its circle, none of them are entirely adapted to the principles or the position of the Society of Friends. But many of our members will, doubtless, be ready to call in question the necessity of an anti-slavery paper being published amongst us. I am not one of this class.

Those who are properly engaged in the reformation of their own hearts, well know the need of having the pure mind stirred up by way of remembrance; they feel the happy influence of religious association; they acknowledge the strength and benefit experienced from the faithful performance of every act which results from obedience to the dictates of religious duty.

So also in the discharge of those duties which are especially connected with the welfare of our fellow men, we meet with so many hindrances from various causes, that we can scarcely be too vigilant in acquiring the knowledge requisite to judicious action, or too prompt in the practical application of this knowledge under the direction of sound Christian principles.

However faithfully many Friends may have labored to promote the cause of emancipation, and however strong they may think their abhorrence of slavery, it is only by constant watchfulness, by unremitting attention, that any can keep their minds properly alive to the concern, and be prepared to adopt such measures as a "discussion of the matter with that candour and freedom of thought which the case justly calls for;" (Woolman.) may require at their hands.

The writer of this is fully convinced that our Society has not yet taken the last step in its progress from slave-trading and slaveholding to an entire disconnection from any participation or support of the anti-Christian system. When I speak of this disconnection, I do not forget that we are surrounded by circumstances which render a positive and absolute exemption from every degree of participation in many of the evils which abound in the world, impossible.

We can be only comparatively free from sustaining them, while we are clothed with these bodies.

of flesh—while we are not yet taken out of the world.

But this in no degree lessens our obligation to do with our might what our hands find to do, and to seek earnestly and with fervent prayer for the blessed influence and spiritual strength which are graciously extended by our compassionate Redeemer to enable us to "work righteousness."

The last step to which I have alluded is abstinence from the use of the productions of slavery. I hope the editors of the Non-Slaveholder will keep this subject steadily in view, and under the Divine blessing their labours may be instrumental in bringing our society to the position which its principles undoubtedly require it to occupy. Endeavour, in love, and with patience, charity and forbearance, to convince your brethren. Many discouragements may beset you; you may even have to encounter much opposition; but this has been the experience of all who have exposed popular errors, or endeavoured to eradicate "deep rooted wrong customs." Remarkable instances of this may be found in the history of the abolition of the slave trade and slavery in our religious Society.

In 1715, Chester (now Concord) Quarterly Meeting laid before the Yearly Meeting its "unanimous sense and judgment that Friends should not be concerned in the importing or bringing of negro slaves for the future," and requested the concurrence of the Yearly Meeting therein.

Isaac Norris, a distinguished Friend, describing this meeting in a letter, speaks thus: "Our meeting was large and comfortable, and our business would have been very well, were it not for the warm pushing by some Friends, of Chester chiefly, in the business of negroes. The aim was to obtain a minute that none should buy them for the future. This was opposed as of dangerous consequence to the peace of the church, for since they could not tell how to dispose of those we have, and that many members must still possess them; and then it might fall to their lot in duty to deal with future offenders, which, as it could not in itself be equitable, such must do it with an ill-grace, and, at best, it would be a foundation for prejudice and evil speaking one of another, so that it was got over."

Thus a practice which is now regarded as a crime demanding the severest punishment known to the laws, was tolerated amongst Friends, lest its removal might endanger the peace of the church! As the light of truth was suffered to shed its influence on the subject, our ancestors found a way to "dispose" of the slaves they had, and, also, to forbid the purchase of more; and as the same divine light still exists, let us not be discouraged by the prevalence of the same timid policy in the present day, but continue to labour in the ability which may be granted us.

AGRICOLA.

ASSOCIATED ACTION.

The subjoined Circulars and Constitution, connected with the establishment of a Free Produce Society within the limits of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of Friends, are republished for the purpose of placing them in a situation for ready reference, and with the expectation that there will be frequent occasion to notice, on these pages, the onward progress of the body to which they have relation.

TO OUR FELLOW MEMBERS OF THE RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

There is probably no proposition in political economy more indisputable than that the demand for an article which human industry or ingenuity can produce, will infallibly bring it into market. Many of the improvements in science may be traced to the demand created by the wants and refinements of the age.

The mechanical arts advance or recede according as the demand for their products improves or declines. Numerous instances might be given, of manufactures having flourished in one age and disappeared in the next, for no other reason than because there was no longer a demand for their products.

Numerous tracts were issued, proving and exposing the evils of intemperance; yet the manufacture and sale of ardent spirits could not be prevented, so long as a large demand remained. But where the progress of temperance has excluded the demand, the manufacture and sale have ceased of course.

The iniquity of the African slave trade is now generally acknowledged; yet the former is prosecuted in defiance of laws, human and divine, and the latter is maintained in half the states of the Union, and, in many of them, with a tenacity which manifests the hold it has taken on the passions and prejudices of the people. Now this arises from the interests, real or imaginary, which are involved in the system.

Men are seized on the African shore and transported to the western world, because they can be sold here, and held in hereditary slavery; and they are bought here, because a profit is supposed to be deducible from their labour. Slavery confers a mercantile value on the victims of the trade; and the demand for the products of slave labour sustains this mercantile value in the persons of the slaves and their posterity. Human beings are converted into chattels, and retained in that unnatural condition, simply because the products of their extorted labour find, or are supposed to find, a remunerating value in the market. Thus slavery and the slave trade, like arts and manufactures, are necessarily supported by the demand for their products. If we could close the markets of the world against the productions of slave labour, we should annihilate the value of the property which is supposed to be vested in the persons of men, and leave the moral and religious objections to slavery at liberty to exercise their force without the counteracting influence of interest. If those who are conscientiously opposed to the holding of slaves would agree to apply the same practical rule to this evil as to others—to manifest their disapprobation of slavery, by withholding their aid from its support—there can be no reasonable doubt that a sensible impression might be made, without strife or commotion, on this great opprobrium of the western world.

Many of the articles now generally produced by the labour of slaves, are among the common conveniences of life; but the total abandonment of the use of these articles is not necessary, for they may be produced by the labour of freemen. The productions of tropical climates are among the provisions supplied by the all bountiful hand, for the convenience and comfort of man, and as such ought to be received with thankfulness. But the Most High never made a slave to cultivate them. He created freemen, and man made slaves. Whatever his hand has supplied for our use may be, and ought to be, cultivated and manufactured by the hands of freemen. Whatever slaves can perform, may be accomplished by hands which the Creator made free.

It is well known that neither slaves nor their masters prosecute their business with the energy and skill which appear where the operatives are free. Hence, it is generally found that the products of slave labour are more costly than those of free. If in any case the former come into the market on lower terms than the latter, the difference is only a part of what is deducted from the lives and comforts of the operatives; for a large part of the profits of slave labour is employed in supporting the idleness and negligence of the masters. The expense of keeping the slaves in subjection, of preventing elopements, and recovering fugitives, must also be charged on the system.

Consequently, an effort to supply the market through the instrumentality of free labour, with those articles which are now mostly extracted from the drudgery of slaves, is an attempt to substitute, for a wasteful and demoralizing species of cultivation, an improved method, to which neither moral nor economical objections can be made.

So far, indeed, is such a course from being a compulsive one, that its primary object is to substitute encouragement for compulsion; to steer clear of connection with a system of force, and to promote voluntary exertions among managers and laborers. It would be a lame objection to the labours of the friends of temperance, that they are compelling the distillers and retailers of liquors to abandon their employments. Yet the argument would be as just as in the case before us. If the markets of the world were instantly closed against the products of slave labour, they might be opened immediately by emancipating the slaves.

In order to procure an union of efforts among Friends, it is now proposed to form an association within the limits of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, for the special purpose of promoting and encouraging the production, by free labour, of the articles which are generally procured from servile hands.

With this view, a meeting of a number of Friends was convened in Philadelphia, on the 23d of Fourth month, 1845, and a Committee was appointed to prepare a Constitution.

The subscribers, on behalf and by direction of that meeting, now respectfully invite such of their fellow-members of our religious Society as approve of the measure, and are willing to take part in the labour, to meet at Clarkson Hall, north side of Cherry, above Sixth street, in the city of Philadelphia, on Sixth day, the 20th of Sixth month, 1845, at 3 o'clock, P. M., when the Constitution prepared by the Committee will be submitted for consideration, revision and adoption.

ENOCH LEWIS,
SAMUEL HILLES,
WILLIAM KIRKWOOD,
GEORGE W. TAYLOR,
WM. J. ALLINSON,
THOMAS WISTAR, JR.,
ARM. L. PENROCK, DILLWYN SMITH,
EDWARD GARRETT,
SAMUEL RHODES.

Phila. 5th mo. 24, 1845.

TO OUR FELLOW MEMBERS OF THE RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

A number of the members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, convened in that city in the Fourth month last, to deliberate upon the means of promoting the concern which the Society of Friends in all parts of the world has long professed, in relation to the unrighteous system of slavery, so sorrowfully prevalent in the United States. In pursuance of a conclusion adopted by that meeting, a circular was prepared and disseminated among our fellow members, bringing into view the obvious and undeniable fact, that the slave-trade and the slavery which has grown out of it, owe their existence and vitality to the market for the productions of slave labour; suggesting the formation of an association within the limits of our Yearly Meeting, to consist exclusively of members, for the purpose of supplying the market, as far at least as their own custom was concerned, through the instrumentality of free labour, with those articles which are now chiefly procured by the labour of slaves; and inviting such Friends as approved of the measure, and were willing to take part in the labour, to meet at Clarkson Hall, on the 20th of Sixth month following.

A meeting was accordingly held, and an association formed and partially organized, under the title of "The Free Produce Association of Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting." The constitution herewith submitted was adopted, subject, however, to such modifications and improvements as experience and farther deliberation may suggest; and Friends who favour the general object contemplated by the association, are respectfully invited to attend the next meeting, to be held at the same place, Clarkson Hall, Cherry street, between Sixth and Seventh streets, on Sixth-day the 19th of the present month, at 7 o'clock, P. M., when this subject in its various relations and ramifications will be open to discussion; and all reasonable objections, if any should be offered, to the plan or procedure thus far attempted, will be respectfully heard.

While presenting this invitation to our fellow members, to those who have not, as well as those who have attended the previous meetings, a few considerations, connected with this deeply interesting subject, may with propriety be subjoined.

In the first place, we may observe, that we are adopting no novel doctrines or principles.

In an article of our book of Discipline copied from a minute of 1755, modified in the revision of 1806, relating to the practice of enslaving mankind, Friends are exhorted "to be no way accessory to this enormous national evil, but to discourage it by all the justifiable means in their power." Certainly an effort to withdraw our custom from a market which supports both slavery and the slave trade, is an attempt to discourage the system of slavery in all its parts. And who will assert that the substitution of free for slave labour is not a justifiable mode of effecting it?

In the same book, page 129, the Meeting for Sufferings is admonished to embrace every suitable opportunity for advancing our testimony against the African slave trade, and for calling the attention of the public mind to this awfully interesting subject. And the proceedings of that meeting sufficiently prove, that the advancement of our testimony against slavery itself, and against the internal traffic in slaves, is considered as included in its duties. In the year 1837, an Address to the people of the United States was prepared by that meeting, and widely disseminated under the authority of the Yearly Meeting. In this address we find the following declaration: "The responsibility of contributing as citizens of our common government, to support this unrighteous institution, and thus degrading the afflicted descendants of Africa nearly to a level with the brute creation, is felt by many conscientious Christians to be serious and weighty; hence they cannot but desire that the subject may increasingly engage the solemn deliberation of their fellow citizens, more particularly of those, who, from the possession of power or influence, may be enabled to promote their liberation." Now this association is designed to operate upon the general interests of slavery, as far as it operates at all, by diminishing the demand for slave labour, and substituting the labour of freemen. Hence its effect, if successfully prosecuted, must be to promote the extinction of slavery. It is therefore entirely in unison with the desire above expressed.

In the spring of 1844, the Meeting for Sufferings presented to the Senate of the United States a forcible remonstrance against the annexation of Texas. One of the principal objections assigned was, that such annexation would furnish a new and powerful impetus to the inter-territorial traffic in the persons of men, by opening an extensive tract of fertile land to slave cultivation. But without a market for the products of slave labour, this traffic would not be prosecuted. Consequently, if we have not influence enough to prevent this annexation, the withdrawal of our custom from the market which slave cultivation supplies, would be to withhold our contributions from the violence and oppression which that meeting anticipated as the necessary result of the measure in question.

In the year 1824, the report of the Southern Quarter called the attention of our Yearly Meeting to the subject of Friends hiring slaves to assist them in their business; and the conclusion of the Yearly Meeting was, that when slaves were thus hired, and the price of their services was intended for the benefit of those who claimed the right of ownership, and not designed or applied to promote the liberation of the slaves, such conduct was a violation of our testimony, and, if persisted in, a cause for disownment. If a Friend violates the testimonies of the Society, by employing a slave hired of his master, upon his own farm, where he may be treated with all reasonable kindness, it is not easily perceived that the case is much improved by employing the slave on the plantation of his master, subject to the cruelty of a hired overseer, and then paying the master both for the labour of the slave, and the oversight of the driver. We may at least, admit that the Friend who declines purchasing the products of slave labour, and thus avoids paying the master for the toil of the slave, and superintendence of the overseer, carries out the principle inculcated by the minute of 1834.

A minute of our Yearly Meeting of 1839, which was printed and circulated among our members, contains the following clause. "The close connexion, and intimate intercourse which is maintained between the different sections of our common country, through the diversified and widely spread channels of commerce and business, may, unless we are very watchful, blunt our sensibilities to the cruelties of slavery, and diminish our abhorrence of its injustice. We wish tenderly to invite our dear Friends to an individual inquiry, with a single eye to the pointings of Truth, how far they are clear in these respects; and should such an examination awaken serious apprehensions as to any part of their traffic, that they may be willing to forego every prospect of gain, arising from the prosecution of business, which is incompatible with the purity of our religious profession." This advice certainly recognizes not only the right, but the duty, of seriously examining whether we are supporting, in our commerce or business, the unrighteous system of slavery. The principle of the admonition, if not the letter, applies with similar, if not equal force, to our consumption of its products, and if it related to any thing but slavery would doubtless be so understood. The consumer supports the traffic as well as encourages the production. Individuals, who, from religious or moral considerations, are induced to question the propriety of using the products of slave labour, are therefore indirectly, if not directly encouraged to regard their scruples and carry them into practice. But in the present complicated state of commerce, and in consequence of the mixture of free with slave labour in the production of many of the usual conveniences of life, the separation can hardly be effectually secured except by a systematic union of efforts. The consumer, without some assistance, can seldom ascertain, with satisfactory clearness, whether the articles which he purchases are actually the produce of free labour or not. Besides, a demand for the products of free to the exclusion of slave labour, which an association might create, but a few unconnected individuals cannot, would infallibly produce a supply.

In the next place, we observe, it is proposed to confine the association to members of our own religious Society, and thus prevent the danger of subjecting our proceedings to influences unfavourable to our profession and principles.

Lastly, As our association involves no principles to which we apprehend any moral objections can be raised—as our object is, not to cast a censure on those Friends or others who do not unite with us, but simply to carry out our own convictions of duty, and pursue such peaceable and rational means as appear calculated to wear away the system of slavery by turning the stream of commerce into a more righteous channel, we may hope that when our views are properly understood, we shall obtain the concurrence and approbation of all who desire to see the galling yoke of negro slavery speedily broken without violence or commotion.

ENOCH LEWIS,
SAMUEL ALSOP,
ABRAHAM L. PENROCK,
EDWARD GARRETT,

Phila. Ninth mo. 3d, 1845.

Committee.

CONSTITUTION OF THE #### FREE PRODUCE ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDS OF PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING.

We believe that slaveholding is diametrically opposed to the whole spirit and tenor of the Christian religion, and that while it sustains the traffic in slaves, it is mainly supported by the traffic in and the consumption of the productions of slave labour. In order, therefore, to promote the use and facilitate the acquirement of goods supplied by free labour, we unite in an association under the title of the "FREE PRODUCE ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDS OF PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING," and adopt for its government the following constitution.

ART. 1st. The Association shall consist of such members of the Religious Society of Friends as concur in the above views and purposes, and sign the constitution, or request their names to be entered on the list of members.

ART. 2nd. The Association shall meet annually in the city of Philadelphia, at such time and place as it may prescribe, or the managers, in the absence of such direction, shall appoint. It shall meet at other times by adjournment, or on the special call of the Board of Managers, or of any ten members.

ART. 3rd. The officers of the Association shall be a Secretary, Treasurer, and Managers, to be appointed at the annual meetings.

ART. 4th. The Secretary shall keep regular records of the proceedings of the Association.

ART. 5th. The Treasurer shall receive all moneys which may be contributed for promoting the objects of the Association, and pay them over to the order of the Association or of the Board of Managers, keeping regular accounts thereof, to be laid before the Association at its annual meetings.

ART. 6th. The Board of Managers shall consist of eight members, beside the Secretary and Treasurer, who shall be ex-officio members; any five of whom shall form a quorum for the transaction of business. They shall have power to fill all vacancies that may occur in their body. They shall attend, under the instruction of the Association, to the promotion of the objects of the institution, and may adopt such rules, regulating their meetings and proceedings, as they shall deem expedient.

ART. 7th. The Association shall aim to procure correct information of the condition of the countries with which we have commercial intercourse, in respect to free and slave labour, and the means of discriminating between their productions when they exist together; and shall endeavour to ascertain and disseminate facts which show the injustice and destructiveness of human life connected with slave labour; the impolicy of it; and the duty of disconnecting ourselves from its support. It shall adopt means for obtaining a supply of such articles, the productions of free labour, as are not readily to be procured by individuals through the ordinary channels of commerce or manufactures.

ART. 8th. The Association shall correspond, by itself, or its Board of Managers, as occasion shall require, with such similar associations as may be established elsewhere; or with persons interested in promoting the objects of the institution.

ART. 9th. The Association shall encourage the formation of a fund by absolute contributions, or loans without interest, for the purpose of purchasing free cotton, and manufacturing it into fabrics, and for procuring other free goods, for which there may be occasion for making provision. Such fund shall be kept detached from all other moneys of the Association; and so much of it as may be received on loan, shall be subject to a distributive proportion of any loss upon the whole amount, should such loss occur.

THE NON-SLAVERHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, FIRST MONTH 7, 1846.

MORTALITY OF SLAVERY.—We commend to the attentive perusal of our readers an article which appears in this number chiefly relating to this subject. It was prepared by a Committee of the Managers of the Free Produce Association of Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, and is published at its request. We take this occasion to say, that we expect our columns to be enriched by much valuable matter coming to us from various departments of that association; at the same time we wish it to be understood that we do not officially represent it. This journal is put forth independent of that or any other association, and its editors are accountable for the course they shall pursue to but one Society—the religious one of which they are members.

The abridgement of human life incident to the slave system, is not to be overlooked by humane men and women—much less by those who profess to be subjects of the peaceable kingdom of Messiah.

Dr. Franklin once said to a Friend, who happened to sit with him at the same table, and who was liberally helping himself to sugar—then wholly the production of slavery:—"Young man! do you know that every ounce of sugar contains a drop of human blood?" The lesson inculcated reached the witness in the Friend's mind, and he became an abstinent—we trust through after life.

BRITISH ABSTINENCE.—We hope, ere long, to be furnished with an interesting account of that general abstinence in Great Britain, which preceded, and, we doubt not, essentially promoted the abolition of the British slave trade. The following extract of a letter dated 4th mo. 17, 1792, from John Heyland, of Shetfield, England, to Rebecca Jones, of Philadelphia, is characteristic of the feeling then existing amongst Friends in that country, and which some people can well remember extended into this.

"I enclose a newspaper [account] of the debates on W. Wilberforce's motion for the abolition of the slave trade—also a late publication respecting sugar, supposed to be written by a Friend. I desire thy sentiments upon it.

"I don't know whether I acknowledged the receipt of the dried peaches sent us, via Undercliffe. We have had some tarts lately made of them, and find they retain their acid better than our apples; but as Friends generally disuse sugar, fruit pies seldom make their appearance, and are little in demand."

We shall take another opportunity for showing the fatal error which the abolitionists committed in leaving the simple ground of avoiding the productions of slave labor. True, they thought the whole work was accomplished when they abolished the slave trade by law; but alas! that law never touched the motive for holding slaves.

MEXICAN SUGAR.—In reference to this cultivation, the editor of "The Friend," under date of 12th mo. 12th, 1829, makes the following judicious observation:

"The Anti-Slavery Monthly Reporter of London, for August, 1829, contains an article which it seems to us opens an exhilarating prospect to the christian philanthropist in respect to the great subject of slavery and the slave trade. Once established the practicability of an adequate supply for the demand of sugar and coffee free of slave labour, and it appears to us the downfall of the whole slave system must inevitably follow, for we cannot doubt the general disposition to give to the product of free labour the preference."

It was for the purpose of establishing this practicability, and of extending it to the important article of cotton, that the "Free Produce Association of Friends" was established. Are Friends prepared to encourage the attempt, and thus contribute to the downfall of the whole slave system? We hope their answer will be affirmative.

POSTER.—The beautiful lines describing "the Quaker of the olden time," which give much value to our initial number, we need scarcely say are from the pen of our friend John Greenleaf Whittier. We bid him a cordial welcome to our columns, and hope to number him among our frequent correspondents. The reader will perceive our indebtedness to his present contribution for the motto which indicates so happily the moral of our title.

The work of reformation to be rightly fulfilled begins at home. The influence of this sentiment may give to the Non-Slaverholder something of a sectarian aspect. We mean, however, that it shall not be sectarian, nor have this appearance in any repulsive sense, but that its subjects shall be of such comprehensive importance as will make them interesting to the general reader.

TEXAS.—The resolutions for the admission of the State of Texas into the Union were adopted by the House of Representatives, Ayes 141 Nays 56, and by the Senate, Ayes 31 Nays 13. They received the signature of the President on the 29th ultimo.

CULTURE OF COTTON IN BRITISH INDIA.—A large part of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Reporter, dated "October 1st, 1845," is devoted to the interesting and important question, of substituting the produce of free labour for that of slave labour. It contains a document relating to the culture of cotton in British India, which was a short time since addressed as a memorial to Sir Robert Peel, as the Prime Minister, by the Committee of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society. It sets forth many important facts and statements, and proves that so far from the attempt to cultivate cotton in India having failed, as has been so often asserted in this country, there has been a large annual increase. The quantity imported into England last year from India amounted to 239,718 bales, being more than a fifth part of that imported from the United States, and almost equal to the amount imported from this country twenty years ago. It is also more than six times the amount imported from India in 1825, while the import from this country during the last year was but little more than three times that of 1825, thus showing the comparative increase of cultivation to be much greater in India than in the United States. The annual export of cotton from India to China exceeds that to England.

The quality of India cotton has not hitherto been equal to the best American, owing principally to bad culture and cleaning.

The experiments which have been tried under the direction of the East India Company to improve the quality of the cotton, have, upon the whole, been very satisfactory, especially at Dharwar; and, from the facts collected, it is believed it may be so improved as to rival in every respect the produce of the United States.

The memorial concludes thus: "If India can supply cotton of equal quality and similar price with that from America, she will confer a vast boon on this country; and should she be able to supply it at a less cost, which it is believed with proper attention she may, she will be a mighty instrument in the hand of Divine Providence of breaking down one of the most execrable tyrannies that exists on the face of the earth. These considerations should secure for this object the warm sympathy and hearty cooperation of every British patriot and of every Christian philanthropist."

"Another document," says the Editor of the A. S. Reporter, "highly worthy of attention in our columns to-day, expounds the duty of using articles produced by free labour in preference to articles produced by slave labour. This is extracted from the Minutes of the New York Yearly Meeting of Friends for the present year, and may justly be commended to an attentive perusal. Much in this respect was done by British abolitionists in an earlier stage of the controversy, by the preference given to East India sugar; and we have no doubt but the same effort would be repeated, if articles manufactured with East India cotton, could, in a trustworthy manner, be brought into the market. It is known to us that attention is directed to this subject, and it will afford us the sincerest gratification if a plan for effecting the very important object in view can be matured."

We are informed by a letter recently received from England that arrangements are now in progress for the manufacture of cotton fabrics from free cotton. This cannot but afford strong encouragement in various points of view, to the humble efforts of the Free Produce Association of Friends. In England, however, no difficulty exists in procuring free cotton; for in addition to that received from East India, considerable quantities are imported from the British possessions, altogether amounting to one-sixth of the whole import.

SELECTIONS.

From the London Friend.

THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS AS IT WAS AND AS IT IS.

We cannot meditate but with interest and advantage on the present condition of the Society of Friends, as contrasted with its early character; nor ought we to consider with indifference the causes which have led to this condition, or which have in any way modified that character. It is an inquiry intimately connected with the spiritual interests of each of us as an individual member; and should it result in the conviction that as a body of Christian professors, we are less devoted, less earnest, less distinguished by spiritual fruits than we formerly were, ought it not to lead us to look into the cause of this degeneracy, and into the nature of our individual responsibility in connexion with it? We profess to believe the same religious doctrines, and to be regulated by the same spiritual influences as our forefathers were, and yet practically, in many important respects, we are a different people.

Much has been said of the darkness of the age in which the early Friends appeared, and it has been asserted, that their light shone more brightly from contrast with the gloom by which they were surrounded. It was, however, a time by no means distinguished for religious darkness; it was, on the contrary, an era which must ever be marked in the history of religion in this country. It was the era of Baxter, of Bunyan, of the Puritans, and of the Non-conformists. The consciences of the people had indeed been previously kept in bondage by an unhallowed exercise of the civil power, and under its influence they had almost ceased to think with freedom on religious subjects. But the antiquated systems of belief which had grown up for generations, the bequests of dark and corrupt ages, were shaken to their base. They had been sustained by the wealth of the state for state purposes, and being invigorated by nothing but lifeless forms and ceremonies, they contained the elements of their own dissolution; overgrown, but feeble, they were ready to die of decrepitude, or to burst of their own plentitude. Out of the dust into which they crumbled, there sprang, with irrepressible fertility, a harvest of molley and incongruous sects and principles; truth grew side by side with error, heavenly doctrines were blended with human inventions, and the religious elements were altogether thrown into such a chaos as has rarely been witnessed in this or any other country. But the result was for good; there was a searching investigation into the foundations of religious belief, and it issued in the ascendancy of right principle.

It was in this period of excitement, arising from religious and political change and uncertainty, that our early Friends appeared, and their devoted labours and deep sufferings, on behalf of the doctrines they had espoused, testified how sincerely they believed, and how highly they estimated them. They were men of deep religious experience; they had tasted of the power of the corruptions of their own hearts, and had felt how hard is the bondage of sin. They had sought in outward systems, a deliverance from this bondage, and, in the heartfelt experience how powerless they were, they had come to Christ. Having thus found Him whom their souls loved, they unreservedly submitted to his government, and their desires were earnest that he would work in them "both to will and to do of his good pleasure." They sold all they had to buy the pearl, and it is no marvel that they would not part with it for trifles. Hence arose that singleness of purpose which so strikingly marks the history of the early Friends. They had seen of the travail of their souls, and they were satisfied; the world had lost its power to dazzle them. They met together frequently, they prayed fervently, they preached boldly, they ran hither and thither at the bidding of Him whom only they acknowledged as head over all things to his Church; and what marvel that He blessed their labours? They were full of the spirit and of power, they were earnest, devoted, and single-minded; how could the result be otherwise?

Such were the characteristics, not of a few members, but of the body. The influence was felt from the centre to the circumference. They were distinguished by spiritual liveliness; in them the Spirit operated, and though they were prompt and ready in the performance of the service to which they were called, they laid no unhallowed hands on the ark of the Lord's testimony. Some irregularities might mark their progress; they might partake of the enthusiasm of the times; their zeal might, in some instances, exceed the limits of discretion, for they had their "treasure in earthen vessels," but after making every deduction, there still remains enough to fix theirs as a bright example of the victory of simple, Christian Truth, when preached with power, over prejudice, error, and opposition, over the efforts of the rulers of the darkness of this world, and over "spiritual wickedness in high places." The early Friends believed themselves but strangers and pilgrims on the earth, and, as a body, they gave its concerns but small share in their affections. The great end of their religious arrangements, and of their social and domestic usages, had reference to the preservation of the spiritual life; for this they "endured with all patience," and underwent "long suffering with joyfulness." Thus they were edified, and walking in the fear of God, and in the comfort of the Holy Ghost, they were multiplied.

The ministers and the members of a religious community, are but one body in Christ; hence when the body is in a state of sound spiritual health, the effect is seen in the ministry. These act and re-act upon each other. When the body is alive, and its members mind their calling, there is ever a free exercise of spiritual gifts to edification. So it was with the early Christians, and so also it was in the experience of the early Friends. The ministry sympathized with the spiritual condition of the body, and in mystical union with it, was maintained in healthy and powerful action, and here we have another marked and deeply important feature of the period. There was a larger number in proportion to the whole, who forsook all and followed Christ, and who were qualified for public service in his church, than is now the case; and of those who were so called, there was a larger proportion than at present, who travelled in various directions to make known the truth to others.

This circumstance is of deep interest, as showing the state of the body; but there is yet another point of contrast, that indicates disease in its present condition, and in some degree points out the extent and direction of it. In the early period of the Society, there was a large preponderance of male over female ministers. Of those who were immediately associated with George Fox in the work of the ministry, the proportion was about twelve males to one female. At present it does not widely differ from two females to one male. Now, in adverting to this circumstance, it is far from my desire to call in question the prerogative of the Great Head of the Church, to whom only it pertains, in the distribution of spiritual gifts, "to divide unto every man severally as He will," still less to limit the free and full exercise of that blessed privilege of this gospel day, wherein the Spirit is poured upon all flesh, and under the influence of which, both sons and daughters shall prophesy. May we all more and more prize these privileges and walk worthy of our high vocation. There is, however, in the economy of the divine purposes, the evidence of harmony and proportion. In the spiritual building, each member fills his allotted position. Thus does the Church "grow up into him in all things who is the Head, even Christ, from whom the whole body fitly joined together, and compacted by that which every joint supplieth, according to the effectual working in the measure of every part, maketh increase of the body, unto the edifying of itself in love." May we all deeply ponder this evidence of the healthy condition of the church, and our own solemn responsibility in connexion with it. May the number increase amongst us, who "walk by faith, and not by sight," and may the word of the Lord have free course and be glorified. In the early ages of the Christian church, and in the rise of the Society of Friends, it was the men chiefly who girt on the Christian armour, and under the direction of the great Captain of their salvation, advanced to the combat; the reason why this does not continue to be more largely our case, may well excite our apprehensions.

It may be difficult, nay impossible, to estimate the causes which operate so powerfully in alienating us from the life of Christ, and which indispose us for the walk by faith and for intercourse with God. The world in all its transformations, has unquestionably had a mighty influence. "If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him." May we watch against covetousness; it is the more dangerous, because it is respectable, but it is a deep and deadening sin. Its approaches are so silent, that we are often unconscious of its motions; it removes very gently, but very certainly, the bloom and freshness of our spiritual sensibilities; it takes away our relish for heavenly enjoyment, and it fills us with the bright and dazzling visions of earthly things. We are lulled by the song of the syren, and we go on from year to year, in false and fearful security, unmindful of the voice of Him that speaketh from heaven and in unconscious ignorance of our spiritual condition.

The review is a discouraging one, but it is at times profitable for us "to hang our harps on the willows," and to "weep when we remember Zion." But the "Lord's hand is not shortened that it cannot save, neither is his ear heavy that it cannot hear;" and may we not take comfort from the language addressed to the desponding prophet, when bewailing the condition of the children of his people: "I have left me seven thousand in Israel, all the knees which have not bowed unto Baal, and every mouth which hath not kissed him." Even so may the hidden remnant amongst us take courage and come forth, and clothed in that power in which a little one can chase a thousand, put to flight "the armies of the aliens."<sup>21</sup>

"O ye that make mention of the name of the Lord, keep not silence, and give him no rest, till he make Jerusalem a praise in the earth."

10th mo., 1844.

W.

From "The Friend," Vol. 2, No. 37.

NEGRO SLAVERY IN THE UNITED STATES.

This gigantic iniquity really seems to be less and less regarded, as time and circumstances render it more and more formidable. Some day, however, its true character must be seen, for its tremendous consequences will affect this whole nation. It would be a great mercy if we could be brought to a consideration of the subject by the persuasions of righteousness, rather than by the terrors of wrath. We are all more or less guilty of the long continued wrong. It is in vain that we attempt to escape, by pleading our positions on this, or the other side of certain geographical lines. These distinctions have been obliterated by the actual modes of industry, and the policy which connects the north with the south. The all-conquering power of gain has made their interests one, and the consequences indissoluble. The inhabitants of the slaveholding states deserve our commiseration, and are entitled to our aid in doing whatever can now be done toward the atonement or removal of this high transgression.

Let us fearlessly look the evil in the face. If the climate of Rhode Island had been as favourable to the culture of cotton as the Carolinas, the capitalists of that state might have found a market for their hundreds of cargoes of human flesh, without sending them as they did to the south. Had the seasons been propitious in Massachusetts, the early settlers there would, in all probability, have pursued the Virginia system, and directed their attention to tobacco and to slaves.

New York and New Jersey, until recently, and Pennsylvania formerly, for several years tolerated negro bondage. In truth, we all, at this moment, partake, in some degree, of the labour of slaves; THEY TOIL AND BLEED FOR OUR CONVENIENCE AND OUR GAIN. But without pressing this tender point too far, let these considerations teach us lenity toward those who happen to have possession of the bodies, and who direct the physical energies of those victims of oppression, assured that it is high time for us to begin in earnest to assist in wiping the foul stain from our land, NO MATTER WHAT THE COST MAY BE. Such efforts are enjoined by Christianity. May many able advocates in this great cause speedily appear, and endowed with pure and devoted spirits, like Woolman and Benezer, enlighten the path of our duty, and lead us to the fulfilment of deeds of mercy and of justice.

V.

FAITHFULNESS OF MOTHERS.

In this life we can never know how many spirits of just men made perfect now reign in heaven, in consequence of the faithfulness of their mothers. Those now on earth, living by faith, and who "keep the sayings of this book," the most devoted men living, are those who have been led to Christ by a mother's love and faithfulness. You can hardly be aware how deep may be the impression which you may make on the mind of your child, even in a very few moments of time. For one I can truly say, I have never met with any loss so great as that of losing the care and instruction of my mother during my childhood, in consequence of her having lost her reason. But I can recollect that when a very little child, I was standing at the open window, at the close of a lovely summer's day. The large red sun was just sinking away behind the western hills; the sky was gold and purple commingled; the winds were sleeping, and a soft, solemn stillness seemed to hang over the earth. I was watching the sun as he sent his yellow rays through the trees, and felt a kind of awe, though I knew not wherefore. Just then my mother came to me. She was raging with phrency,—for reason had long

POETRY.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

The Quaker of the olden time!—
How calm and firm and true,
Unspotted by its wrong and crime
He walked the dark earth through!
The lust of power, the love of gain,
The thousand lures of sin
Around him, had no power to stain
The purity within.

With that deep insight, which detects
All great things in the small,
And knows how each man's life affects
The spiritual life of all,
He walked by faith and not by sight,
By love and not by law;
The presence of the wrong or right,
He rather felt than saw.

He felt that wrong with wrong partakes,
That nothing stands alone,
That whoso gives the motive, makes
His brother's sin his own.
And, pausing not for doubtful choice
Of evils great or small,
He listened to that inward voice
Which called away from all.

Oh! Spirit of that early day,
So pure and strong and true,
Be with us in the narrow way
Our faithful fathers knew.
Give strength the evil to forsake,
The cross of Truth to bear,
And love and reverent fear to make
Our daily lives a prayer!

INTELLIGENCE.

BIRMINGHAM, (ENGLAND,) Nov. 4.—A meeting of the Birmingham British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society was held in Ebenezer Chapel, Mr. R. T. Cadbury in the chair. The report was read by the Rev. T. H. Morgan, in the absence of the Secretary. Mr. Sturge, in moving the second resolution, said he himself was strongly impressed with the conviction, though he spoke only as an individual, and not on behalf of any society, that while the slave-trader could turn round on the slaveholder, and say, "You are equally guilty with me," the slaveholder could say to those knowingly and willingly taking the produce of slave labour, "You are a participator in the crime." He (Mr. Sturge) held in his hand a statistical account, which he wished to be made more generally known. About fifty years ago, slavery in America appeared likely to become extinct. Soon since left its throne,—and her, a victim of madness. She came up to me, wild with insanity. I pointed to the glorious sun in the west—and in a moment she was calm! She took my little hands within hers, and told me that "the great God made the sun, and the stars, and the world, every thing—that He it was who made her little boy, and gave him an immortal spirit; that yonder sun, and the green fields, and the world itself, will one day be burned up; but that the spirit of her child will then be alive, for he must live when heaven and earth are gone; that he must pray to the great God, and love and serve him for ever."

She let go my hands; madness returned; she hurried away. I stood with my eyes filled with tears, and my little bosom heaving with emotions which I could not have described; but I can never forget the impression which that conversation of my poor mother made upon me. Oh! what a blessing would it have been, had the inscrutable Providence of God given me a mother who could have repeated these instructions, accompanied by her prayers, through all the days of my childhood! But, "even so, Father, for so it seemeth good in thy sight."

Mothers, if, when the sorrows of life shall be over, when the fashions of this life shall have passed away, you stand on Mount Zion above, with your children around you, able to say, "Here, Father, am I; and here are the children whom thou hast given me, of those whom thou gavest me have I lost none," and shall hear him say: "Well done, good and faithful servant, thou hast been faithful,"—would you exchange that honour for all that ever entered into the heart of man? Take these children, then, and train them up for God, and all this, and a thousand fold more, shall be yours forever.—Todd.

"Seed sown with the tears of a confined, oppressed people, harvests cut down by an overborne, discontented reaper, make bread less sweet to the taste of an honest man, than that which is the produce, or just reward of such voluntary action, as is a proper part of the business of human creatures."—Woolman.

"Whence is it that men, who believe in a righteous Omnipotent Being, to whom all nations stand equally related, and are equally accountable, remain so easy in it; but because the ideas of negroes and slaves are so interwoven in the mind, that they do not discuss this matter with that candour and freedom of thought, which the case justly calls for."—Woolman.

after that, however, improvements in machinery commenced in this country, and the demand for cotton from America by England was increased also, as the following facts strikingly prove:—

Exports of Cotton from the United States.		Slave Population in America.
Year.	lbs.	Year.	Pop.
1790,	189,316	1790,	657,437
1800,	29,914,201	1800,	896,582
1810,	62,186,081	1810,	1,299,872
1820,	124,893,405	1820,	1,733,162
1830,	270,979,784	1830,	2,310,882
1840,	540,959,568	1840,	2,485,683
1842,	1,081,919,136	1842,	2,847,810

No person, then, looking at these facts, could doubt that the consumption of cotton in this country had very much increased the amount of slavery in the United States; and a consideration of this had led to some attempts which had lately been made to supply cotton, exclusively the produce of free labour, from the East Indies; and he hoped Christians would see it their duty to use those articles, the produce of free labour, rather than those stained with blood.—A. S. Reporter.

BANBURY, (ENGLAND).—A meeting was held by special invitation, in the Friends' Meeting House, on Monday evening last, to hear a statement from Mr. Joseph Sturge, of Birmingham. There are few persons, we believe we might say none, who have evinced a more determined and consistent opposition to negro slavery in all its phases than has Joseph Sturge. His visit to the western hemisphere must be fresh in the recollection of all our readers who have taken an interest in the condition of the coloured population. By that visit he has added much to our previous knowledge of that condition, particularly in the United States, and enlarged his own ability to speak practically on a system which has long occupied the attention of the religious community with which he is more immediately connected, as well as that of the Christian philanthropist of every creed. Joseph Ashbey Gillett, Esq., presided; and we were agreeably surprised to find that George William Alexander was also present. Both Mr. Sturge and Mr. Alexander addressed the meeting at some length, and invited observations and questions. Several gentlemen availed themselves of the invitation, and obtained what we judged to be satisfactory replies. Much that was narrated was familiar; we were glad to hear that there is a probability of the professedly Christian churches in America, hitherto holding slaves as common or church property, abandoning the abominable practice.

Mr. Sturge announced an attempt that is being made in Manchester to establish a manufactory of cotton goods from the free grown cotton of the East Indies. He anticipates that the object will be carried out; and impressed upon the meeting the important effect which the success of the attempt must have upon the slavery question in North America. It was likely the article might not at first be so good at the price, as that produced from the slave-grown cotton, but he hoped the satisfaction that must be felt by those purchasing it, that they were not participating in the wrongs done to the slave, would be considered more than an equivalent for any little extra cost. The addresses of both Mr. Sturge and Mr. Alexander were listened to with much attention, and seemed to excite considerable interest; the feeling of the meeting was evidently with the speakers.

A meeting of a similar character to the foregoing was held a few days previously, at which Messrs. J. Sturge and W. Alexander were present, with similar results.—Banbury Guardian.

CASE OF JOSEPH LOUAPRE, FOR CRUELTY TO HIS NEGRO, MOUSTACHE ALIAS CHABOTTE.

Louapre appeared before Recorder Genois on Saturday, charged with causing the death of his slave by excessive whipping. Mr. Beaufeu, testified that they had often heard the cries of the deceased—who had been whipped unmercifully for months past; that he had run away, was put in the police jail; and on his return to Louapre's bakery, was again severely punished, when he died. Dr. Barbe deposed that negroes had occasionally died of tetanus after the infliction of thirty lashes, but not immediately. Several journeymen bakers in the employ of Louapre, testified that Moustache was idle and refractory, and had on one occasion struck his master. Mr. and Made. Beaufeu stated that the negro had received some hundreds of lashes, while the bakers admitted only six or seven, on the night of Sunday, and on Monday morning, when the slave died. Mr. Preaux, who appeared for Louapre, said that the most that could be made of it was manslaughter, in which the District Attorney, Mr. Dufour, concurred. Recorder Genois, after animadverting on the ex parte evidence of the witnesses for the defence, admitted Louapre to bail in $5,000, to appear before the Criminal Court.—N. O. Tropic.

PRINTED AT

Morrihew & Thompson's Book and Job Office,
No. 7 Carter's Alley.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

"Whoso gives the motive, makes his brother's sin his own."

VOL. I.]

PHILADELPHIA, SECOND MONTH, 1842.

[NO. 2.]

ASSOCIATED ACTION.

At the YEARLY MEETING OF FRIENDS, HELD IN NEW YORK by adjournments from the 26th of the 5th month, to the 30th of the same, inclusive, 1841.

The Essay contained in the Records of the Meeting for Sufferings, on the subject of trafficking in, and the free use of, articles produced by the labor of slaves, was fully approved by this Meeting, and directed to be transmitted to the subordinate meetings. It is as follows:

The subject of freely using and trading in articles produced by the labor of slaves, has claimed the very serious consideration of this meeting, and under the impressions attending, we are induced to invite our beloved friends to unite with us in a careful examination of it.

That the system of slavery involves in itself a great departure from those principles of moral rectitude which the Christian Religion not only inculcates, but enjoins, is a truth readily admitted. And this being conceded, the deeply interesting inquiry is suggested, whether by freely purchasing the produce of slave labor, we are not strengthening the hands of the oppressor, and lending our aid in riveting the fetters upon the galled limbs of the slave?

In the early settlement of America, when there was little known of the manner in which slaves were procured in Africa, and the purchase of them here was deemed favorable to both master and slave, Friends not only purchased and held slaves, but even engaged, to a limited extent, in the foreign slave trade. At an early period in the history of this trade, a few Friends were enlightened to see the sinfulness of it, and after long and arduous labor with their brethren, the conviction of its sinfulness so prevailed, that this traffic was relinquished. The next step in the progress of reform, was to refrain from the purchase and sale of those slaves already in the country. Our worthy forefathers, however, continued to hold their fellow men in bondage, because they had not sufficiently examined the subject in the light of Truth; for when in the lapse of time, through an increase of light, they became convinced that this practice also was wrong, they united in abolishing it.

But before this was entirely effected, there were enlightened and faithful members of our religious society, who, in consideration of the great injustice inseparably connected with the system of slavery, and also the intimate relation subsisting between slaveholders and the purchasers and consumers of the products of slave labor, were induced to believe that, as faithful and consistent advocates in the cause of universal righteousness, it was required of them to abstain from the use of articles produced by the labor of slaves. Among these, it is well known, that that deeply instructed and devoted servant of Christ, JOHN WOOLMAN, occupied a prominent place. And from his day, down to the present, the same testimony has been upheld by many of our most worthy and enlightened members. But is it not an inquiry demanding our most serious thoughtfulness, whether the advancement of this testimony, within the limits of our Society, has fully kept pace with the increase of light and knowledge; and whether our sympathy with the slave, in the long continuance of that weight of affliction, under which he is bowed down, has been so lively, and our eyes so singly directed to the pointings of duty in this matter, as to prepare us to perceive and faithfully to follow the manifestations of the Divine Will?

"The trading in," says John Woolman, "or frequent use of any produce known to be raised by those who are under such lamentable oppression, hath appeared to me to be a subject which may yet require the more serious consideration of the humble followers of Christ the Prince of Peace. After long and mournful exercise, I am now free to mention how things have opened in my mind, with desires, that if it please the Lord further to open his will to any of his children in this matter, they may faithfully follow him in such manifestation."

The determined manner in which the slaveholder still continues to grasp his victim, and the horrors inseparably connected with the foreign and the domestic slave trade, are circumstances which press this subject upon our attention, and in the most forcible manner urge us to "discuss the matter with candor and freedom."

"Customs generally approved, and opinions received by youth from their superiors, become like the natural produce of the soil, especially when they are suited to favorite inclinations; but as the judgments of God, by which the state of the soul must be tried, are without partiality, it would be the highest wisdom to forego customs and popular opinions, and try the treasure of the soul by the infallible standard, Truth. Christ, our holy leader, graciously continueth to open the understandings of his people, and as circumstances alter from age to age, some who are deeply baptized into a feeling of the state of things, are led by His Holy Spirit into exercises in some respects different from those which attended the faithful in foregoing ages, and from a clear conviction, they may see the relation of one thing to another, and the necessary tendency of each; and hence it may be absolutely binding upon them to desist from some parts of conduct, which some good men have been in."—Woolman.

Thus it was with members of our Religious Society in regard to a participation in the foreign slave trade; and again, in relation to the domestic traffic in slaves. It was thus with them, also, in regard to the holding of slaves, and why should it not be so, as relates to the dispose of the products of slave labor? If we examine the connection existing between the slaveholder and the consumer of the produce of the slave labor, must we not admit, that it is of a very intimate nature, and that its tendency is to support the system of slavery?

To hire a slave, and pay the wages of his labor to his master would be deemed nearly equivalent to slave holding.

If this slave toils for his master, and we purchase freely the produce of his labor, do we not contribute as effectually to the gain of the slaveholder, as in the preceding case? If another person purchases this produce for the purpose of traffic, and we buy of him for the purpose of consuming it, is not another link added to the chain, and is not the connection with the slaveholder as complete as in the first instance? It is true, that we are further removed from the scene of oppression—and it may be that this increased distance has tended to pacify the conscience, in a course that is not consistent with sound reasoning; and thus may we not have contributed too long, to encourage, by our conduct, a system of oppression, the existence of which we have so sincerely lamented?

When we reflect that the precepts of the Christian religion require us to cherish a feeling of sympathy with our fellow men, in the varied difficulties and sufferings which attend them—"to weep with those who weep"—"to remember those who are in bonds, as bound with them; and those who suffer afflictions, as being ourselves also in the body"—and think of the long series of years, during which the slave has been chained and tasked, and his sweat exacted—and how entirely those rights, which are the gifts of a beneficent Creator, bestowed alike upon all men, as blessings to sweeten life, are torn from him—is there not a pressing and solemn obligation resting upon us, carefully to examine whether we do in any way contribute to the continuance of this system of oppression?

It may be urged in favor of using the proceeds of slave labor, that if we do not use it, others will, and that our abstinence will not arrest or mitigate the evil, and therefore we may innocently derive from it a good to ourselves. But might not an argument like this have been urged with equal fitness, by our Friends formerly, in favor of their participation in slavery and the slave trade?

It may be said, that in refusing to use the produce of slave labor we adopt a compulsory measure, and undertake to coerce the slaveholder to liberate his slaves—that the principle of abstinence, if carried out, would compel many persons to leave their accustomed employments—that trade itself would be subjected to a convulsion, the extent of which cannot be foreseen—that the slaveholder, deprived of his income by our abstinence, would be unable to provide for the maintenance of his slaves, and that increased sufferings and perhaps starvation would be the consequence.

When arguments like these are balanced against the positive and monstrous evils of slavery, to which they tend to serve as props, and we for a moment suppose ourselves in the condition of the enslaved, and then bring those arguments to that moral test of right in our own bosoms, which is always in perfect agreement with the precept enjoined by our holy Redeemer, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them," does not the conviction fasten upon us, that such arguments are too light to sustain a system by which millions of our fellow men are deprived of those inalienable rights, which are the gifts of God, bestowed alike upon all?

Let us trace out the probable consequences of declining the use of the products of slave labor. A considerable number of persons refusing the use of such produce, would at once create a demand for similar articles produced by free labor. In the commencement, the supply of such produce would not be fully equal to the demand, and some advance in the price might be expected. This would stimulate to increased production, and the quantity of such goods would increase. While the supply was thus enlarging, may we not hope that the example of those who conscientiously declined to participate in the fruits of slave labor, would work conviction in the minds of others, and that the number would increase? The slaveholders, seeing the progress of a more elevated public sentiment, might be induced to meet the change—not by starving their miserable slaves, but by changing their condition from "shanties to men." This change would be commenced, doubtless, by a few of the most enlightened slaveholders, who perceiving that there was really an honest testimony abroad against slavery, which refused all participation in its fruits, might enter themselves into the spirit of the reform, and meet the sentiment in its fulness.

Thus the impression at first would be made on the outskirts of slavery. And while the demand for the produce of free labor was gradually increasing, and preparation for supplying the demand was constantly enlarging, a decided impression would be made on the market for slave goods. Under a decaying demand for such goods, no prudent slaveholder would add to the number of his slaves. The slave merchant would be less disposed to prosecute his illegal and hazardous enterprise. The inducement to rear slaves to supply the internal traffic would be diminished, and the whole system of slavery would be weakened.

In this view, nothing presents itself having the appearance of an attempt to coerce, nothing to compel persons to leave their accustomed employments, nothing to produce embarrassments, much less convulsions in trade, and nothing that threatens the slave with the suffering of famine in addition to his bonds, in consequence of the inability of his master to provide for his wants. He pursues his own course, until either the convictions of duty, or the prospect of advancing his interest, induce him to change. The movement, indeed, speaks to the slaveholder in intelligible and forcible language. It tells him he is inflicting upon his fellow man an injury which every free man, in his own case, would deem insupportable, and calling loudly for retributive justice. It tells him that the "hire of the laborers which have reaped down his fields, which is by him kept back by fraud, crieth, and the cries of them which have reaped, are entered into the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth," and that there is an elevated tone of moral feeling abroad in the land, that cannot participate in the fruits of labor so unjustly exacted—that dare not contribute to that gain, which is the inducement to such grievous oppression, lest it should also partake in its sins. Can it be doubted that a moral influence would attend such a movement, that would be extensively felt by the slaveholders themselves?

Nor should the difficulties which are anticipated deter us! There is a force in united efforts, especially when enlisted in the cause of virtue, which, if they are discreetly and perseveringly conducted, can achieve wonders. It is true, that at the present time, the producers of slavery are so intertwined with our varied occupations and wants, that we scarce can see how to disengage ourselves from them, yet if our attention be singly fixed upon the pointings of Truth, in reference to this subject, we may reasonably trust, that it will guide us rightly, and prepare our way before us. In ancient days, when the progress of a people, who were journeying by divine direction, was obstructed by a river which spread its breadth in their way, they were required to advance until the soles of their feet pressed the margin of the stream—and thus standing, the retreating waters gave way before them, and they passed over dry shod. If, following this example, we proceed as far as we can, and there stand, willing to advance if a way can be discovered, all past experience unites in bearing its testimony in favor of the belief, that little by little, the difficulties will yield, until the whole are surmounted.

Some sacrifice of interest would be required, and some personal indulgence, for a time, must be dispensed with. But it is by no means a new thing, that sacrifice should be required for the promotion of the cause of Truth and Righteousness in the earth. Indeed, if we look back on the past, will it not appear that sacrifice has been the price at which reformation in the world has been carried forward? It has been the lot of our religious society to participate largely in trials of this kind, nor is it easy to conceive on what ground we can expect to be excused from them, until Righteousness be established in the earth, unless, indeed, it should be for the mournful reason, that we have departed from our proper position in the militant Church. In the consideration of this matter, our minds have been seriously affected. We wish not to promote a feverish excitement in relation to this great subject, but we desire that all may unite in calmly and carefully considering it. If we admit the correctness of the position that "it is the market for slave produce which makes slavery," we must feel that it is a serious matter to be customers in this market. The circumstance of long usage may be presented as a plea in favor of the continuance of the use. But the subject of inquiry is, whether a system of injustice and oppression, has not been strengthened by this long usage? May we consider the matter with that seriousness and candor which the case justly calls for? "If our hearts are softened and expanded by the love of God, we shall be prepared to view these oppressed people, as children of the same Almighty Father, equally with ourselves the objects of His divine regard, and of that salvation which comes by Jesus Christ; and thus be enabled to enter into a lively feeling of the miseries and hardships they endure; to put our souls in their souls' stead, and in singleness of heart to follow every opening of duty in their behalf, whatever sacrifice it may cost us, either of worldly treasure or personal comfort."

Taken from the Minutes,

RICHARD MOTT, Clerk.

SEVENTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE AMERICAN FREE PRODUCE ASSOCIATION.

The Executive Committee of the American Free Produce Association, at the close of its seventh year, find little to record, excepting the statements which properly belong to the report of the Manufacturing Committee. These will show that the society has not existed in vain, although it may have done less in other departments than in former years. The difficulty of obtaining a sufficient supply of free cotton manufactures, has, doubtless discouraged many abolitionists from attempting to abstain from the use of the products of slave labour, therefore every facility for procuring such, which our Association has been able to furnish, is an advantage gained over the robber system of slavery.

The address which was issued by you at your last annual meeting, to British abolitionists, urging upon them the duty of abstinence from the use of slave-grown cotton, has been circulated in Great Britain, and we trust not without effect.

Your committee notice with pleasure, indications of increasing interest in this department of the anti-slavery enterprise. The formation of a Free Produce Association, among the Friends of this city, we hail as a cheering token that the slave is not forgotten by them, and as an evidence that the influence of our own Association has been felt by the community around us. We wish our coadjutors abundant success.

The adoption, by various anti-slavery societies, of resolutions expressing our principles, we also regard as manifestations of improving public sentiment, at least, among the friends of freedom. If those who have given their votes in favor of these resolutions, will faithfully conform their practice to them, they may hasten the day of the slave's emancipation.

Your committee feel undiminished confidence in the principles on which our association is based, and earnestly wish that the hearty adoption of them by every Anti-Slavery Society in the land, might render unnecessary a distinct organization for their promotion. They are but plain and simple deductions from the fundamental anti-slavery principle, and it is a cause of surprise and deep regret that many abolitionists whose eagle eyes are continually discovering new and rugged paths of duty, and whose all-conquering zeal enables them, bravely and cheerfully, to tread those paths, should not yet have seen, amid all the light which is burning round them, that true consistency requires of them abstinence from the purchase of the ill-gotten fruits of slavery. Would they cleanse their hands from participation in these, would they but annul this union with the slaveholders, the consistency of their course would render far more effective their eloquent rebukes of his sin. That they may be convinced of this, and that all who love the slave may be induced to bear a faithful testimony against oppression, by refusing to be fed and clothed by stolen labor, we earnestly exhort the members of this association to be untiring in their efforts to disseminate its principles, and to impress them on the hearts of abolitionists. By a pure example, accompanying cogent argument and urgent exhortation, should this be done. The lamentable fact that so few have rallied around our standard should not weaken our adherence to truth or discourage us in our attempt to propagate it. The interval between sowing and reaping may be long, but the harvest will come. Truth perseveringly spoken, duty patiently performed, and sacrifices to the right, cheerfully made, will produce results which shall ultimately bless the world. We have cast bread upon the waters, which to us may seem to be utterly lost, but assuredly it shall be found after many days.

JAMES MOTT,

Chairman of the Executive Committee.

Philadelphia, 10th mo. 3d, 1845.

COMMUNICATIONS.

To the Editors of the Non-Slaveholder.

In conversing with my friends on the use of the productions of slave-labour, I have often heard them admit that this custom supports slavery, and that a general disuse of those productions would certainly destroy the system; and yet each concludes with saying, "but I have not felt it my duty to abstain from them." An esteemed friend, who has most sincerely and earnestly laboured on behalf of the slave, writing to me lately, said: "Though ——— and myself are not yet constrained to practice upon the sound arguments we have seen and heard on the subject [of disusing slave produce,] we would encourage the diffusion of them for the sake of the cause of human freedom."

In what way the cause of human freedom can be promoted by the diffusion of sound arguments, except through a consistent practice of them, my valued friend did not explain. There is to me a discordancy between profession and practice in all these cases, which I cannot reconcile with sound Quaker doctrine. I can readily conceive the possibility of the most conscientious persons ignorantly committing acts or adopting customs which in their nature are sinful, and far is it from me to presume to determine the degree of guilt which these incur in the sight of the Judge of the whole earth, or whether He regards them as guilty in such cases of any degree of sin. But I can have no hesitation in adopting the language of James iv: 17, "To him, that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin." When our understandings, through the moral and intellectual faculties which are given us by our beneficent Creator for us, are clearly convinced that certain acts or customs are not accordant with the acknowledged principles of Christianity, but are directly opposed to the divine law, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself," can we justify ourselves in doing them; or in asking for a further extension, or a special revelation of the divine will? If we think ourselves justifiable in doing that which we acknowledge to be wrong under the plea, that we are not constrained by the spirit to abandon it, surely we are not far from that downright cantarism, which attempts to sanction the commission of crime by claiming the authority of special, divine inspiration.

If "to him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin," can we doubt that to him who knoweth what is evil and doeth it, to him it is sin? For, "to abstain from doing wrong is always safe, and what is morally wrong can never be religiously right."

I cannot but fear they are standing on very dangerous ground, who acknowledge that their daily practice directly supports a system fraught with evil, and yet attempt to satisfy their conscience with the persuasion that it is not their religious duty to abandon this practice. May all these enter into a close self-examination, that they may not deceive themselves in a matter of such high importance, involving not only their religious prosperity, but the temporal and spiritual condition of millions of their oppressed fellow-beings.

A Friend once told me that he knew some young people who did not make much religious profession, and yet declined the use of slave produce. The ground he took was, that none should presume to do this unless they could plead a special act of grace—an immediate revelation of duty—calling them to it. He did not regard the use of slave produce as wrong in itself, and therefore to be avoided, but thought one might be specially required to take up his cross in refusing to use it, either as a trial of his obedience or for some extraordinary purpose, and afterward be permitted to partake freely. Now I do not deny that we may be required to pursue this course, in matters which are lawful in themselves; thus I have heard of a Friend, who being under close exercise of mind, felt it his duty to decline the reading of newspapers—not because the practice was unlawful in itself, but in consequence of its distracting effects upon his feelings—and yet, after he had gained strength and experience, he resumed such reading, and I doubt not, very properly. But I cannot conceive of a dispensation to man, from the Just and Holy One, to work unrighteousness.

"While I fully believe, that the true disciple of Christ will be favoured with the immediate guidance of the Holy Spirit, wherever it is needful to direct his steps, it appears to me especially important, that in matters conflicting with our worldly interest and reputation, where the path of duty is obvious and clearly understood, and testimonies are concerned, which we have long considered it our duty on all occasions to support, we should guard against being deluded into a neglect of duty, under a plea of waiting for this direct, divine intimation."

L. S.

To the Editors of the Non-Slaveholder.

WHO ARE THE SLAVEHOLDERS?

A review which I have recently seen of a pamphlet on the Dissolution of the American Union, has suggested some reflections that I wish to throw before your readers.

There is much said by many of those who are opposed to slavery, of the impropriety of "church fellowship" with slaveholders; of receiving money from them for missionary and other religious purposes, and of political union with them. So far as regards "church fellowship," the Society of Friends long ago declared it to be inconsistent with Christian principles, and hence "withdrew themselves from such as walked disorderly," in refusing to liberate their slaves. I have not seen the pamphlet alluded to, nor have I any disposition to meddle with the question upon which it treats: I am, however, fully satisfied that, as an individual, it is my duty to avoid as far as possible "protecting or countenancing the iniquity" of slaveholding—both in refusing "political and ecclesiastical participation," and in withdrawing my support in a commercial point of view.

Can the slaveholders who now, as a body, so earnestly cleave to their dreadful system, and so anxiously guard it against assault, be induced to abandon it for the sake of political union or ecclesiastical communion with the people of the North? I believe not.

In the case of the Methodists, we see the Southern churches choosing to dissolve their connection with the Northern, rather than submit to the suspension of a slaveholding Bishop. It is to be feared that the simple withholding of the "moral and religious sentiment of Christendom" from the iniquity, will not reach the motive on which it rests. I know of no instance in the history of the abolition of the British slave-trade and of British slavery, in which slave-traders or slaveholders were led to adopt any legislative or unassociated action for the abandonment of their vocations, through the influence or the fear of such a withholding. Nor do the slave-traders of the present day cease their abominable traffic, although the "moral and religious sentiment" of the whole civilized world is against them. While, therefore, I can unite with the sentiment that "very exalting is the idea that the virtual slaveholder of the North, not merely reproaching the planter, the overseer, and the driver, has begun the work of self-sacrificing reform with his own heart by refusing all political and ecclesiastical participation in their deed," I must go further, and include in my refusal all commercial and personal participation.

I believe "the market for slave produce makes slavery," just as the market for slaves makes the slave trade. He, who gives the motive, holds the slave. The customer, then, in the market for slave produce, is the virtual slaveholder. Those whom we are accustomed to call slaveholders, but who may more properly be styled slave-owners or, rather, slave-claimers, appreciate this truth, and do not fail to enforce it upon those inconsistent abolitionists, whether Friends or others, who take no pains to avoid the use of the productions of slavery. "Stop, sir," said a slave-owner in a steamboat on the Delaware river to a Friend who was condemning slavery, "I wish to ask you a question: do you use the products of the slaves' labour?" The Friend was able to answer, "I do not." "Then I will listen to you," was the reply, "for your practice accords with your profession." But what reply can inconsistent abolitionists make to the slaveholder who addresses them thus: "You profess to believe that slavery is sinful in the sight of God; yet, as you do not, in your present position, refuse, as far as possible, to participate in its gains, you give no evidence that you believe the doctrine which you proclaim to me; nor do you exhibit any proof whatever that you would not connect yourselves still more intimately with the system if you were placed in circumstances where you might imagine that your comforts, your luxuries, or your interests would be promoted by your doing so."

I am well aware of the many arguments and difficulties which are urged against the non-use of slave products by those, who, while they are sincerely desirous that slavery with all its abominations should cease to exist, are not willing to begin the "work of self-sacrificing reform in their own hearts." They do not hesitate to ask the slaveholder to liberate his slaves, and to disregard the many mountains of difficulty which seem to rise up before him in attempting to perform this Christian duty, but they are not ready to take up the cross themselves; they are not willing to "wash in Jordan"—the despised stream—but like Naaman of old, would rather do "some great thing;" they neglect individual duty, and look to some grand effort or extraordinary means to bring about the deliverance of the slave.

I rejoice in the belief, that the attention of many friends of the slave in England and in this country, is becoming effectually awakened to the importance of disconnecting themselves from the evil which they wish to eradicate; and I am firmly persuaded that the days of slavery will be "numbered and finished," when those who oppose it bring to their aid the invincible power of a "consistent life."

No two things are more opposed than the Christian and warlike spirit.—Paley.

War is as contrary to the spirit of Christianity as murder.—Adam Clark.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, SECOND MONTH 4, 1846.

NEW YORK YEARLY MEETING.—In our first number reference was made to an essay extracted from the minutes of the New York Yearly Meeting, which we now give to our readers. It was prepared by the meeting for sufferings, (the subject having been referred to that body in 1844,) and adopted by the Yearly Meeting with general approbation, and without any expression of dissent. It is a highly important document, not only as an unanswerable exposition of the duty of avoiding the use of the productions of slavery, but also as the first clear and full recognition of this testimony by a Yearly Meeting of Friends. We trust it will not be the last.

John Scoble, Secretary of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, in a letter to one of us, says:—"Many of our friends on this side of the Atlantic are again beginning to direct their attention to the non-use of the products of slave labour, as one means, in the ordering of Divine Providence, for assailing the slave system. The production which of all others I have seen and found to be the most convincing, is that which has been issued by the New York Yearly Meeting. Its extensive circulation out of the limits of the Society of Friends, would, I am persuaded, do much good."

It has since been widely spread in the pages of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Reporter.

The Editor of the London Friend also refers to this minute or Address, and to the Free Produce Associations of Friends of Philadelphia and New York, in the number of that valuable periodical for Eighth month, 1845, and makes the following remarks:

"We believe there are many individuals in this country who would not hesitate for a moment to abandon the use of Slave Produce, if they could only see the means by which this excellent object might be effected. These, we feel assured, will not have to wait long, for the voice is daily becoming louder, which calls upon us to refuse all participation in the gains and productions of a slave labour system. Amongst our Philadelphia Friends, as will be seen by a letter in our columns this month, an association has been formed to secure to those who value it, the means of living as all free and Christian men ought to live, only on the fruits of that labor which is voluntary and remunerated. Allusion is made in the letter to the exertions of our friends in New York, on behalf of the same object. In its address that Yearly Meeting places the subject in its just and proper light, and invites its members to consider whether they do in any way contribute to the continuance of this grievous system of oppression, and to follow every opening of duty, whatever sacrifice it may cost, either of worldly treasures or personal comfort. Upon the generation now passing away devolved the great task of removing the stain of slavery from the British Constitution; it behoves those who are rapidly occupying the vacant place to maintain the struggle against oppression and cruelty; and in no way as it seems to us, can we so effectually do this, as by wiping off the disgrace of being fed, clothed, profited and pampered by the unrequited toil of negro slaves. If we hand down to posterity no more than we have received, we prove ourselves unworthy of our predecessors, and rob the world of a generation of men. Let us go forward steadily but in good earnest; the work was begun at the first upon individual conviction of Christian duty, and this same ground must still be kept in view, if we would make sure progress, and cherish the joyful anticipation of seeing the fruit of our labours."

AMERICAN FREE PRODUCE ASSOCIATION.—We present in this number the Seventh Annual Report of this pioneer society. Our space does not permit the insertion of the valuable report of its manufacturing committee, but the following list will exhibit the amount of goods, the production of free labour, which it has had manufactured during the last year:

15264½	yards of Muslin, 7-8, 4-4 and 5-4 wide,
21477½	" Printing Cloth,
2813	" Gingham,
1580½	" Bed Ticking,
1431½	" Drilling,
1159	" Canton Flannel,
13082½	" Calico Printed,
3684½	" Muslin Coloured,
1692½	" Check, Apron and Furniture,
1397½	lbs. Cotton Yarn,
135	doz. Wadding,
82	" Cotton Laps or Batts.

These goods are sold wholesale by J. Miller McKim, No. 31 north Fifth street, and retail by Joel Fisher, N. W. corner of Fifth and Cherry streets, Philadelphia.

IMMEDIATE EMANCIPATION.—We desire the close attention of all our readers to the essay which sets forth, clearly and incontrovertibly, the duty of immediate emancipation. We have reason to know that many who are opposed to slavery, and not a few Friends, look upon this doctrine as "unsafe and unmerciful"—a wild scheme of "violent abolitionists"—and have embraced the fallacious opinion that the slaves should be "educated and prepared for freedom," before their masters can properly cease from the sin of slaveholding. Friends who take this view of the subject, quote George Fox as their authority. Now, in regard to Christian doctrines and principles, we receive his exposition without cavil or dispute. Doctrines and principles are unchangeable; but their application to the customs and pursuits of mankind will vary from generation to generation, and from age to age. Increase of knowledge and change of circumstances may lead us to see, as John Woolman remarks, the relation of one thing to another and the necessary tendency of each; and hence it may be absolutely binding on us to desist from some parts of conduct, which some good men have been in. "The great truth that evil is evil, no matter at whose door it lies, and that men acting from conscience and religion may yet do nefarious deeds, needs to be better understood, that we may not shelter ourselves or our institutions under the names of the great or the good who have passed away." In an article published in The Friend, vol. 17, p. 386, bearing the well known initials, E. L., the writer says: "I confidently believe, that if the evils of slavery and the slave trade had been as fully developed and as clearly understood two hundred years ago, as they are now, they never would have been tolerated in our religious Society."

It is true that George Fox advised Friends to "deal so with their servants, the negroes and blacks whom they have bought with their money as to let them go free, after they have served faithfully a considerable term of years, he at thirty years after, more or less, and when they go and are made free, let them not go away empty handed." But let us remember our fathers were at length enlightened to adopt and to practice the only true Christian doctrine of emancipation. "Truth requires that all should be set free from a state of slavery, that we do no more claim property in the human race as we do in the brutes that perish."

In explanation of the views of George Fox and other Friends of his day, we may remark that long after the introduction of negro slaves into America, a belief universally prevailed that they were prisoners of war whose lives had been spared in Africa, in consideration of their being sold into slavery; that it was an act of humanity and Christian kindness on the part of the slave-traders to bring them into a country where they might receive a knowledge of the Gospel, and hence, that the purchasers of them were justly entitled to their "faithful services." These sentiments were extensively held more than a century after George Fox issued his advice, as quoted above, when the first Parliamentary enquiry was made into the character of the slave-trade. Nor were Africans the only persons who were sold as servants in America. Thousands of Germans have been brought here and sold under the name of "redemptioners" for certain periods to remunerate the owners and captains of vessels for the charges and expenses of bringing them. John Woolman speaks in his Journal of his employer having purchased several Scotchmen in Philadelphia to sell in Mount Holly.

Can there be a doubt that George Fox looked upon the Africans as a class of redemptioners, who, saved from a cruel death and brought into a Christian land, might be justly required to "serve faithfully a considerable term of years" to repay their masters the money expended in their purchase and risked in a cause of Christian benevolence? It is clear, he did not contemplate hereditary slavery, and if he were living at this day, he would doubtless raise his voice as loudly and as fearlessly against American slavery as he did against what he believed the errors and wicked customs of his age; nor would he who braved death in various forms in an unflinching and uncompromising contest for the establishment of true Christian principles, now consent, through fear of some inconvenience from its immediate abandonment, to the continuance, however limited, of a system which "abrogates every command of the Decalogue, and extends and perpetuates Heathenism of the most appalling description."

OUR POWER AND DUTY.—A common objection to the adoption of the principle of abstinence from the products of slavery is, that the things themselves are necessities of life, and that such are the existing facts of our dependent, social condition, that these products cannot now be furnished us by free labour. People thus arguing, instance the case of a person thrown upon an island wholly occupied by pirates, whose daily food and shelter of every kind are the productions of robbery, and they ask—Must this innocent person perish for lack of food or clothing, because that which he can only get has been procured by violence? Or, may he not temporarily use such things as he can find on the island necessary to his immediate support, without moral objection? Whatever force there may be in the extreme case here presented for justifying a depart-ture from the ordinary principles of rectitude, tending as it does to make truth contingent upon expediency, every one must see that the excuse fails the instant the individual, having the power to escape, remains of choice in his insular condition. He then consents with the robber, and thus becomes a robber himself, according to all legal and just principles. This power of escape is in the reach of all who desire to withdraw their voluntary support from slavery. Divine goodness has afforded us in this respect, at least, if not in all cases, very ample means for carrying out his laws of righteousness, if we are but willing to embrace them. We believe that the language is ever true in reference to modes of accomplishing our duty, "Seek and ye shall find, knock and it shall be opened unto you."

We have before us very gratifying documents, going conclusively to show that there is now raised by free labour within the slaveholding states an amount of cotton, certainly not known to us, and probably not to many persons this side of Mason and Dixon's line, previous to the inquiries connected with the establishment of the Free Produce Association of Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. If, to obtain the information already elicited by that association, was the whole object of its organization, that object was a sufficient motive for all the trouble, and no few difficulties, incident to its establishment. The journey of discovery, however, has but just commenced. New openings for the relief of oppressed consciences and oppressed men will be explored, and the facility of relief demonstrated so clearly, that those who have eyes to see, and hearts to understand, cannot fail to perceive the path of duty.

We give below extracts of letters which exhibit a large amount of cotton accessible to persons who would prefer the products of compensated labour. Will those persons, according to their several ability, afford their pecuniary aid towards procuring this attainable quantity, for the purpose of its separate manufacture? The association has a fund, founded on loans without interest, for this purpose, and to its extent the managers are engaged in procuring such cotton, but it needs a great enlargement to meet the opportunity.

Let each Friend, in view of the stewardship of worldly treasure committed to him, ask of himself, "How much," in this respect, "owest thou unto my Lord?" And let him "sit down quickly, and write" even the half of it, and we believe a gladdening impulse would be given to the cause of humanity, in the incentive it would furnish to a large additional free cultivation.

In giving the extracts we omit the names of the writers, and sometimes the places where the letters were written, but, we hope, it is unnecessary to say that the several correspondents are of respectable standing, and undoubted veracity:

No. 1.

"Pittsburgh, 4th mo. 1st, 1845.

"The facilities for obtaining free cotton are much greater than many are aware of. I believe an ample supply could be obtained in the South, through channels that could be relied upon, to furnish a factory with as much of the raw material as would be wanted for a large operation. I have taken some pains, the past year, to make inquiry, and ascertain where, and what quantity of free cotton could be obtained in several of the slave states. In North Carolina, where I was brought up, I think a large quantity could be got. N. T., a neighbor of mine, with his wife, paid a visit to their relations in the state of Mississippi, some time last year. He informed me that in several different neighborhoods, where they were among their relations, free cotton could be got. He told me that —, near W., Mississippi, who had a cotton gin, generally raised from 40 to 50 bales of cotton annually; owned no slaves, hired no slaves, and was willing to keep his cotton entirely separate from other cotton; also, that — and —, in the same neighbourhood, would also keep their cotton separate. He also mentioned an uncle of his, —, in another part of that state, that would be an efficient agent; he was a pretty large farmer, had no slaves, and was opposed to slavery. N. also mentioned some others in the neighbourhood of Holly Springs, Marshall County, Miss. I have formed an acquaintance, since leaving home, with —, of M. H., Alabama. He said that he thought, by taking a little trouble, there could be a hundred bales of cotton got in his neighbourhood, that could be relied upon as free labour cotton. He proffered to render me all the service he could, if I would come there to establish an agency. —, of M., Ala., proffered the same service. I have been travelling with a merchant, since I left Philadelphia, from Huntingdon, Carroll County, West Tennessee; he says that he thinks a hundred bales or more of free cotton could be collected in that county, within the circle of his acquaintance. — is acquainted with one farmer that has a cotton gin, and works no slaves, with whom this cotton could be ginned, baled, &c., without the labour of slaves. I believe by establishing agencies in slave states, and paying small premiums for free cotton, the operation could be made to tell upon slavery. One object I had in making these inquiries was, to endeavour to procure a small quantity of free cotton to get spun into yarn, to supply my customers, and another was to ascertain the quantity of cotton that could be obtained, and the facilities for procuring it, to aid the general concern."

No. 2.

"New York, 6th mo. 7th, 1845.

"The statement made at a meeting of Friends, in this city, during the week of our Yearly Meeting, as to the facilities of obtaining free cotton in the Southern states, are confirmed by information which I have subsequently obtained from a resident of Macon, Georgia, with whom I have had an acquaintance for some years past, and who has furnished the article for this market to a limited extent. He informs me that he could readily procure from 300 to 400 bales that could be relied on as free, which would cost the same as that raised by slave labor—except the additional expense of collecting it together, and which would not probably exceed  $\frac{1}{4}$  to  $\frac{1}{2}$  a cent per pound."

No. 3.

"17 Nov. '45.

"Your favour of 11th Nov. has just come to hand, and contents carefully noticed. I have no objection to fill your order, if, in your reply, you wish me to do so. I approve of your course to do away the evil of slavery, and think it a better one than others pursue. I have engaged for — such cotton as is made by those of my personal acquaintances entirely by free labor. I also employ a friend of mine, and one on whom I can depend, to get it from those whom he knows have no slaves. It is mostly made by poor men living back 40 or 50 miles, and who only make from 5 to 15 bales each. It is possible I may get the cotton made by the persons you name, as we have an agent near —, Miss. I will write to ascertain if I can. You had better engage it yearly. When travelling in the country, next summer, I shall try to form acquaintances with those planters owning no slaves, and engage their cotton yearly."

No. 4.

"Dec. 6, 1845.

"As regards free labor cotton, we have no sort of difficulty in buying it in almost any reasonable quantity. About one-third of the cotton brought to this market, from North Mississippi, is of that kind, and always of good quality. White people who plant, seldom make more than from 5 to 20 bales [annually,] and handle it with more care than the large planters, who trust to their slaves, and generally get it out of the fields earlier; and it is a fact, perhaps not known by you, that the bulk of the cotton shipped from here to New Orleans fetches a higher price in the average than from any other point in the cotton region. We pay no more for free labour cotton than any other, and should your friends be induced to favour me with an order for a constant supply, they may rely upon my honor that every bale shall be strictly "free labour," and each invoice shall be sworn to before a magistrate, and the name and residence of each grower given. If you think well of such cotton I would be happy to send you a few hundred bales during the season."

NOTICE TO READERS AND AGENTS.—This number of the Non-Slaveholder, like the first, will be widely circulated, as there has not been sufficient time since the latter was issued for those who wish to subscribe to forward their names. Our readers will also, by this means, have a further opportunity of knowing its character. Those who wish to become subscribers will please send their names with as little delay as possible; and our friends who have consented to act as agents, and others who may be willing to act, will confer a favour by forwarding their list of subscribers early. Bank notes, which are current at the respective places where subscribers reside, will be received in payment at par.

SELECTIONS.

ON THE DUTY OF PROMOTING THE IMMEDIATE AND COMPLETE ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

THE absolute right of every human being to personal liberty has been too clearly ascertained, and is too generally acknowledged, to require either argument or illustration in its support. God has created all men equal, and endowed them with life, that they might enjoy it in subordination to his will; and liberty, that they might use it for promoting the great ends of their existence as rational and accountable creatures. Human laws may declare these natural rights to be inviolable, but they need not this aid to be more effectually vested in every man than they are. "On the contrary," as remarks the great jurist, Blackstone, "no human legislature has the power to abridge or destroy them, unless the owner himself shall commit some criminal act that amounts to a forfeiture." To maintain the opposite doctrine would be to confound competency with force, and to allow that might were right. In contemplating the end for which civil government was instituted, Edmund Burke eloquently observes, "If civil society be made for the advantage of man, all the advantages for which it is made become his right. It is an institution of beneficence; and the law itself is only beneficence acting by rule. Men have a right to live by that rule; they have a right to justice, as between their fellows, whether their fellows are in politico function or in ordinary occupation; they have a right to the fruits of their industry, and to the means of making their industry fruitful; they have a right to the acquisitions of their parents, to the nourishment and improvement of their offspring, to instruction in life, and to consolation in death. Whatever each man can do without trespassing on others, he has a right to do for himself, and he has a right to a fair portion of all which society, with all its combinations of skill and force, can do in his favour. In this partnership all men have equal rights, though not to equal things." Such are the principles, and such the language of enlightened men, and they find an echo in the common sense and conscience of mankind. But slavery negatives a fundamental right; it deprives men of their liberty; it reduces them to the condition of chattels; it robs them of all property in themselves, in the labours of their hands, and the resources of their intellect, by constituting them the property of other men; it makes them merchantable commodities, things to be used or abused at the discretion or caprice of their masters; it is an atrocious exemplification of the law of force and fraud, in opposition to that of equity and justice.

It is unnecessary to dwell upon the incidents of slavery—its oppressive cruelties—the awful degradation it inflicts on the slave, and the revolting character it impresses on his master—but it should ever be remembered that its victims are INNOCENT human beings, who have never forfeited their freedom by crime; and that their slavery is not only perpetual, but is perpetuated in their equally innocent offspring. The original injustice is continued from generation to generation, and its guilt consequently heightened by its continuance. It should also be remembered, that in those countries where slavery does not require the importation of new victims to repair the wastes of mortality, it sanctions a slave trade in some of its features more revolting than that which has so long desolated Africa, which all men indignantly condemn, and the nations of Europe and America have agreed to punish.

As slavery violates a fundamental law of man's nature, so it expressly contravenes the revealed will of God. That will requires that every man should love his neighbour as himself. Now "love worketh no ill to his neighbour," neither to his person, his property, nor his life. It respects them all. It does more: it endeavours as opportunity presents, to advance the interests and enlarge the happiness of all mankind, without distinction of race, or clime, or colour. Its office and its delight is to instruct the ignorant—to relieve the oppressed—to bind up the broken hearted—to proclaim liberty to the captive, and the opening of the prison doors to them that are bound. It is in every respect the opposite of slavery.

But it may be said that the Divine law sanctions the principle of slavery, and only wars with its abuses. We simply deny the statement, and observe that whatever form of servitude it admitted under the Jewish dispensation, whether as the punishment of crime, or as the result of voluntary contract, it allowed no property in man, and uttered forth its most awful denunciations against the traders in the persons of men. That law, moreover, surrounded the bondsman with every possible safeguard against the tyranny and cruelty of the master, by limiting the period of his engagements, and securing instant release whenever injury was inflicted. In the lowest relation which that law permitted man to sustain towards his fellow-man, it always distinguished him from "the brutes that perish," and required that in all things he should be treated as a free, a rational, and an accountable creature. We observe further, that the servitude referred to had not its origin in a slave trade, such as that which has now existed for nearly four centuries, between Africa and the Continent and Islands of America. The slavery which now exists had its root in a crime which incurred the Divine displeasure, and drew upon it the severest penalty of His law; and the atrocious system is still fed and sustained by the same crime in one or another of its worst forms. The slave vessels of Brazil and the Spanish Colonies infest the shores of Africa for their prey, and the traffickers in men of the United States ply their unhallowed trade to procure a supply of slaves for the far south. If the horrors of the middle passage do not characterize this traffic, other horrors mark the transit of the victims from one state to another. In every slave coile, how many husbands have been torn from their reputed wives, and wives from their husbands!—for, alas! the sanctity of the marriage tie is legally unknown, and practically disregarded by the masters of slaves. How many parents from their children, and children from their parents! The fetters which bind their limbs are light, compared with the sorrows that break their hearts. All of these slaves, men, women, and children, are innocent of crime. Contrary to justice, humanity, and religion, they have been subjected to a merciless despotism, despoiled of their rights, and deprived of hope. Some of these, it may be, have had their hearts melted by the grace of the gospel, and have become the disciples of Him who came to redeem men "from all iniquity," and these, too, have been put up for sale in the common market-place, and their price enhanced by their being Christians. What man with the feelings of a man, what Christian with the principles becoming a Christian, but must shudder at the daring impiety which can expose for sale, to the highest bidder, beings created "in the image of God," and redeemed by the precious blood of the Saviour; and what man, what Christian will fail to use his most earnest and unflinching exertions to terminate a system which outrages all that is sacred in man's nature, and all that is righteous in God's law.

Under this criminal system multitudes of the African race have been murdered and enslaved, and millions of that race and its descendants are yet retained within its iron grasp, and the important question arises, "How is it to be dealt with?" Our reply is brief and plain: if you have the power, "abolish it immediately and completely." If you have not the power, "seek its immediate and entire abolition." Accept no excuse for delay. Allow of no apology for its continuance. SLAVERY IS A SIN AGAINST GOD, AND OUGHT THEREFORE TO BE INSTANTLY ABANDONED AND ABOLISHED. To maintain any other doctrine were treason against the Most High, and an outrage on every principle of sound morals, for no modification of slavery can alter or destroy its original and essential iniquity, and no amelioration of its character can justify its existence.

But it may be said that slavery is the creature of law, and what the law makes property is property. This is the plea of the slaveholder; but we utterly repudiate and deny the impious assumption. The laws of nature and of God are paramount and universal, and we assert, that no legislative body, however constituted, possess the moral competency to condemn by law the innocent to punishment, to convert robbery into justice, or to make men property. On this plea also the slaveholder rests his right to compensation in the event of emancipation, and unhappily not a few think him entitled to it. In the mouth of the poor slave, who has become the victim of this unrighteous law, the plea were just, for who shall compensate him for the years he has toiled under the coercion of the whip, for his children sold away to strangers, and for the debasement and cruelty to which he has been subjected. But however the question of compensation may be disposed of, it is clear that the freedom of the slave ought not to depend on its payment. His claim to be considered in this great matter is "prior in time, paramount in title, and superior in equity" to that of the slaveholder. Liberty, immediate, absolute, unconditional liberty, is his right, and to deny him this is sovereign injustice.

It may be further alleged, that the slaves for whose rights we so earnestly contend, are unfit for freedom, and that therefore means must be taken to prepare them for it. But how can the preparation here contended for take place under the system of slavery. It is slavery which has debased them, and yet it is in slavery they are to be prepared for the enjoyment of liberty! No; the best, the only preparation for freedom is freedom. But in point of fact the slaves are fit for freedom; and the best proof is this that, whether as agriculturists or artisans, they have not only sustained themselves but have enriched their masters. They want neither the skill nor the ability to care for themselves. All they want is the unfettered use of their limbs; the free use of their minds; unrestrained access to the fountains of knowledge; in common with their fellow-men; and the protection of equal and just laws, to become an honourable and useful part of the body politic. And to this they are entitled, without stint and without delay.

We touch not the question, what would be the effect of emancipation on the production of this or that particular article of commerce, for we dare not place in the balance the liberty of the slave and the products of his coerced labour, which were, to use the forcible language of Burke, "to weigh in scales hung up in a shop of horrors, so much actual crime against so much contingent profit, and after putting in and out weights, declaring that the balance was on the side of the profits." No! whatever becomes of the profits, the balance must ever be on the side of justice.

The slave, whether lashed to his toil on the sugar estates of Cuba and Brazil, or in the cotton fields of the United States; whether forcibly wrenched from his native soil by the hand of violence, or bred to the sad inheritance of slavery in the land of his birth, is entitled to the sympathy and aid of every freeman; and whether we consider the horrible effects of slavery on its victims or on their oppressors, or the obstacles it opposes to the progress of civilization and religion in the world, we have the most powerful motives presented to us for promoting in every legitimate way, its IMMEDIATE AND ENTIRE ABOLITION.

From the London Friend.

ELIZABETH FRY.

We have to record the decease, on the 13th of 10th month, 1845, of Elizabeth Fry, aged nearly 66.

This beloved and honoured friend had passed several weeks at Ramsgate, where her husband and some of her family had expected to spend with her the ensuing winter. She had appeared to be gradually recovering from the effects of a lengthened and severe illness, and for about twelve months past has been frequently able to attend meetings; in which, as well as on many less public occasions, she was led with much sweetness and gospel authority, to speak of the things that relate to the kingdom of God, and to testify to the unchanging goodness and faithfulness of that gracious Redeemer, whom she had long loved and served. She was, in a very solemn and impressive manner, engaged in this weighty service during the last week of her earthly sojourn. On the evening of Seventh day, the 11th, she became affected with slight symptoms of paralysis. During that night she had some sleep, yet at intervals appeared to be very ill, and early in the morning of First-day, she alluded to the conflict which nature then endured, adding, "but I am safe." Sometime afterwards she uttered the petition, "Oh, dear Lord, keep and help thy servant," after which all mental consciousness appeared to subside, and about four o'clock on the following morning her spirit ascended, as we reverently believe, to its mansion of glory. Her remains were interred at Barking on the 20th, on which occasion a large and solemn meeting was held. Of her it may be truly said, that whilst her "witness is in heaven," and her "record upon high," it is also inscribed in living characters of veneration and love, on the hearts of thousands of varied station, name and country, to whom through submission to the effectual operation of the grace of God, she was made a ministering spirit; comforting the mourners, warning the careless, instructing the ignorant, and, in strains of heavenly invitation, beseeching all to come and partake of the waters of life. Being led by the power and love of Him, "who came to seek and to save that which was lost," she yielded her spirit to comfort the multiplied forms of human woe, not shrinking even from willing sympathy with that awful gloom that envelopes the soul of the desponding sinner, trembling on the verge of the fathomless gulf; and she was made the blessed instrument of directing many of these to that Almighty Saviour, whose hand of mercy was still extended to pluck these brands from the burning.

May the influence of that divine compassion which was so eminently infused into the heart of this devoted servant of Christ, animate many who survive, to "go and do likewise."

TRUTH.

It is melancholy to consider the impediments which truth encounters on its first appearance. A large portion of mankind, poising themselves on the flagitious fallacy, that whatever is, is right, avert their countenances from all that is inconsistent with established usage. I have already, in another part of this address, set forth the superiority of principle to any human example; I would here repeat that the practice of nations can be no apology for a system [war] which is condemned by such principles as I have now considered. Truth enters the world like a humble child, with few to receive her; it is only when she is grown in years and stature, and the purple flush of youthful strength beams from her face, that she is sought and wooed. It has been thus in all ages. Nay, more; there is often an irritation excited by her presence; and men who are kind and charitable, forget their kindness and lose their charity towards the unaccustomed stranger. It was this feeling which awarded a dungeon to Galileo when he declared that the earth moved round the sun; which neglected the great discovery of the circulation of the blood by Harvey; and which bitterly opposed the divine philanthropy of Clarkson when he first denounced the wickedness of the slave trade. But the rejected truths of to-day shall become the chief corner-stones to the next generation.—Sumner's Oration.

LAFAYETTE.

Extract of a letter from Thomas Clarkson, to H. G. Chapman, dated, "Playford Hall near Ipswich, Oct. 3, 1845."

"One of the dearest friends I ever had was General Lafayette—I was with the General often, and corresponded with him after his coming out of his dungeon at Olmutz; but the first time I knew him was when I was in Paris, the year after the French revolution, on the subject of the slave trade, and I assisted him materially. He was decidedly as uncompromising an enemy to the slave trade and slavery, as any man I ever knew. He freed all his slaves in French Cayenne, who had come to him by inheritance in 1786, and showed me all his rules and regulations for his estates when they were emancipated. I was with him no less than four different times in Paris. He was a real gentleman of soft and gentle manners. I have seen him put out of temper, but never at any time except when slavery was the subject. He has said frequently, "I would never have drawn my sword in the cause of America, if I could have conceived that thereby I was founding a land of slavery."

WAYLAND'S VIEWS ON WAR.

"Let us suppose a nation to abandon all means, both of offence and of defence, to lay aside all power of inflicting injury, and to rely for self-preservation solely upon the justice of its own conduct, and the moral effect which such a course of conduct would produce upon the consciences of men. How would such a nation procure redress of grievances? and how would it be protected from foreign aggression?"

"I. Of redress of grievances. Under this head would be comprehended violation of treaties, spoliation of property, and ill-treatment of its citizens. I reply,

"1. The very fact that a nation relied solely upon the justice of its measures, and the benevolence of its conduct, would do more than any thing else to prevent the occurrence of injury. The moral sentiment of every human community would rise in opposition to injury inflicted upon the just, the kind, and the merciful. Thus, by this course, the probabilities of aggression are rendered as few as the nature of man will permit.

"2. But suppose injury to be done. I reply, the proper appeal for moral beings upon moral questions, is not to physical force, but to the consciences of men. Let the wrong be set forth, but be set forth in the spirit of love; and in this manner, if in any, will the consciences of men be aroused to justice.

"3. But suppose this method to fail. Why, then, let us suffer the injury. This is the preferable evil of the two. Because they have injured us a little, it does not follow that we should injure ourselves much. But it will be said, what is then to become of our national honour? I answer, first, if we have acted justly, we surely are not dishonoured. The dishonour rests upon those who have done wickedly. I answer again, national honour is displayed in forbearance, in forgiveness, in requiting faithlessness with fidelity, and grievances with kindness and good-will. These virtues are surely as delightful and as honourable in nations as in individuals.

"But it may be asked, what is to prevent repeated and continued aggression? I answer, first, not instruments of destruction, but the moral principle which God has placed in the bosom of every man. I think that obedience to the law of God, on the part of the injured, is the surest preventive against the repetition of injury. I answer, secondly, suppose that acting in obedience to the law of benevolence will not prevent the repetition of injury, will acting upon the principle of retaliation prevent it? This is really the true question. The evil tempers of the human heart are allowed to exist, and we are inquiring in what manner shall we suffer the least injury from them; whether by obeying the law of benevolence, or that of retaliation? It is not necessary, therefore, to show, that by adopting the law of benevolence we shall not suffer at all, but that, by adopting it, we shall suffer less than by the opposite course; and that a nation would actually thus suffer less upon the whole, than by any other course, cannot, I think, be doubted by any one who will calmly reflect upon the subject.

"II. How would such a nation be protected from external attack and entire subjugation? I answer, by adopting the law of benevolence, a nation would render such an event in the highest degree improbable. The causes of national war are, most commonly, the love of plunder, and the love of glory. The first of these is rarely, if ever, sufficient to stimulate men to the ferocity necessary to war, unless when assisted by the second. And by adopting as the rule of our conduct the law of benevolence, all motive arising from the second cause is taken away. There is not a nation in Europe that could be led on to war against a harmless, just, forgiving and defenceless people.

"But suppose such a case really should occur, what are we then to do? I answer, suffer injury with forgiveness and love, looking up to God, who, in his holy habitation, is the Judge of the whole earth. And if it be said, we shall then all be subjected and enslaved? I answer again, have wars prevented men from being subjected and enslaved? Is there a nation on the continent of Europe that has not been overrun by foreign troops several times, even within the present century? And still more, is it not most commonly the case, that the very means by which we repel a despotism from abroad, only establishes over us a military despotism at home? Since, then, the principle of retaliation will not, with any certainty, save a country from conquest, the real question, as before, is, by obedience to which law will a nation be most likely to escape it, by the law of retaliation, or that of benevolence? It seems to me that a man who will calmly reflect, can have but little doubt on this matter.

"But I go still farther. The Scriptures teach us that God has created men, both as individuals and as societies, under the law of benevolence; and that he intends this law to be obeyed. Societies have never yet thought of obeying it in their dealings with each other; and statesmen would generally consider the allusion to it as puerile. But this alters not the law of God, nor the punishment which he inflicts upon nations for the violation of it. This punishment I suppose to be war. I believe aggression from a foreign nation to be the intimation from God that we are disobeying the law of benevolence, and that this is his mode of teaching nations their duty, in this respect, to each other. So that aggression seems to me to be in no manner a call to retaliation and injury, but rather a call to special kindness and good will. And still farther, the requiting evil with good tends just as strongly to the cessation of all injury, in nations as in individuals. Let any man reflect upon the amount of pecuniary expenditure, and the awful waste of human life, which the wars of the last hundred years have occasioned, and then I will ask him whether it be not self-evident, that the one-hundredth part of this expense and suffering, if employed in the honest effort to render mankind wiser and better, would, long before this time, have banished wars from the earth, and rendered the civilized world like the garden of Eden?

"If this be true, it will follow that the cultivation of a military spirit is the cultivation of a great curse to a community; and that all means, both of offence and defence, are worse than useless, inasmuch as they aggravate the very source of the evil, the corrupt passions of the human heart, by the manner in which they ineffectually attempt to check the evil itself.

"I am aware that all this may be called visionary, romantic, and chimerical. This, however, neither makes it so, nor shows it to be so. The time to apply these epithets will be, when the justness of their application has been proved. And if it be said, these principles may all be very true, but you can never induce nations to act upon them; I answer, this concession admits that such is the law of God. If this be the case, that nation will be the happiest and the wisest which is the first to obey it. And if it be said, it would be wisest and best to obey the law of benevolence, but men will never obey it, I answer, here is manifestly the end of the argument. If we show men what is wisest and best, and according to the will of their Creator, we can do no more. If they disobey it, this is a matter to be settled between them and their God. It remains, however, to be seen, whether God will or will not cause his laws to be obeyed; and whether Omniscience and Omnipotence have not the means of teaching his creatures submission to his will?—Elements of Moral Science.

The following beautiful anecdote from the second series of Lydia Maria Child's Letters from New York, furnishes an instructive illustration of the views above expressed:

"I have somewhere read of a regiment ordered to march into a small town and take it. I think it was in the Tyrol; but wherever it was, it chanced that the place was settled by a colony who believed the Gospel of Christ, and proved their faith by works. A courier from a neighbouring village informed them that troops were advancing to take the town. They quietly answered, 'If they will take it, they must.' Soldiers soon came riding in, with colours flying, and fife piping their shrill defiance. They looked round for an enemy, and saw the farmer at his plough, the blacksmith at his anvil, and the women at their churns and spinning-wheels. Babies crowded to hear the music, and boys ran out to see the pretty trainers, with feathers and bright buttons, 'the harlequins of the nineteenth century.' Of course none of these were in proper position to be shot at. 'Where are your soldiers?' they asked. 'We have none,' was the brief reply. 'But we have come to take the town.' 'Well, friends, it lies before you.' 'But is there nobody here to fight?' 'No; we are all Christians.'

"Here was an emergency altogether unprovided for; a sort of resistance which no bullet could hit; a fortress perfectly bomb-proof. The commander was perplexed. 'If there is nobody to fight with, of course we cannot fight,' said he. 'It is impossible to take such a town as this.' So he ordered the horses' heads to be turned about, and they carried the human animals out of the village as guiltless as they entered, and perchance somewhat wiser.

"This experiment on a small scale indicates how easy it would be to dispense with armies and navies, if men only had faith in the religion they profess to believe. When France lately reduced her army, England immediately did the same; for the existence of one army creates the necessity for another, unless men are safely ensconced in the bomb-proof fortress above mentioned."

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

Bills for the abolition of Capital Punishment have been introduced into the Legislatures of Tennessee and Ohio.

The House of Representatives in Indiana has, by a large majority, passed a bill authorizing juries to direct, at their discretion, imprisonment for life or, capital punishment; and little doubt was felt that it would pass the Senate also.

POETRY.

For the Non-Slaverholder.

KEEP TO THE RIGHT!

Find no other after Truth!
Keep steadily to the right—
From the day dawn of thy youth
To the closing (in of Night)

Torn and made for Folly,
List not to Pleasure's call,
Lost Self-Indulgence slowly
With evil links fatal.

Instant in Truth's reception
Trace Error to its source,
With Childlike's pure perception,
And Manhood's moral force.

Still keep thy vision single,
To Duty's pointings true,
Nave false expedients in light,
Which but perplex the view.

There's naught, aside from Duty
And Truth, has power to bless,
There's no intrinsic beauty,
Apart from holiness.

Though desolate and lonely,
Brine-torn, way-worn and weary,
Though Truth's own beams seem only
To show the path how dreary,

Keep firm! those Truth-beams given
In momentary glances
Are messengers from Heaven
To add thy safe advances.

Ever true on I, though sadness
Oppress thy soul to sea,
The multitude, in madness,
To falsehood bend the knee,

Though myriads round thee trample
On purity and love,
Guard well thy one example—
To God thy faith approve!

What though no sympathizer
Join thee in Duty's shrine,
Though cherished friends and wisest
Thy fellowship decline,

To their own master leaning
Those whom thou canst not win,
Doubt not the undecaying,
The Mentor voice within.

Swiftly thy years glide o'er thee,
Nor will thy moments stay—
Thy task is set before thee,
Thy term is Manhood's day!

To meet the ill besetting
Thy day shall unpleas'd,
If that thy moments fleeting Escape not unseized.

Keep to the right unflinching,
With unquarred eye and heart—
Keep to the right unaltering
Though valiant saints depart.

Though life's meridian glory
May seem to pass in vain,
Though Evening's shades come o'er thee
Ere thou thy end attain.

Tell on—the work's the wages!—
Thou canst not miss reward!
Who earnestly engages
Finds not the service hard.

Wrestle to win the blessing, Unwearied in well doing,
With faith each sinew bracing,
Though faint, yet still pursuing.

Death shall not come with sadness
And disappointments sting,—
But thy last days, with gladness,
Thy heart's desire may bring.

W. J. A.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

INVITATION.

Friends desiring to become members of the "Free Produce Association of Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting," are invited to send their names to—
GEO. W. TAYLOR, Sec'y,
No. 50 North 4th St.

CONTRIBUTIONS.

Those who feel disposed to assist the Free Produce Association in procuring and manufacturing free cotton, and in opening a store for the sale of free goods, will please contribute either in the way of a loan without interest, or donations to their fund for those objects. Such contributions will be received by either of the undersigned.

ELIHU PICKERING,
SAMUEL ALLINSON, JR.,
THOMAS WISTAR, JR.,
SAMUEL RHODES,
GEO. W. TAYLOR.

Committee
on Finance.

HENRY LONGSTRETH, Bookseller, Publisher and Stationer, No. 347 Market St. Philadelphia, has constantly on hand a large assortment of School, Juvenile, and Miscellaneous Books, and all kinds of Stationery, which he will furnish wholesale and retail at very low prices. He has published a number of very valuable works, which would be very suitable for gratuitous distribution by Tract Associations and private benevolent individuals; among them are brief account of William Bush, brief account of the late Elizabeth Fry; the Love Conquest, Sumner's Oration on Peace, Porteus on Christian Revelation; also Thoughts on Habit and Discipline, Life in the Insect World, Geographical, Historical, and other Lessons for memory.

For sale as above, Portrait of the late William Allen, and Jonathan Dymond.

THE NON-SLAVERHOLDER is published on the first Fourth day of the week in each month, at One Dollar per annum, payable in advance, or six copies to one address for five dollars. It may be proper here to remark that pecuniary profit forms no part of our object, and that the whole amount of subscriptions which may be received after paying the expense of publication, will be devoted to the cause of emancipation.
ABRAHAM L. PENNOCK, SAMUEL RHODES and GEORGE W. TAYLOR, Editors.

Subscriptions and payments received by HENRY LONGSTRETH, Publisher, No. 347 Market St. Philadelphia.

By decision of the Postmaster General, the Non-Slaverholder is subject to newspaper postage only.

PRINTED AT

Merrilow & Thompson's Book and Job Office,
No. 7 Carter's Alley.

THE
NON-SLAVERHOLDER.

"Whoso gives the motive, makes his brother's sin his own."

VOL. I.]

PHILADELPHIA, THIRD MONTH, 1842.

[NO. 3.]

ASSOCIATED ACTION.

From the British and Foreign A. S. Reporter.

We direct attention to a paper in our present number, entitled Manufacture of Articles from Free-Grown Cotton. It consists of an address, signed by several of the most distinguished friends of the anti-slavery cause, on the importance of discouraging the culture of cotton by the labour of slaves, and contains the very gratifying announcement that "an attempt is being made in the country to obtain a supply of articles manufactured exclusively from cotton the produce of free labour." Some highly respectable manufacturers, the address further states, have shown themselves willing to aid in carrying out this design, and, from our knowledge of the parties referred to, we declare our full conviction that they will do it in perfect good faith, so that the genuineness of the article may be entirely depended on. We anticipate that this will be a highly gratifying announcement to the British public at large, and we warmly congratulate upon it all friends to the abolition of slavery and the slave-trade. This blow at the atrocious slave-system of the United States will be eminently acceptable to them, and will not fail to secure their prompt and active concurrence. It will be but a repetition of the effort so vigorously and so successfully made in former years to diminish the use of slave-grown sugar, and it will be free from some of the difficulties by which that effort was attended. Cotton goods for which the slave has not toiled will be to multitudes, not only a new, but a most attractive luxury, and the extensive use of them will be a most serious and impressive warning to the slaveholders of the United States.

MANUFACTURE OF ARTICLES FROM FREE-GROWN COTTON.

To the friends of the abolition of the Slave-Trade and Slavery.

It is cause for devout thankfulness to the Almighty, that, by his blessings on the efforts of those who laboured for the abolition of the Anglo-

African slave-trade and of British colonial slavery, those dreadful evils have both been abolished by law. We can and do rejoice, that the shores of Africa can no longer be infested with impunity, by the man-stealer from our country; that nearly 800,000 of our fellow subjects, once held as slaves in the British colonies, have been emancipated; and that millions who were lately bondmen in British India are now legally free.

These gratifying and cheering results of past labours should lead us to pursue with increased energy what remains to be done in the great work of emancipation, beyond the limits of the British empire. Let none hastily, and without due consideration of the subject, conclude that British abolitionists can do little or nothing to hasten the termination of slavery, in countries subject to foreign rule. We believe there are many ways in which this may be done. Among these, we may refer to the practicability of calling the attention of persons in foreign lands to the crime of slavery, and to those dreadful evils which are inseparable from its existence. We may also point out to them the duty, the safety, and the advantages of emancipation. But we desire, at present, to direct attention to one painful fact, connected with the establishment and increase of foreign slavery, and to state the course which we think should be adopted, both in order to avoid a continued implication in the crime, and to discourage a system which we so strongly reprobate.

It can, we believe, be clearly shown, that American slavery is principally supported by the demand of Great Britain for the cotton of the United States. Allow us, then, briefly to state the extent and some of the revolving circumstances of the slave system in America, and to adduce proof of the assertion, that the people of England are largely implicated in its encouragement.

The slave population of the United States of America may be estimated at 2,800,000. This large number of our fellow-men, whose right to liberty is no less sacred than our own, are cruelly coerced to toil for the benefit of others. With worse than savage barbarity, the marriage relation among these victims of oppression is not recognized by law; hence those who morally sustain the relation of husbands and wives are often separated for life, by the sale of one or both, at the will of their "owner," to places distant from each other. The ties of parent and child are equally disregarded, as might be expected from those who scruple not to sever the conjugal relation. In addition to this disregard of the social rights and of the common feelings of humanity, slaves are debarred from an acquaintance with even the rudiments of knowledge, lest they should thereby become acquainted with their wrongs, and learn how to escape from them. To teach a slave to read is punishable with severe penalties, and in one slave state, (Louisiana,) death is the legal penalty for a second offence. For attempting to escape from bondage, the laws of all the slave states allow the life of the slave to be taken by the pursuers, if he cannot otherwise be secured; and imprisonment or death is the penalty inflicted on those who aid a slave in his escape from bondage.

The American domestic slave-trade, which is carried on between the various slave states, is in some of its features too revolting for detail. By this trade it has been estimated that no less than 70,000 persons are annually sold, the greater portion taken from the place of their birth to more fertile regions, and to severer toil, and in a multitude of instances, subjected to those cruel separations of the nearest domestic ties to which we have before alluded. To all who recognize the principle that to hold an innocent fellow-being in slavery is criminal in the sight of God, we need scarcely say, that it is a Christian duty to avoid, as far as possible, all participation in, or encouragement of, the crime.

In stating our belief that the consumers of articles produced by slave labour are accessories to the maintenance of the whole system of which some features have been described, we advance no new doctrine. During the early struggle for the abolition of the slave-trade, in the latter part of the last century, the friends of that cause, as we have been informed, published and circulated tens of thousands of copies of a small tract recommending the disuse of sugar, at that time exclusively produced by slave-labour. In this tract we think it was satisfactorily shown, that a small number of families, by their ordinary consumption of sugar, afforded the motive for the removal of one slave from Africa, and that, consequently, by abstinence from sugar on the part of a considerable number of families, the ravages of the slave-trade might be expected to be materially lessened. Thomas Clarkson, in his "History of the Abolition of the Slave-trade," estimates the number of persons in Great Britain who voluntarily abandoned the use of sugar at the period to which we refer, at 300,000. In addition to the reasons that have been already named for substituting, as much as possible, free-grown for slave-grown produce, it is manifest that in so doing, the subject of slavery would be much more frequently brought under the notice of our countrymen, and a standing protest be held up against it.

We have already stated, in concurrence with the testimony of some of the most eminent friends of the slave in the United States, and undeniable facts, that the demand for cotton of that country in Great Britain has been a means of perpetuating and extending slavery in America. Shortly after the declaration of American independence, there was much ground to hope that slavery would not long exist in the Union. The tide of public opinion, which had already led to acts for the abolition of slavery in several of the northern states, was directed with considerable force against it; there were at that time few articles of export produced by slaves in the states of great pecuniary value. In 1790, the number of slaves was 657,000, and the cotton exported, 189,000 lbs. In 1843, the number of slaves was estimated at 2,847,810; the cotton exported was 1,081,919,000 lbs.; and unless the most vigorous means be used to stay this mighty evil, it is impossible to calculate what may be its future extension. Shall we then continue to uphold and furnish an inducement for the maintenance of this vast system of crime and misery which we profess to deplore and abhor? Humanity, justice, and religion, forbid us so to do; and we therefore confidently cherish the hope that, as one means of discountenancing slavery, many of our countrymen and countrywomen will now be found willing and determined, as far as in them lies, to relinquish the use of American slave-grown cotton. Nor will they, we trust, be less resolute in reference to other articles, the produce of slave-labour, among which we may specially reckon Carolina rice and tobacco in all its forms.

By such a course as the above, (which we strongly recommend,) they will not only individually perform that which appears to be a manifest duty, but will encourage the efforts of those friends of the slave in America who deem it right thus to act. The number of these is, we learn, decidedly on the increase. We are glad to be able to inform those into whose hands this may fall, that an attempt is being made in this country to obtain a supply of articles manufactured exclusively from cotton the produce of free labour. It has been ascertained that some highly respectable manufacturers are willing to aid in carrying out the wishes of some friends of the anti-slavery cause in this country, in making such an article, which will be distinguished by a mark, to show its genuineness. In the first instance, the number of articles produced, will be small; but, if encouragement be given to the attempt, a greater variety will hereafter be manufactured and offered for sale.

It has been already ascertained that the members of several anti-slavery societies to whom this subject has been submitted, cordially sympathize in the object it recommends.

We respectfully commend the subject to the consideration of the friends of the cause generally. It is, perhaps, unnecessary to add, that those who promote the object have no intention of deriving a profit themselves from the sale of free labour articles. They may be exposed to some loss, and will be glad if any of their friends incline to share with them the risk of the experiment.

Before we close this appeal, we deem it proper to state, that whilst we consider it a duty to abstain as far as possible from the use of articles produced by the labour of slaves, as one means of discounting a wicked system, we deem it no less incumbent upon us to persevere in the use of those other moral means, which, in our opinion, should be unceasingly employed until slavery shall be every where utterly abolished.

JOSEPH J. GURNEY, Norwich.

GEORGE THOMAS, } Bristol.

JOSEPH EATON, }

JOSEPH STURGE, Birmingham.

G. W. ALEXANDER, London.

First Month (January) 1st, 1846.

COMMUNICATIONS.

LETTER FROM WILLIAM JAY.

BEDFORD, 9th Oct. 1845.

Absence from home has prevented me from returning an earlier reply to your letter asking information respecting the state of slavery in Egypt, and how far Egyptian cotton can be regarded as free produce.

A traveller should be cautious how he draws general conclusions from his own cursory observations. I was not more than three weeks in Egypt, and did not ascend the Nile higher than Cairo. As far as I could judge, there are but few slaves in Egypt. I visited the slave market in Alexandria and also in Cairo. In the former there were, I think, five, and in the latter, fifteen, for sale. I was told, however, that there are generally more in summer. The great mass of the population are Arabs, and they are too poor to own slaves. My impression is, that the slaves are usually domestics, and confined chiefly to the families of the Turkish residents. The agricultural labourers appeared to me to be universally Arabs.

I became acquainted with Sir Gardiner Wilkinson, long a resident in Egypt, and celebrated as an Egyptian Antiquarian. He denies that slavery, in its usual acceptation, exists in the country, but his denial is founded rather on the treatment of the slaves, than upon the tenure by which they are held. Chattel slavery undoubtedly exists in Egypt, and there is reason to believe that great cruelty is perpetrated in the seizure of natives of Nubia, and in their transportation into Egypt; but once there, they are on the whole treated kindly. A clergyman of high character, whom I met in Cairo, and who had spent many years in Egypt, assured me that Jews and Christians were bad masters compared with Musselmans!

It appeared to me that colour was not a bar to social intercourse among either the European residents, or the natives of Egypt. I saw Turks and negroes eating out of the same dish, and negro and Arab soldiers marching in the same ranks. I met coloured gentlemen and ladies at the table d'hôte, and in the drawing room of the hotel, and a coloured young lady visiting in the first English families.

A French physician of the name of Clot, high in favour with the Pasha, and raised by him to the rank of Bey, has recently published a work on Egypt. I enclose a translation of his remarks on oriental slavery, which may interest you.

On the whole, I incline to the opinion that Egyptian cotton may more justly be regarded as free produce than otherwise.

Should your Free Produce Association publish reports, &c., I will be much obliged to you, if you will favour me with copies.

Yours very respectfully,

WILLIAM JAY.

Translation.

"There is a prodigious difference between American slavery and servitude among the Orientals. With these the institution is neither cruel nor disgraceful. It does not regard the slave as a thing—a material object—as did the Roman law. It does not make him a mere article of import and export—a matter for speculation—a simple machine, in fact, whose efficiency is estimated by horse power. The West Indian [or American] sees in the negro only his corporeal value, and forgets in him the intellectual man. The Moslem, on the contrary, always beholds a man in his slave, and treats him in such a manner that we may say of oriental slavery that it is often a real adoption, and always an admission into an extended family circle.

Oriental servitude honorably contrasts with American slavery, and above all by its respect for the dignity of human nature. The slave in Turkey is not humiliated by his condition, he often proudly boasts that he is of the family of such a Bey or such a Pasha, and gives his master the title of father. He knows, moreover, that he is not permanently chained to his place by links of iron; he has before him examples in sufficient number to raise his ambition, and to swell his soul with the hope of more brilliant destinies. The celebrated mamluks of Mamelukes, which so long governed Egypt, was recruited only from slaves. Ali Bey, Memon Bey, Ibrahim Bey, were purchased in the Bazaris. Halid Pasha and Saïd Pasha, both sons-in-law of Sultan Mahmoud, brothers-in-law of Padischah Abd-ul-Medjed, and Ministers of the Porte, had been slaves. In Egypt the superior officers are, for the most part, mamluk slaves.<sup>27</sup>

For the Non-Slaveholder.

BRITISH INTERFERENCE.

One of the reasons adduced in vindication of slavery in the United States is, that it was forced upon the people of this country while they yet stood in a colonial relation to Great Britain; another, that so long as England shall continue to interfere with slavery, out of her own limits, the effect will be to rally all our feelings of national pride and independence against her, and prevent us from the exercise of the more benevolent affections, by which, if an attempt to compel us was not made, we would be led voluntarily to do justice to the enslaved; and a third, that, after all, slavery is a very happy condition compared with that deep oppression, under the withering influence of which a large part of the British artisans and laborers groan, languish, and die!

The first of these reasons is wholly insufficient to account for the existence of slavery among a people opposed to it: much less does it excuse the subsequent continuance of the evil. The second is the argument of a man who purposely gets into a passion that he may fortify himself in the determination to persevere in wrong-doing. The third is but affirming that, two wrongs existing, the lesser of them becomes right! A fourth reason might have been added, not confessed, but yet more powerful than all the above. The people of this country, some directly and some indirectly, derive, or think they derive an advantage from the wrong, and therefore they love and cherish it. A degree of cupidity is at the bottom of every apology for this mighty evil.

When the American people chose to relinquish the luxury of tea-drinking, there was no forcing them to receive the tea sent to them by England. Had they been as disinclined to have purchased slaves, no second cargo of human chattels would have come after a refusal to buy the first. Did the people of this country really desire the abolition of slavery, they would cheerfully welcome the efforts of the British people to undo the wrongs of their former policy, and would joyously unite with them in a common effort for its general overthrow. And did we see in the condition of the British operatives privations distressing as those connected with American slavery, would it not be an additional inducement to us to put down slavery at any cost, that our nation might present to the imitation of that, and of the world, the example of a free and happy community, governed by just, equal, and beneficent laws?

That the operatives of England, and the poor of that country generally, suffer many privations, and more there than do the same class of persons here, is unquestionable. So far as this suffering results out of an overgrown population, and the great fluctuations incident to the extended commerce and manufactures of the country, under a varying foreign demand, it is difficult to perceive a remedy, other than in the paternal care of the nation, sedulously watching against this consequence, and the individual and associated philanthropy of the wealthier portions of the community. So far as such suffering is the result of political regulations there are not wanting men of clear intellect and ardent minds ready to trace the connection of cause and effect, and to seek energetically the removal of the one and thus of the other. The same beneficence which prompts them to this labor of love, calls them to the duty of seeking to remove the misery and wrongs which are connected with chattel slavery.

The principle of benevolence is but little acquainted with geographical distinctions. The world is to it as but one country, and mankind, irrespective of caste and colour, one brotherhood.

But is slavery the happy condition it has been represented to be, either for master or slave? Thomas Jefferson said of it: "The whole commerce between master and slave is a perpetual exercise of the most boisterous passions; the most unremitting despotism on the one part, and degrading submission on the other. The parent sterns, the child looks on, catches the lineaments of wrath, puts on the same airs in the circle of smaller slaves, gives loose to his worst passions, and thus nursed, educated, and daily exercised in tyranny, cannot but be stamped by it with odious peculiarities. The man must be a prodigy who can retain his manners and morals undepraved by such circumstances."

The Presbyterian Synod of Kentucky said of it: "This system licenses and produces great cruelties. Mangling, imprisonment, starvation, every species of torture may be inflicted on the slave, and he has no redress. There are now in our whole land two millions of human beings, exposed defenceless to every insult and every injury, short of maiming or death, which their fellow men may choose to inflict. They suffer all that can be imposed by wanton caprice, by grasping avarice, by brutal lust, by malignant spite, and by insane anger. Their happiness is the sport of every whim and the prey of every passion that may occasionally, or habitually, infest the master's bosom. If we could calculate the amount of woe endured by ill-treated slaves, it would overwhelm every compassionate heart—it would move even the obdurate to sympathy."

Almost endless is the Southern testimony which could be offered, showing the degradations and cruelties to which the miserable victims of slavery are reduced. Who can doubt them, that reflects on the inevitable tendency of irresponsible power? Who does not feel that with that power he would himself be a tyrant? Is there then to be found an Englishman under the broad canopy of Magna Charta, suffering the torture of the American slave? Is there to be found an Englishman, borne down by whatever poverty and distress can overcome a freeman, who would for a moment seek to be relieved from his burden by becoming that slave?—Where is the Anglo-American who can believe of his kindred that there is one so base?

LOUIS.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

WHY HAS THE DESIRE FOR THE EMANCIPATION OF THE SLAVE DIMINISHED IN VIRGINIA?

It will be recollected, that in the year 1832, a spirited debate took place in the House of Delegates of Virginia, on the question of their slave population. Emancipation was then boldly advocated as the only remedy for the evils under which the State groaned, and as a measure necessary for its prosperity. The death-like sleep in which the wise men of Virginia have reposed, during the fourteen long years of toil and degradation which the poor slave has still had to suffer, has been a matter of astonishment to many reflecting minds, and has given rise to various speculations as to the cause of such remarkable retrocession, in this day of spreading light and diffusion of knowledge among mankind.

That the minds of many of her ablest statesmen were at that time enlightened far beyond what has since been apparent, few, perhaps, will question. Must we attribute this blindness, this darkness, to the neglect and rejection of the rays of truth and righteousness which then shone conspicuously on her sons? "If the light which is in thee be darkness, how great is that darkness?"

It is now an interesting inquiry, by what means that noble zeal for her own good, which broke forth on the memorable occasion alluded to, has become congealed to icy indifference. What has silenced the tongue that could declare openly, "I believe the people of Norfolk county would rejoice, could they even in the vista of time see some scheme for the gradual removal of this curse from our land." And again, "Were Africa erected into a sovereign and independent state, and recognized as a nation by the potentates of the world, to make a demand upon [our] government for her long lost and enslaved children, accompanied with a recital of all the circumstances of fraud by which they were taken from their native country, it would present a claim too strong not to be discussed—a demand too just to be denied by the free-born sons of Virginia!"* Where is the noble Marshall, who gave utterance to the following: "Wherefore, then, object to slavery? Because it is ruinous to the whites—retards improvement—roots out an industrious population—banishes the yeomanry of the country—deprives the spinner, the weaver, the smith, the shoemaker, the carpenter, of employment and support. . . . Labour of every species is disgraceful, because performed mostly by slaves. Our towns are stationary, our villages almost every where declining, and the general aspect of the country, marks the curse of a wasteful, idle, reckless population, who have no interest in the soil, and care not how much it is impoverished. Public improvements are neglected, and the entire continent does not present a region for which nature has done so much, and art so little. If cultivated by rare labour, the soil of Virginia is capable of sustaining a dense population, among whom labour would be honorable, and where the 'busy hum of men' would tell that all were happy, and that all were free."

* Speech of John A. Chandler, in the House of Delegates of Virginia, 1st mo. 17th, 1832.

It has become quite customary of late years to ascribe the stationary or rather retrograde condition of Virginia, in relation to any efforts to free herself from the burden and sin of slavery, to the agitation of the subject in the free states. Whatever may be said of the discussion of this question by northern abolitionists, it would be difficult to show, that this has in any wise checked the advance of correct views and action in Virginia, or in any of the slaveholding states.

The immediate cause of the discussion of slavery in the Virginia Legislature, may be traced to the Southampton insurrection. The question having been once opened, the delegates from the western portion of the state, whose interests were not so completely identified with the existence of slavery as those of the eastern were conceived to be, embraced the opportunity to make an effort to get rid of an intolerable burden, the fruitful source of danger to the white population personally, and destructive of the wealth and energies of the state. After a long and ardent debate, however, they were out-voted, and stigmatised as "abolitionists"—enemies to the welfare of their State—and thus the matter was put to rest. At this time, slave-labour in Virginia was manifestly unproductive; the price of slaves was low. But immediately, laws were passed in some of the planting states further South, prohibiting, after a fixed time, the introduction of slaves from other states. Dealers in slaves, under the supposition that the people of Virginia would part with their slaves at almost any sacrifice, and apprehensive, too, that the southern market would soon be closed against them, flocked into Virginia in great numbers, in search of human chattels; and such was the demand for slaves, that according to Professor Dew, in his advocacy of slavery, the price of slaves was greatly enhanced. The increased stimulus given to the growth of cotton by the demand for the raw material to supply the rapidly increasing manufactures of the northern states and of Europe, created a still increased demand for slaves, and thus an extensive internal slave-trade was carried on between the more northern of the slave states, which have thus become slave-producing states, and those further south, which are adapted to the growth of cotton. Large profits are thus realized upon the business of raising slaves, making it the interest of the slaveholders, or rather slave-breeders, of Maryland and Virginia, to keep a stock on hand for the purpose. The redundant black population thus disposed of, the apparent danger from the presence of too great numbers removed, and a profitable business created out of the circumstances of the case, we presently hear no more of the abolition of slavery in Virginia. As to the danger from insurrections, we suppose they have quieted their fears from such reflections as the following, which we take from Professor Dew's pamphlet. "No insurrection of this kind can ever occur where the blacks are so much civilized as they are in the United States. Savages and Koromantyn slaves can commit such deeds, because their whole life and education have prepared them, and they glory in the achievement; but the negro of the United States has imbibed the principles, the sentiments and feelings of the whites; in one word, he is civilized—at least comparatively; his whole education and course of life are at war with such fell deeds, &c.," pp. 113, 114. And yet this defender and advocate of slavery asserts in another place, where it seems to suit his purpose best, "The great ground upon which we shall rest our argument on this subject is, that the slaves, in both an economical and [Political] point of view, are entirely unfit for a state of freedom among the whites," p. 87. Again, "But one limited massacre is recorded in Virginia history; let her liberate her slaves, and every year you would hear of insurrections and plots, and every day would perhaps record a murder," p. 101. What these "civilized" people, who "have imbibed the principles, the sentiments, and feelings of the whites," could have in view and expect to obtain from their former masters, by cutting their throats after they had given them their freedom, we shall leave for the learned Professor to explain.

To return to our main subject; the whole explanation of the continued attachment of Virginia to the slave system, may be summed up in a few words—her supposed interest. And here let me quote Professor Dew again. "If that intelligent gentleman, from the storehouse of his knowledge, would but call up the history of the past, he would see that mere philanthropy, with all her splendid boasts, has never yet accomplished one great scheme; he would find the remark of that great judge of human nature, the illustrious author of the Wealth of Nations, that no people had the generosity to liberate their slaves until it became their interest to do so, but too true; and the philosophic page of Hume, Robertson, Stuart, and Sismondi, would inform him that the serfs of Europe have been only gradually emancipated through the operation of self interest and not philanthropy." P. 62.

Thus we have the admission of this champion of slavery, who thinks the time may never arrive for the emancipation of the slave; [see p. 130.] that the system is mainly sustained by "self interest." Do we not hence deduce an argument in favour of withdrawing our support in every practicable way from this unrighteous "institution;" including, of course, the main prop of the edifice—the consumption of the products—to obtain which alone the slave is held. Reader, refuse to give thy money for the cotton, sugar, rice and tobacco raised by slave labour, and encourage the production of those articles by freemen, and thou wilt do much to prepare the way for emancipation. Diminish materially the demand for cotton, sugar, and rice raised by slaves, and create a special demand for those articles produced by the paid labour of freemen; and soon we shall see the internal slave-trade "hide its diminished head"—slave-rearing become unprofitable, and may we not hope to enjoy the privilege even in our day, of reading again the eloquent speeches of Virginia's gifted sons, successful, we trust, in favour of the entire overthrow of this withering, blasting sin of the land.

W—N.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

WM. PENN AND SLAVERY.

Although Friends, as a body, did not see for several generations, "the result to which their own principles would fairly conduct them on the subject of slavery," so far as to induce them to cease from holding slaves, and are, even now, aiding by the most effectual means—the use of its productions—to support the iniquitous system, yet it is highly important that full justice should be awarded to those ancient worthies who, at a very early period, had their eyes opened, partially at least, on its evil and sinfulness. Wm. Penn may, undoubtedly, be classed with these; yet in Bancroft's History of the United States, a statement appeared charging him with holding slaves at the time of his death. This was made on the authority of an old resident of Pennsylvania, who erroneously stated that a slave held by Thomas Penn, had been in Wm. Penn's possession. Clear evidence of the error was published nearly two years ago, but Albert Barnes, not being aware of this fact, recently reiterated the charge in his public discourse "On the virtues and services of William Penn," referring to Bancroft as his authority. This has led to a further investigation, and a will dated 1701, made by William Penn on his leaving this country for the last time, and now in the possession of Thomas Gápin, of Philadelphia, has been published in "Friends' Weekly Intelligencer." From this, it appears that he had previously given his blacks their freedom, as an extract will show: "I give my servants John and Mary Sacher, three hundred acres between them, to James Logan, one thousand acres, and my blacks their freedom, as is under my hand already, and to old Sam 100 acres, &c."

In his last will, dated 1712, a copy of which is in the possession of George M. Justice, of this city, and by which his property descended to his family, no mention is made of any slaves, thus affording strong negative proof that he was not then a slaveholder, and it would be preposterous to suppose that he purchased any during the six subsequent years of his life. GRANVILLE.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, THIRD MONTH 4, 1846.

ADDRESS TO THE FRIENDS OF THE ABOLITION OF THE SLAVE TRADE AND SLAVERY.—When we contemplate the extent of slavery in this land—how the slaveholders have succeeded from time to time in drawing around them the fostering and sustaining power of the Federal Government, and how intimately and strongly the interests of the people of the North have become connected with the iniquity, feelings of discouragement are apt to be awakened. There are other circumstances, too, which are even more painful, and bring anguish to our souls, when we feel impelled to exercise our individual rights and duties in reference to the mighty evil. We will not, however, dwell upon these, we turn rather to the less gloomy view of the subject—and here we are cheered by many encouragements, by many indications of an increasing consciousness on the part of non-slaveholders of the responsibility which rests upon them. Let this feeling spread amongst a comparatively small minority of those who profess to be opposed to slavery, and, we believe, its profits—the "price of blood and souls of men"—will be taken away, and the system itself must perish.

It is with great satisfaction that we invite the attention of our readers to the address, under "Associated Action." Our friends in England, are "putting their shoulders to the wheel," and we anticipate important results; for our faith is strong that Divine Providence will bless His appointed means of regenerating the world—individual faithfulness to the principles of christianity.

Although the quality of East India cotton is in course of improvement, yet it is not suitable for the finer description of goods; this deficiency, however, may soon be supplied. Some of the West India cotton is good, and its cultivation has been rapidly increased. In 1842, 38,200 bales were imported into Great Britain, and in 1845, the import was 89,400 bales. From information recently received from the South, we have no doubt that arrangements may readily be made to furnish our English friends annually with thousands of bales of free labor cotton, of the best quality, from Alabama and Mississippi, known in the market as Mobile and New Orleans cotton. It will be seen that they are disposed to make the best of what they have; and a late letter from one of them says—"We have two articles in the course of preparation of cotton manufacture, and hope to have more shortly. Indeed, if you should want a supply, I hope to be able to send you two or three patterns by the next packet."

SLAVERY IN EGYPT.—We present in our present number an interesting letter from Judge Jay, written in reply to some inquiries addressed to him, for the purpose of ascertaining whether Egyptian cotton is the produce of free labor, goods manufactured of such cotton having been offered for sale in Philadelphia.

From other sources we are informed that the British government has endeavored to prevail upon the Pacha of Egypt to prohibit the "slave-hunts," and also to abolish slavery in that country, but with little prospect of success. He professes to desire the "abolition of this inhuman usage," but states it to have "been in existence 1200 years, and hence the difficulty of destroying it at once." He says, moreover, that "the people of these countries, (Africa) are savage; that they can only be drawn from their brutish state by the application of material force; that it is a good and humane work to bring them within the pale of civilization; that in future he will not recruit his army by means of slave-hunts, but in a manner accordant with the rules observed in flourishing countries, and that no soldier shall be received into it until they have been made free; and one proof of their liberty will be, that no difficulty will be placed in the way of their marrying, if they choose."

The British consul in Egypt, in a communication to the Earl of Aberdeen, dated August 1st, 1843, says, "I again reverted to the general question of slavery, and pressed the Pacha to fix some time, after which the importation of slaves into Egypt should be forbidden."

"His Highness repeated the declaration he made to Colonel Campbell, in 1837, and to myself last year, that he was personally favorable to the abolition of slavery; but that the prejudices of the higher classes were too strong on that question for him at present, to venture upon such a measure. He said, 'I once spoke to my daughter on the subject; you know that women have a great influence over men, in all countries, and I asked her why she did not employ native female servants in her Harem? she turned away her head and made me no answer. I tell you this anecdote to show you how difficult it would be to break through the habits of the higher orders, and to do away with slaves."

"I must, however, be permitted to doubt the sincerity of the Pacha's declaration that he is desirous of abolishing slavery."

"Mehemet Ali has shown on many occasions that where he has the will, he has the power to make himself obeyed, and had he been sincere in his professions, he would, in the course of six years, have taken some steps to prevent the further importation of slaves into Egypt."

A letter from Judge Jay, subsequent to that we now publish, contains the following interesting observation: "The more I learn of slavery, and the more I reflect on its character and consequences, the more thoroughly am I convinced of its utter inconsistency with the religion of Jesus Christ, and of the duty of his disciples to labor for its immediate and total abolition."

OUR COURSE.—We had hoped that our Prospectus and the Numbers of our paper already issued, would sufficiently indicate our object and intended course; but, from inquiries which have been made, we are induced to state, clearly and decidedly, that our columns will be closed against every thing of a controversial character relative to difficulties existing in our religious Society; and further, that we will exclude injudicious allusions to other religious Societies, so that yet who are opposed to slavery may read the Non-Slaverholder without offence on these grounds.

FREE GOODS.—To meet the inquiries of numerous friends, in relation to sugar and other groceries produced by free labor, we would refer them to the advertisement, in the present number, of Joel Fisher, who keeps a Store at the N. W. corner of Fifth and Cherry streets, exclusively for the sale of free goods.

POSTAGE.—Our subscribers and others who may receive our paper, are desired to call the attention of Postmasters to the fact, that it is subject to newspaper postage only—consequently, it will be sent free to all post offices not more than thirty miles from Philadelphia; beyond that distance in Pennsylvania, the postage will be one cent; and out of this State, and over 100 miles, one and a half cents.

BRITISH ABOLITION AND ABOLITIONISTS.—The last remnant of legalized slavery within the British dominions existed in the Island of Ceylon, where about four hundred persons were held in subjection. The British government has recently announced the emancipation of these by an act of the Legislative Council of Ceylon, in the Twelfth month of 1844, since confirmed and allowed by the Queen. The British people may now say in reference to their entire empire, that slaves cannot breathe within it—

"If their lungs
Receive air only, that moment they are free,
They touch our country and their shackles fall."

Practically, however, the effects of long continued slavery on the injured subjects of it, are yet to be abolished, as is also the spirit which would rechain the freeman; and these objects can only be fully effected by the universal abolition of the slaveholding system. British abolitionists are aware of this; and whilst vigilant in the performance of what they regard to be their home duties—seeking to elevate morally, socially and religiously, their recently liberated fellow subjects, and striving to restrain the cupidity of their former proprietors—they look throughout the world for places and opportunity to bring the full weight and influence of British sentiment in favor of the total abolition of slavery.

In performing these duties, they have felt the importance of keeping alive, and increasing where they could do so, the anti-slavery feeling of the nation. Deputations of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society have, in this view, been recently holding public meetings in various parts of the kingdom, addressing large audiences and receiving a hearty acceptance from the people composing them. Meetings originating in the action of local associations have also been held. At one of these, convened at the City Hall, Glasgow, in the First month last, an important part was performed by Frederick Douglass, the eloquent fugitive from American slavery. His speech, occupying nearly four of the capacious columns of the Glasgow Argus, was received, with great applause, by a large and respectable assemblage of people capable of appreciating worth and talent under any complexion of the external covering. The freedom with which the addresses delivered and resolutions adopted at such meetings, are published in England, is in remarkable contrast with the rejection of all such intelligence by the American newspapers.

A new series of the Anti-Slavery Reporter, conducted under the sanction of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, and now issued monthly, was commenced with the present year. We place under our head of "Selections a "retrospect of the anti-slavery cause," taken from the first number of that Journal. Our readers will unquestionably regard it as an important and interesting document. We consider it, however, as defective in this respect, that it overlooks a highly important struggle, in the result of which humanity had much occasion to rejoice; that which issued in the establishment of duties, making a broad distinction between free and slave grown sugars, and nearly inhibitory of the latter. Had the policy of admitting those sugars without this discrimination, and at low rates of duty, prevailed, the increased demand for sugar by a population of twenty-five millions, consequent on a reduction of price, would have carried to Africa innumerable calamity. We were about to enquire—do our English friends despair of the ability or inclination of their government to sustain this great moral distinction, and therefore think it best to say nothing on the subject?—when, with the other important intelligence brought by the steam ship Cambria, came the announcement of the British Premier's financial scheme, based on the general principle of free trade, but excluding slave grown sugar, "still regarded as an abomination," from the benefit of this principle. Recent events have given to that minister an amount of popularity which it has been the lot of few statesmen to acquire, so that the continuance of this discrimination may be considered as certain.

This and other points of great interest to the anti-slavery cause, are adverted to in the following valuable letter, for giving publicity to which, we trust, no apology will be necessary, either to the writer or reader.

27 New Broad Street, }
London, 3d Feb., 1845. }

MY DEAR SIR,—By an accident for which I cannot account, I have mislaid the letter you favored me with by the last packet, and am therefore unable to reply to it in detail. Should I be fortunate enough to recover it, which I hope may be the case, I shall not fail to address you on those points I may omit in the present communication.

On the subject of free labor produce, I am happy to inform you, that several of our valued friends in this country have issued an Address, which appeared in our January number, [British and Foreign A. S. Reporter,] in which they indicate the probability that very soon free-labor cotton goods will be manufactured and on sale, for the use of those who would not help the slaveholder by dealing in his produce. As you are probably aware, the excellent friends who have commenced this movement are Quakers; and my earnest hope is that the desire of their hearts may be fully realized. There is an excellent feeling upon the subject in this country, so far as I am acquainted; my only fear is that the supply will not be equal to the demand. Your statistics are extremely interesting, and will gratify many.

In reference to books, pamphlets and papers, bearing on the subject in which you take so deep an interest, I shall keep you supplied. The information we have recently received from India, is of the most gratifying character. There can be no doubt that cotton, equal or nearly so to your bowed Georgia, can be grown in the Provinces of Dharwar, for one penny per pound. The chief difficulty experienced is in bringing it to market. I have lately had in my hands a letter from one of the American cultivators there, who speaks in the highest terms of the soil, and the cotton, when properly cultivated, picked and packed. I have some reason to think that our government is by no means indifferent to the facts which have been laid before them on this subject.

Late advices from Port Natal, a British settlement on the eastern coast of Africa, brings the cheering information that the cultivation of cotton by free hands, is making rapid progress, and will soon become the staple of the colony. You will understand, dear friend, that the interest I take in these facts is not national but philanthropic; for to me it would not be a question of interest at all, whence we derived our supplies, were they produced by the compensated toil of the laborers.

Our news from the British colonies is cheering—they are rapidly recovering their prosperity; not only is there a large internal consumption of the produce grown, but an increasing quantity for exportation. This year's crop of sugar is expected to be very large.

You will see by the papers which go by this packet that our government is still determined to keep out the slave grown sugars of Cuba and Brazil, while they have determined that those produced by free labor shall come in on a lower duty than they paid last year. This is extremely satisfactory.

We have a great work before us, may we be strengthened to fulfil it. The divine blessing will rest on those who, in the spirit of the Gospel, seek to diffuse its blessings among their fellow men. It grieves many of us here that the war spirit should be so much developed in the United States. Certainly nothing exists in this country answerable to it. We have need of much prayer that this scourge and crime of our race may be averted.

Your's very truly,
JOHN SCOBLE.

SELECTIONS.

RETROSPECT OF THE ANTI-SLAVERY CAUSE.

It is impossible to recur to the history of the anti-slavery cause, during the last few years, without being deeply grateful for the important triumphs which, under the divine blessing, it has achieved.

In the early part of the year 1831, it is probable that not a single leading abolitionist anticipated the overthrow of slavery in the colonial or territorial possessions of this country, during the life-time of the existing generation of slaves; and that they would have hailed with satisfaction a measure which secured to the children of such slaves the blessings of freedom on their attaining the age of twenty-one years. At that time, the colonists, confiding in their strength and political importance, were in full opposition to the British legislature and the government, in relation to the regulations for the mitigation of the system of slavery, which had been voted by the legislature, and had received the sanction of the King, as far back as 1823; and then, too, the government were indisposed to punish their contumacy, or to secure, by an appeal to the Imperial Parliament, what they had failed to obtain by concession and conciliation. Nor were the abolitionists themselves either bold or pressing in their demands; they asked simply for the amelioration of the condition of the slave population, and the gradual extinction of slavery. But in that memorable year, one portion of the body advanced the great doctrine of immediate and entire abolition, and with a decision which nothing could alter, a courage which faced all difficulties, and a zeal which knew no intermission, they sent forth their agents through the length and breadth of the land; and in a period of time which scarcely sufficed for a thorough organization, they carried the question with the public. It was universally felt, that "SLAVERY WAS A CRIME BEFORE GOD," which admitted of no delay in its extinction: and that freedom should be given to the slave, without stint or restriction. Having thus convinced the public mind, and secured the public conscience, there was but little difficulty in moving the constituencies throughout the kingdom, to exact from their representatives the advocacy of sound opinions in the House of Commons. The result was, the return of a large body of members to Parliament pledged to sustain the abolition cause. Events, in the meanwhile, had transpired in the colonies, of such a character as to arrest the attention of the government, and to compel them to action. In May, 1833, Mr., now Lord Stanley, submitted to the House of Commons his celebrated scheme of abolition, which, after undergoing a lengthened discussion, and various important modifications, went into effect on the 1st of August, 1834. It admitted the justice and expediency of abolition, but placed the whole of the slave population, above six years of age, under a system of coercion for a period of six years. It created an intermediate state of bondage, falsely called "apprenticeship," which allowed the existence of the worst features of the system of slavery, without the corresponding advantages of the promised state of freedom. It soon became obvious to those who watched the progress of the measure, that "apprenticeship" was but another name for slavery; and the facts having been laid before the public, and forced on the attention of Parliament, with the accustomed ability and energy of the leaders of the anti-slavery cause, that fruitful source of irritation, cruelty and oppression, was altogether removed.

The memorable 1st of August, 1838, witnessed the complete triumph of abolition principles, throughout the British West Indies, South America, Southern Africa, and the Indian Ocean, under circumstances as honorable to the emancipated slaves, as it was satisfactory to every true philanthropist. No crime stained the advent of freedom. No man was injured in his person or property. In his gratitude for the benefit he enjoyed, the liberated negro forgot the injuries he had received, and was prepared to return good for evil. Seven years have now passed away since the enslaved population of these dependencies of the Crown were made free; and whether we estimate the blessings of liberty by the amount of physical happiness it has bestowed, or measure it by the moral advantages it has conferred on one of the most degraded portions of mankind, we must admit that it has more than realized the most sanguine expectations of its friends. Formerly, the slave population melted away under a system of toil, privation, and punishment, too dreadful to be endured; now they increase rapidly in numbers, in property, and in influence; formerly, they were denied the blessings of education and religion; now they enjoy both, and their improvement in character is as remarkable as their increase in number.

This great work having been so happily achieved, the abolitionists directed their attention to the evil of slavery, as it had developed itself in other parts of the British empire. Year after year they brought the subject under the attention of government and of Parliament, and were gratified by the intelligence that, on the 5th of January, 1842, the Supreme Council of India had promulgated a law, that "in no part of the Straits' settlement, (including Malacca, Singapore, Penang, and Province Wellesley,) shall the status of slavery be recognized as existing by law." And "all courts and officers of law" were "prohibited from enforcing any claims founded on any supposed right of masters, in regard to slaves within the settlements aforesaid," and were "enjoined to afford protection to all persons against whom any supposed rights of slavery were attempted to be enforced. By this act, many thousands of slaves were liberated, and an atrocious slave-trade, chiefly carried on by Chinamen or Malay pirates, for the most iniquitous purposes, was suppressed.

The British Government having had the defective state of the law for the suppression of the slave-trade, so far as it related to British India, pointed out, submitted a measure to Parliament to cure the same. This remedial act having passed the legislature, received the sanction of the Crown, on the 10th of August, 1842. It provides that "all the powers vested in the governors, lieutenant-governors, and other persons exercising the authority of governors in Her Majesty's colonies and plantations, and in Her Majesty's offices there, civil and military, for the more effectual suppression of the importation of slaves into such colonies and plantations, by sea, and for the punishment of all persons guilty of the crime of introducing, or attempting to introduce, slaves to any such colonies or plantations," shall be "extended to, and vested in the respective governors, civil and military, of the several presidencies or places within the territories under the government of the East India Company." It was notorious, that slaves were every year introduced into British India from Africa; and that, owing to the different opinions entertained by the law officers of the company on the existing Acts of Parliament against the slave-trade, no proper cognizance was, or could be, taken of those criminal acts. But this law has removed all difficulties on that head, and we may hope it will be found sufficient to secure the object at which it aims.

The principle of abolition having been once recognized by the government, it became easy to apply it. We find, therefore, the Governor-General of India, Lord Ellenborough, among the instructions he gave to the conqueror of Scinde, the following, which is both interesting and important:—"The Governor-General is pleased to direct, that all Acts of Parliament for the abolition of slavery, and for the suppression of the slave-trade, shall have full force and effect in every part of Seinde, which is now, or may hereafter be, occupied by the British army." This instruction was issued on the 13th of March, 1843. How many slaves it emancipated we have no returns to show; but we are led to infer that, under the dominion of the Amears, their condition was deplorable. The instruction embraced the abolition of the slave-trade, as well as slavery. That nefarious traffic had been carried on chiefly by the subjects of the Imam of Muscat and the Soitidians, and was, at times, very considerable.

The next and greatest event took place on the 7th of April, 1843. On that memorable day an act received the sanction of the acting Governor-General in India, the Honourable William Wilberforce Bird, and the Supreme Council, by which all the slaves in the three presidencies of Bengal, Bombay, and Madras, and their dependencies, were declared free, and brought under the protection of the civil and criminal courts, and declared to be entitled to all the privileges of the Queen's subjects. This great act, which liberated millions of slaves, will be celebrated in all coming time, as one of the most noble which has characterized British rule in India. Those only who are fully acquainted with the system of slavery which prevailed in that country, with the diabolical acts and atrocious murders to which it gave rise, and with the deep and awful degradation to which it led, can duly appreciate the value and importance of its abolition. It must produce, in time, the most blessed results. A host of evils, as disgusting for their impurity as they are hateful for their impiety, will rapidly disappear. The Christian missionary can now be brought in contact with the most miserable, debased, and helpless of our race, and the holy and benign religion which he teaches win for itself new triumphs among the heathen.

Notwithstanding the stringent and comprehensive measures of the British legislature against slave-trading by British subjects, no inconsiderable number were found, both in this and in foreign countries, either directly or indirectly engaged in it. In Brazil, the Spanish and Dutch colonies, and other portions of the globe, where slavery prevailed, they were discovered holding, buying, and selling slaves. At home, there were joint-stock companies, whose capital was employed in mining operations, the labourers connected with which were slaves. These slaves had been purchased by agents representing these companies, who were continually supplying the wastes of morality, or the exigencies of the companies arising from extended operations, by new purchases. It having been considered doubtful whether the consolidated Slave-trade Act of 1824 reached these cases, a measure was enacted in 1843, which extended its provisions to British subjects, "whosoever residing or being, and whether within the dominions of the British Crown, or of any foreign country." This act went into operation on the first day of November, 1843, since when it has been made unlawful for British subjects to purchase a slave, or in any way to aid or abet the slave-trade in any part of the world, under the penalty of transportation, when convicted in any court within British jurisdiction.

The same act contained an important provision, relating to a species of slavery which existed at the British settlements, on the Gold Coast, Western Africa,—the "pawn system," as it was termed. In the second clause, it is enacted, "that persons holden in servitude as pledges for debt, and commonly called 'pawns,' or by whatever other name they may be called or known, shall, for the purposes of the said Consolidated Slave-trade Act, and of an act passed in the third and fourth years of the reign of King William IV., (the Slavery Abolition Act,) and of this present act, be deemed and construed to be slaves, or persons intended to be dealt with as slaves." This is an important enactment. It is now unlawful for persons residing in the British settlements or elsewhere, to take persons in pledge, or rather in payment for debts, and to deal with them as slaves.

On the 4th day of May, 1843, the Legislative Council at the Cape of Good Hope, issued an important minute in relation to Port Natal, indicating to emigrants the conditions on which alone they would be permitted to settle on that territory. "First: that there shall not be, in the eye of the law, any distinction or disqualification whatever founded on mere distinctions of colour, origin, language, or creed; but that the protection of the law, in letter and in substance, shall be extended impartially to all alike. Secondly: that no aggression shall be sanctioned upon the natives residing beyond the limits of the colony, under any plea whatever, by any private person or body of men, unless acting under the immediate authority and orders of the government. Thirdly: that slavery, in any shape or under any modification, is absolutely unlawful as in every other part of Her Majesty's dominions." This minute was rendered necessary by the Dutch Boers having commenced a system of slavery at Port Natal, which if they could have had their way, would have given rise to a new branch of the slave-trade.

On taking possession of the Chinese island of Hong-Kong, slavery was found to prevail there. It became necessary, therefore, to abolish it, in order to bring the institutions of the new colony into harmony with British law. For this purpose, an ordinance was passed by the governor in council, Sir Henry Pottinger, on the 28th of February, 1844, to define the law relative to slavery in Hong-Kong. By this ordinance, "the laws of England prohibitory of slavery, together with the punishments and penalties provided therein, shall be in full virtue and operation, and shall be duly enforced and inflicted in the said colony." Of course the importation of slaves is equally forbidden, and subject to appropriate provisions. The enactments of such a law as this cannot fail to have the most salutary influence in China, and may, and we trust will, lead to important results.

There yet remained one spot within the limits of the British dominions, where slavery existed—the island of Ceylon. It was important that government should abolish it there also. In 1842, the great bulk of the slave population became free, by forfeiture to the Crown. The registration law had not been complied with. By this forfeiture about 37,000 slaves were put in possession of their liberty. There still remained to be emancipated in the Kandyan provinces, 379 slaves; and in reference to them, Lord Stanley, in reply to a recent communication from the Committee of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, states, "that an ordinance was enacted by the Legislative Council of Ceylon, in the month of December (1844), last, and that the ordinance has been allowed and confirmed by the Queen."

Thus has a final blow been struck at the system of slavery, in all its forms, whether existing in the colonies and settlements of Great Britain in the West Indies, South America, Western and Southern Africa, the Indian and Chinese Oceans, the Straits of Malacca, the coast of Siam, the vast territories of Hindostan, Seinde, the Tenasserim provinces, contiguous to Burmah, and Ceylon. In no part of the British Empire can a slave be legally held—in no part of the British Empire can the slave-trade be carried on—in no part of the world can a British subject now engage in this horrible traffic with impunity; and these glorious triumphs for humanity and for God, have been secured, not by the sword, but by moral, religious and pacific means only. It is now the duty of British abolitionists to watch over the victories which have been obtained, lest in any part of the British dominions their fruits be lost or unenjoyed. To them the emancipated millions look for counsel and support, in securing the practical working of the laws which have bestowed on them the precious gift of freedom.

We must not measure the great fact of the abolition of slavery throughout the entire British Empire, merely by the good, whether present or prospective, which it has, or may confer; but by the evil and crime which it has prevented. Had slavery remained undisturbed in the British colonies, what an amount of suffering, degradation, and death would have afflicted its victims! Driven to desperation by oppression, they might have filled the islands with conflagration and blood. Instead of beholding them a contented peasantry, increasing in numbers, and proving how worthy they are of the blessings they enjoy, we might have beheld them, in the uttermost of despair, bending under the yoke of the oppressor; or, conscious of their rights, in open revolt, subject to all the murderous atrocities of military law. If we turn to British India, who can calculate the value of the Act of Emancipation there? Not only does it afford a bright example to the native states, by which our territories are surrounded; but the wandering Brigand and the ruffian Thug can no longer perpetrate their evil deeds for supplying the cities and temples with female children. The market is closed to them; the demand for kidnapped children must cease; to infringe the law will entail a heavy punishment; and however much some may lament that they can no longer hold their fellow-creatures as property, millions will rejoice in the protection which the law now gives to them and to their children, and exult in their new and happy condition.

In this brief retrospect of the anti-slavery cause, we have not mentioned the names, either living or dead, of those distinguished men, who, under God, have been the chief instruments in effecting this great work. The living, with the venerable Thomas Clarkson at their head, with ripened experience, still pursue the noble object to which they have devoted themselves. Their field of operation is the world; they labour for the universal overthrow of slavery and the slave-trade; and they seek not as their reward, the praise of men. It would, however, be unjust to the memory of the departed leaders of the cause, if their names were not mentioned with honour. Death has been busy, and has taken from us the most eminent of its advocates: Granville Sharp, William Wilberforce, Andrew Thompson, James Stephen, Zachary Macarday, Sir John Jeremie, James Cropper, William Allen, and Sir Powell Buxton, are departed. As the benefactors of their race their works follow them, and are their best eulogy. Nor amongst women must we forget the honoured names of Elizabeth Heyrick, Sophia Sturge, and Elizabeth Fry. All these gave the strength of their youth, and the vigour of riper years, to the cause of the suffering and the oppressed, and have left us an example, that we should follow their steps. May the rising youth of the land catch a double portion of their spirit, and devote themselves to the completion of the great work they so nobly began!

EXCLUSION OF SLAVE-GROWN PRODUCE.

Extract of a letter from Thomas Clarkson to Joseph Sturge.

"There is another topic, on which I mean to say a few words. Our committee (of British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society,) have been censured because they have opposed the introduction of slave-grown sugar into our market, on the same terms as sugar from our colonies, where slavery has been abolished. I do most conscientiously approve of their conduct in this respect. For what was the object which they pledged themselves to the public to promote, when they were called together as a Committee? Was it not to secure, as far as they could, the abolition of slavery and the slave-trade? Now, wherever plantations are worked by slaves, they owe their existence to the slave-trade. To allow, therefore, the importation of slave-grown sugar into our market, would be to give a powerful encouragement to the slave-trade, and to spread desolation and bloodshed wider and wider in Africa—in Africa, already bleeding at every pore. Well has Lord Brougham observed, that 'by admitting the Cuba and Brazil sugar into this country, we should immediately and directly commission some scores of slave-trading vessels to assail and harry the African coast; and that, if an act of Parliament were passed for this purpose, it would be as inevitably an act for the more effectual encouragement of the African slave-trade, as if it honestly and shamelessly bore that name! Can our committee, then, after the language of such a faithful and indefatigable friend to our cause as Lord Brougham, and having at their formation pledged themselves to every legitimate practical means to suppress the trade in slaves, give such a large bonus, such a golden premium, as the diminution of duty would amount to, to continue it? But I have now the pleasure of informing you, that there is one thing which our committee can do consistently with their honor, and the original intention of the institution. They can and will, give their sanction to the opening of our market to sugar coming from any part of the world on equal terms with sugar from our own colonies, provided it be the produce of free labor. I have no doubt that if a large bonus or premium were to be offered to Cuba or Brazil, such as that of coming with their sugar into our market on equal terms with our own, there would be planters in these countries who would make a trial of free labor, on their estates. And in my opinion, it requires only a beginning to be made, to be followed up by other planters. What a bright prospect is here opened to us!—the prospect of having cheap, and yet free sugar, of having a constantly increasing supply of that article, and moreover, a constant augmentation of free, and constant diminution of slave labor."

WAR.—STATISTICS OF GREENWICH HOSPITAL.

"At present there are in this noble retreat, 2700 pensioners, of whom there are: loss of right arms 14; left do. 9; total 23. Loss of both legs 3; right do. 35; left do. 50; total 71. Loss of both eyes 52; right do. 46; left do. 50; total 148. Ruptures 525. Total maimed and ruptured 767. The above does not include any of those suffering from distortions, contractions, fractures, dislocations, or old wounds not having required amputation."—Naval and Military Gaz. Aug. 7th, 1843.

This feature in the picture of war, shocking to every humane and Christian feeling as it is, is nevertheless the most amiable trait in its sanguinary character, seeing that the inmates of this "noble retreat" are provided with the comforts and conveniences of life, which the melancholy condition to which they have been reduced, precludes them from procuring for themselves. But let us try to fill in the outline of the picture. Let us ask these 767 pitiable wrecks of fighting sailors, how many of their comrades, in all the battles in which they have taken a part, have been slain or mortally wounded,—how many widows and fatherless children have been thereby thrown destitute on the wide world, to mourn the untimely end of their relations, to whom they had naturally been looking for protection and support,—how many bright prospects had been marred, and how much distress to families had arisen from the history which we are here contemplating. Then let us turn to that "noble retreat" for disabled soldiers at Chelsea, and ask the mutilated inmates there the like question; and when we have gathered from these, and similar sources, all possible information of the miseries of war, we shall find one half had not been told us. The outward and visible effects of war may be contemplated with feelings of grief and sympathy for the surviving sufferers, but the deep, the silent, the hidden sources of distress which it has opened in the bosom of numberless individuals and families, can never be fathomed by human scrutiny; but the day is fast approaching, when a search will be made, and he in whose skirts blood is found, will have to answer the solemn query, "What hast thou done? the voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the ground!"

"Oh! why will king's forget that they are men, and men that they are brethren?" J. P.

VINDICATION OF THE APOSTLE PAUL.

An apology for the use of slave produce is sought for in the precept given by the apostle Paul to the Corinthians, respecting the use of meats dedicated to idols, and peculiar to the isolated case of idol worship. The advocates of slavery itself represent Paul as justifying it, when he sent back to Philemon his near kinsman and confidential servant, Onesimus, with directions to receive him, "not now as a servant, but above a servant, a brother beloved, both in the flesh and in the Lord," adding, "If he hath wronged thee or oweth thee ought, put that on mine account; I Paul have written it with mine own hand, I will repay it."

With equal fairness has his doctrine forbidding the use of meats offered unto idols, when the dedication was known, yet allowing their use when it was unknown, and prohibiting inquiry as to such dedication, been taken out of its legitimate case, and construed into a general rule of morality; and the direction belonging to that case, "Whatsoever is sold in the shambles, that eat, asking no questions for conscience' sake," converted into an aphorism for the common purposes of life, in our daily intercourse with the wickedness abounding in the world, to the great prejudice of sound morality.

It is obvious the rule must extend to all cases of things procured wrongfully, if it is made to apply to any case of things so procured. Thus under cover of it, no matter what circumstances of atrocity, violence or fraud may have attended the procurement of an article; no matter what suspicions may have assailed our minds, as to the bad concomitants of such procurement, if we keep ourselves prudently ignorant of the express facts, we may innocently buy and enjoy the thing! This has been termed a Christian liberty! Pagan freedom, with an honest purpose, would disdain the privilege; but pagan or pseudo-christian, it falls to pieces by the weight of its own enormity!

The true meaning of the Apostle rises above this miserable system of connivance with wrong. The brethren converted from heathenism were in perpetual danger, when there was presented to them food which they knew to be dedicated to an idol, of relapsing into the condition of idolaters; momentarily it may be presumed, but still with great prejudice to their confirmation in true piety. There was nothing appertaining to the food itself, produced by the dedication, which made its use criminal. The evil, wholly a mental one, existed in the knowledge of the dedication, which, operating on infirm consciences, tended to re-excite in the minds of the converted brethren those feelings of false worship which had been habitual to them on eating food so consecrated. Under these circumstances, it was the part of true wisdom to prohibit the inquiry after that knowledge, which, when acquired, might be a snare and temptation; as it also was, though in a greater degree, to prohibit the use of the food when the knowledge of its dedication had arrived. Let Paul be heard in explanation of his own rule: "As concerning therefore the eating of those things that are offered in sacrifice unto idols, we know that an idol is nothing in the world, and that there is no other God but one. Howbeit, there is not in every man that knowledge, for some with conscience of the idol, unto this hour, eat it as a thing offered unto an idol; and their conscience, being weak, is defiled."

POETRY.

"The slave, the slave, hath many wrongs—
Where might her pleader be?"

This is the motto of a Poem recently published in Philadelphia,—"An appeal for the Bondswoman, to her own sex,"—we may add, by one of her own sex—and beautifully has the gifted author responded to the question—"Where might her pleader be?" The Poem is divided into seven parts, each being an appeal to a distinct class. We have selected a portion of the first—addressed to mothers—and hope many of our readers will be induced to procure the book itself, and give it a wide circulation. It contains only 36 pages and can be sent by mail at a trifling expense. Henry Longstreth will supply orders, and it may be well to state that the publication is for the exclusive benefit of the cause in which it was written. May the hearts of many mothers, daughters and others to whom this appeal is addressed, be effectually awakened to the wrongs of their suffering sisters in bonds, and taught to feel "as bound with them."

"MOTHER!"

"Leader of the household flock;
By thy God ordained to stand
As the shadow of a rock
To a young depending band,
Can thine eye, undimmed, behold
Woman's agony and fear,
When the wolf hath tracked her fold,
And no rescuer is near?
Browsing 'neath the household eave,
Gaze thou calmly at thy rest,
Heedless of that cobbler's meek group,
Of the childless mother's woe,
Whom her empty arms to thee
Are outstretched imploringly—
By the daily blessings shed
On thy house and on thy bed,
By the joys that crown thy hearth
As a holy spot on earth,
Happy, virtuous, and free!
In thy gratitude to God,
Who hath kindly dealt with thee,
Lest the staff that spared the rod,
Teach thy little ones to feel Early in thy touch maternal
All those springs of tenderness
Given by our Father's love,
Every living thing to bless
In their path constrained to move.
If thou hast a noble boy,
Smiling ever, playful, gay,
Picture-book and childish toy,
To some chosen haunt away,
Where he finds an ancient page,
Chivalry's departed age,
Warrior's tale of knightly deed,
Heard the tramp of battle steed,
Trampled all to a holy way,
Clash of sword and scabbard,
Tell him of those valiant men,
Gone from his life and pen,
Warriors of his story and song,
Sent among mankind to bring Down the Pharaohs of wrong;
In their duty purpose strong,
Calm of mind and brave of heart,
Teach him how they dealt the blow,
In whose strength they sped the dart,
Truth's deliver to lay low.
If he thy aid to guide
Hath in hand and wide by side,
With that spirit high and bold,
Fable one of softer mould,
Whose heart's windows will unclose
Only when the South wind blows;
When thence the ready knee
In some parter of childhood's glee,
While the welcome form is pressed
To a momentary rest,
And the little fingers twine
Close and loving with thine,
In a gentle voice and mild
Tell her of the Captive's child;
Whom thy form is uncreased,
Whom lip in love is rarely pressed,
Who's his neglected day by day,
And wears its little life away,
With none to cherish, no one near
To teach the well or wipe the tear.

Oh! if thou hast ever known
How a mother's faintest tone

Lives upon the hushed ear,
Like no other sound we hear,—
If memory doth ever stray
From things of now and yesterday,
O'er thine own Childhood's guarded way,
If thou hast ever looked within
The foldings of a worldly heart,
To find, beneath its stains of sin
And coverings of time and art,
The lines thy mother's pencil traced,—
Let every picture smile,
To its own spotless surface given;
By her who with the undimmed,
Now sitteth at the gate of Heaven
To watch the coming of her child;
Let every clasp and vivid line,
Which all thy better nature stirs,
Invite thee to besought to thine
Such memories as live in her's."

We can scarcely forbear to add the concluding verse of the Poem—it is to the "Sinner and Penitent," and exhibits the Christian spirit which pervades the whole:

"Draw near us—the Oppressed needs a friend,
Slow to reproach, harkening in the night,
Till God in mercy over him shall bend
On his dark path to say, 'Let there be light.'"

ADVERTISEMENTS.

NON-SUBSCRIBERS.—We send some copies of the present number to individuals who have not subscribed, hoping they will circulate these amongst their friends and neighbors.

AGENTS.—We are indebted to the kindness of many of our friends who have forwarded the names of subscribers, and we trust in each neighborhood where our paper has been received, some one will be willing to act as Agent, and forward on his name. The agents will be found below.

FREE COTTON GOODS.

To accommodate Friends and others who wish to supply themselves with free cotton goods, but cannot conveniently give or send money to aid in the manufacture, the Finance Committee of Friends' Free Produce Association propose to receive from such individuals any sum of money they may choose to advance, and furnish them with goods to the same amount when these are ready for sale.

ELI H. FICKERING,
S. ALLISON, Jr.,
THOMAS WISTAR, Jr.,
GEORGE W. TAYLOR,
SAMUEL RHODES,
Committee.

FREE LABOR STORE.—The association having purchased the stock and fixtures of the store at the N. W. corner of Fifth and Cherry streets, at Lytle-Whit, would respectfully inform his friends and those who prefer using the produce of free labor, that he will continue the business as heretofore, and hopes by attention thereto, to merit and receive a continuance of the patronage bestowed in the former occupancy.
JOEL FISHER.

THE NON-SLAVERHOLDER is published on the first Fourth day of the week, in each month, at One Dollar per annum, payable in advance, or six copies to one address for five dollars. It may be proper here to remark that pecuniary profit forms no part of our object, and that the whole amount of subscriptions which may be received after paying the expenses of publication, will be devoted to the cause of emancipation.
ABRAHAM L. PENNOCK, SAMUEL RHODES and GEORGE W. TAYLOR, Editors.

Subscriptions and payments received by HENRY LONG-STRETH, Publisher, No. 917 Market St. Philadelphia.

By decision of the Post Master General, the Non-Slaverholder is subject to newspaper postage only.

PRINTED AT

Merrihew & Thompson's Book and Job Office,
No. 7 Carter's Alley.

THE
NON-SLAVERHOLDER.

"Whoso gives the motive, makes his brother's sin his own."

VOL. I.]

PHILADELPHIA, FOURTH MONTH, 1846.

[NO. 4.]

COMMUNICATIONS.

To the Editors of the Non-Slaverholder.

F—, N. Hampshire, 1st mo. 1846.

Having read the first number of your paper it has awakened feelings which I would gladly unfold, were it in the power of my pen to set them forth. The cause of the poor slaves I have long had at heart—though I have read but little nor conversed much upon the subject. The secret aspirations of my spirit have often been engaged in their behalf, and this is nearly all that I have seen it my duty to do for this afflicted portion of the human family. Their condition has often been brought very near to my feelings, when contemplating on their miseries and their wrongs; and the query has arisen in my heart—what would I not do, and what would I not be willing to suffer, could I in any way alleviate their woes! Surely there is no article of food or clothing which I would not cheerfully relinquish, did I know how to distinguish between the products of free and slave labour, and were it practicable and had I the means of procuring the former. But I suppose that in the little village of F. near where I reside, there is not one in twenty sufficiently informed to make the distinction. Here we have four little stores supplied with groceries, &c., where we go and purchase what we need for our family use. Now, if we are partaking daily of slave labour, and are daily partaking in the sin of the slaveholders—what is the remedy? how shall we avoid it? for we desire to be free from guilt in this matter, and free from doing any thing to rivet the chains of our poor afflicted brethren.

S. B. R.

To the Editors of the Non-Slaverholder.

B—, Indiana, 2d mo. 20th. 1846.

Esteemed Friends.—The 1st and 2d Nos. of the Non-Slaverholder, have been received by me and by several other Friends within the limits of our monthly meeting. The subjects therein contained are cordially approved by many Friends, and disapproved, I believe, by none; yet there is one great obstacle in the way among us here, in carrying on the doctrine advocated therein; namely, the obtaining from the produce of slave labour:—and this obstacle is the want of means of obtaining the various necessities of life, through a channel in which we could place full confidence that they were free from the contaminating influence of the labour of the slave. Now as to the necessity of abstaining from the use of slave labour products, many of us, I believe, are fully convinced. The above subject was freely conversed on among Friends during our last Quarterly Meeting, which was held on the 14th inst. and it was the united judgment of all that I heard express, that could some member or members of the Free Labour Produce Association of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, be willing to furnish a small stock of goods on sale, consigned to the care of some Friend at —, and would guarantee them to come through the said Association, and to be entirely the product of free labour, it would be a powerful means of arousing Friends to the importance of the concern, as well as open a door through which we might be enabled to obtain free labour goods; and that it would be sustained by Friends and others within the limits of the Western Quarterly Meeting, and pay a sufficient profit on the capital invested therein.

J. S.

To the Editors of the Non-Slaverholder.

—, New York, 28th of 2d mo. 1846.

Dear Friends.—I have perused with deep interest and much satisfaction, two numbers of your paper; it has been animating to my feelings and to those of my family. Perhaps I am enthusiastic, and anticipate more than will be realized from this mode of action. Large bodies necessarily move slowly—popular sentiments bend with deep reluctance, and only by a sufficient amount of means. Pride, prejudice, covetousness, custom and ignorance, being the safeguards of slavery, are principles which, however strong they may seem, are only potent and powerful in combat against that of their own nature. Truth is sufficient, when brought properly to bear, to overcome them all.

I wish you success in your undertaking; it combines, in an eminent degree, philanthropy and Christianity—it is laying the axe to the root of the corrupt tree—it is preventing effects by removing the cause—it so couples pecuniary interest with Christianity, that though the latter may be rejected where covetousness predominates, yet, as it respects the slave, the end will be reached by the former—it is calculated to restore religious society to the "unity of the spirit in the bond of peace," by elevating one of its noble and long professed testimonies to its meridian height, it is calculated to settle and tranquillize a convulsed nation by removing ultimately the horrid system of slavery, this being the principal means of such convulsion. Extinguish the market for slave-labor products, and no such products will be found for the market; and when these products are not to be found, the millions now languishing under the most galling bondage ever known under the sun, will every where be recognised as brethren and sisters. Yours, truly, in the cause of the oppressed.

D. L.

To the Editors of the Non-Slaveholder.

—, Pa., 2d mo. 5th, 1846.

Friends Editors.—When in the city a few days since, I was handed the first No. of your periodical, entitled the "Non-Slaveholder," with the perusal of which I was much gratified. It has often been a matter of deep regret to me that so many of the active advocates for emancipation have overlooked one of the most important principles connected with the upright cause—that of abstaining, so far as is practicable, from the blood-stained products of slavery. In order to bear a strong testimony against any evil, we should have our own hands washed clean respecting it; and just in proportion as our own hands are imbrued in it, will our testimony become weakened. "Thou hypocrite, first cast out the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast the mote out of thy brother's eye," was the language of the Divine Founder of our Religion.

I cannot but think that those who are crying so loudly against slavery, and at the same time indulging freely in the various luxuries and more useful articles unjustly obtained, by and through the toil of the poor, oppressed, and almost hopeless slave, are laboring with a mote, at least, in their own eye, which is a serious obstruction in the way of seeing how to pluck out the beam which they see in the slaveholders' eye.

Taste not, touch not, handle not, is the Apostolic doctrine, and I recognise it as sound. To taste, to touch, to handle—in other words—to do that which sustains an evil, while we are bearing a testimony against it in words, is really building up with one hand and professing to pull down with the other.

S. P. H.

To the Editors of the Non-Slaveholder.

—, Virginia, 2d mo. 21st, 1846.

Enclosed thou wilt receive my subscription for the Non-Slaveholder. It will, no doubt be an efficient coadjutor in giving liberty to the slave, a more elevated philanthropy to the master, and a greater degree of happiness to both. I am rejoiced to hear of the success of the F.P. Association in obtaining free cotton. Let the good work go on, and—mark my prediction!—it will ere long find a friendship even in the South, which is not now dreamed of. It would have the whole North in its support, but for political and commercial association.

To the Editors of the Non-Slaveholder.

P—, (Mass.), 2d mo. 1st, 1846.

DEAR FRIENDS:—Enclosed I send you one dollar in advance for the Non-Slaveholder. Its sentiments meet my most cordial approbation, and are the same which I have endeavoured to carry into practice and to propagate for about twenty years. If I have not been perfectly consistent, none but the perfect Christian can rebuke me in this respect. For many years, probably fifteen or sixteen, I have not knowingly bought a yard of cotton cloth of the product of slavery; much less have I used sugar, or molasses, or rice produced by oppression. We use sugar and molasses made from our maple trees. Without wishing to exalt myself by the contrast, much do I deplore the condition of those who thoughtlessly or fearlessly partake of the luxuries of life, wrung from the unrequited labour of the slave, and consider not, or will not consider, that those who eat not of foils are condemned; and though from their lips they may return many thanks, still, if they will examine their own hearts, they may find something wrong there!

How many abolitionists are there who cry robber! and thief! to those who hold slaves, and yet give their tens, their hundreds, and their thousands per year to bribe the oppressor to perpetrate the deeds they profess to execrate. Though, like Pilate, they wash their hands, and say they are innocent, yet there is ONE who knoweth their hearts! Alas! have I not known professors of religion here, who I doubt not would condemn the slave trade and slavery, yet, by dealing in cotton from the slaveholder, have made their thousands, if not millions?—And, with what pain have I learned that leading abolitionists have pursued it as a business, to fatten large droves of animals on southern corn, the fruit of oppression, because it was deemed cheaper to whip and drive the slave to obtain the corn than to pay the northern freeman his fifteen dollars per month and good board for his labour! Such, no doubt, would like to be thought amongst the number of those who despise the gain of oppression and shake their hands from the holding of bribes. May they see themselves by the light of Christ, and act accordingly, if they want a well grounded hope to dwell on high, and to know their defence to be THE MENTION OF ROCKS, and divine and heavenly BREAD AND WATER to be made sure unto them. Then let them see if they can partake, IN FAITH, of the bread of slavery and oppression, and of the bread of the Lord and his table at the same time!—And also, if they can come into the marriage chamber of the Lamb with the spotted cotton garment of oppression, and the clean linen—the righteous garment of the saints—upon them, at the same time?

For my own part, I must renounce both the tree of slavery and its fruit. If the tree is corrupt, the fruit is also. Yet, in point of charity, I think the slaveholder, who feeds his slaves well and otherwise attends to their comfort, is more excusable than is the dealer in sugar and cotton, when these are the growth of oppression.

I can readily appreciate the benevolence of the occasional slave dealer, who, interested in behalf of a poor slave about to be sold into Georgia or Louisiana, far from sympathising friends, perhaps from a wife and family that he loves, saves him from that terrible doom by becoming himself the purchaser; continuing to the slave those social comforts of which he was about to be stripped, though retaining him still as a chattel and thing. But what shall be said to justify the wholesale traders in the products of oppression, who, regarding slavery as a sin, yet give the direct impulse to the sundering of those ties.

These remarks are at your service, should you deem them worth publishing. May all who read them despise the gain of oppression. "Lord, who shall abide in thy tabernacle? who shall dwell in thy holy hill?—He that walketh uprightly, and worketh righteousness, and speaketh the truth in his heart."

If a deep WOE rests upon those rich men who keep back by fraud the hire of the labourers who have reaped down their fields—if, truly, the hire of the slave is kept back by fraud, and it "crieth, and the cries of them which have reaped are entered into the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth"—beware thou that givest a bribe to the oppressor, lest thou partake in his recompense!

With fervent desires for the promotion of the cause, I remain your friend.

S. B.

To the Editors of the Non-Slaveholder.

M—, Vt., 3d mo. 17th, 1846.

The first No. of the Non-Slaveholder I received in due course, and have read with much interest. It is cause of rejoicing to see a paper of that stamp issued by members of our religious society. We have long needed an anti-slavery paper, fearless and uncompromising in its principles, and yet unoffending to those who have looked on anti-slavery publications, in general, as publications of dangerous tendency.

I must question whether any impartial observer who would scrutinize Friends, not exactly as associated bodies, but as a mass, could fail of discovering an immense amount of "motive" furnished by them to the slaveholders. My hearty desire is (and I am by no means alone in that desire in this quarter) that you may be able to trace it all out. Let us see in how many ways and forms we are maintaining the institution of slavery—let the cord that binds the slave be untwisted—let every strand be divided, that we may see how much of the material we are directly or indirectly furnishing, that is required to keep the cord strong enough to hold the slave in bondage. Let us know how many are whipped into the cotton field—how many must die prematurely, and how many are bought to supply their places with money that Friends have paid over, that Friends may have convenient clothing and comfortable dinners.

Safely it is time for Friends to be "up and journeying forward, for they have compassed this mountain long enough."

H. M.

SELECTIONS.

LETTER FROM ANTHONY BENEZET TO RICHARD SHACKELTON.

Philadelphia, 6th of Sixth month, 1772.

ESTEEMED FRIEND: Having a good opportunity by our dear friend Samuel Neale, I make free hereby affectionately to salute thee, and request thy attention on a subject which has long been a matter of deep concern to many well-disposed people in these parts, viz: The Negro Trade; the purchasing and bringing those unhappy Africans from their native land, and subjecting them to a state of perpetual bondage, and that often the most cruel and afflictive, in which our nation is deeply engaged.

I herewith send thee, by our friend Neale, two copies of a treatise lately published here on this weighty subject, wherein is set forth the inhumanity and great wickedness whereby so many thousands and tens of thousands of our fellow-men, equally with ourselves the objects of redeeming grace, endued with the same natural powers, and as free as we by nature, are brought to a miserable and unimely end. I beg thou wilt give it a serious perusal, when I am persuaded, thou wilt perceive it to be a matter which calls for the most deep consideration of all who are concerned for the welfare of their country, and desirous to avert those judgments, which evils of so deep a dye must, sooner or later, bring upon every people who are defiled therewith. How an evil of so deep a dye has so long passed uncensured, and has even received the countenance of a Christian government and been supported by law, is surprising; and I apprehend must in a great measure have arisen from a false representation being made of the case to those in whose power it would have been to put a stop to the trade, who have been unacquainted with the corrupt motives which gave life to it, and the groans, the dying groans, which daily ascend to God; the common Father of mankind, from the broken hearts of those our distressed fellow men; or, I think we could not have so long continued in a practice so inconsistent with the British apprehensions of liberty. Is it not strange that whilst so much noise is made about the maintenance of liberty through the British state, this prodigious infringement of every human and sacred tie, should be overlooked in the case of those miserable Africans?

We make high profession of the Christian religion—to love the Lord our God with all our hearts, and what is declared to be equal thereto, to love our neighbours (i. e. all mankind,) equal to ourselves: and yet how unfeeling for the sufferings of others, how languid in our endeavours to procure them relief! If this love indeed prevailed, would it not deeply affect the hearts of many high professors of different denominations, who have had an opportunity to be acquainted, not only with the grievous sufferings and prodigious havoc which is made by this trade of the human species, by means the most disgraceful, afflictive and cruel, but also with its awful effects on their lordly oppressors (who are also our brethren,) in corrupting their morals, and hardening their hearts to that degree, that they and their offspring become alienated from God, estranged from all good, and are hastening to a state of greater, far greater and more deeply corrupt barbarity than that from which our northern progenitors emerged before their acquaintance with Christianity.

Can we be both silent and innocent spectators; ought we not, jointly or separately, to bring this matter before the government, even before the King and Parliament? Will anything short of this excuse us to God, the common Father of mankind, when inquisition is made for the blood of so many thousands of our fellow creatures, (i. e. our neighbours,) so unjustly and so cruelly shed, and yet daily shedding by our nation under the sanction of laws made by our representatives in Parliament? Indeed, daily experience verifies the assertion at page 86 of the treatise, viz: "That the slavery of the negroes in our colonies is attended with far worse circumstances, than what any people in their condition suffer in any other part of the world, or have suffered in any other period of time." For even wicked, amazingly wicked, as are the American laws, quoted page 81, 1st part, and page 26, 2d part, yet that part for the security of the slaves is seldom put in execution, on sundry accounts, viz: because a slave's evidence is not valid, therefore the prosecution of the murderer must generally lie on the white overseer's testimony, who, except in resentment, will not be likely to appear against his employer. Also because it is dangerous in most places where slavery prevails to plead the cause of negroes; so that it is not uncommon to hear shocking instances of the negroes being wantonly, passively or cruelly murdered, without any legal notice being taken of it. We, as a people, have not been backward in applying to Parliament in cases where our sufferings have been by no means comparable to the present case. If Friends could be prevailed upon to take any step tending to prevent the continuance of this terrible evil (i. e. the slave-trade,) at least, if not slavery itself, we should have the unity of many upright people of other religious persuasions. Indeed, the people of Maryland and Virginia are so convinced of the inexpediency, if not the iniquity, of any further importation of negroes, that a judicious Friend, who has spent some time in those parts, tells me he thinks ten or twenty thousand people would join in a petition to that purpose, to the Parliament.

The last Maryland Yearly Meeting of Friends, did draw up a petition to be laid before their Assembly, praying for a law to prevent any further importation of negroes, and I am told that Friends of Virginia had the same under their consideration. The Assembly of New England have made laws that nearly amount to a prohibition of a further import, and have proposed that those born in the country should be free at a certain age. By a late computation there are about eight hundred and fifty thousand negroes in the English colonies and islands. In Jamaica alone, from a review of taxables made lately, there were one hundred and sixty thousand taxable working negroes, and probably as many more not taxed as would make two hundred thousand; and but about fifteen thousand whites; and the trade still carried on with such vigour, that we have reason to conclude there is still an hundred thousand violently brought from Africa by the English alone; these are employed chiefly to make up deficiencies, and sell to the Spaniards.

As the procuring, if possible, a remedy to this most grievous evil, is what I have very much at heart, I trust thou wilt extend charity in judging of the freedom I have taken in thus writing to thee. Indeed it is what I should sorely have done, but for the encouragement given me by our dear friend Samuel Neale, more especially as he tells me thou art nearly connected with a person of judgment and weight in the English Parliament, who may be a good instrument in forwarding an inquiry into this potent evil. Indeed, it is an evil of so deep a dye, that if we indeed believe that the threats as well as the promises recorded in the scripture will have their accomplishment, what can we expect but that the judgments of God will, when the cup is full, break out with irresistible fury!

I shall take it kind if thou wilt let me hear from thee by a few lines in answer, and remain thy friend,

ANTHONY BENERET.

INFLUENCE OF TRUE CHRISTIAN PRINCIPLES.

Christopher Davies, one of the Society's missionaries in New Zealand, visited a pa or village belonging to two Christian brothers, who were also chiefs. He found them expecting an attack from a neighbouring chief, named Ripa. He had made an unjust demand, and was marching against them to revenge their refusal to comply with it. It was just at this juncture that Mr. Davies entered the village; and there he found the two Christian chiefs surrounded by their armed followers, but engaged in solemn prayer—praying especially for the pardon of their enemies, and having a white flag hoisted above their heads in token of their desire for peace. Mr. Davies went out to meet Ripa and his party. With their faces painted red, and their bodies naked, they were listening to addresses, urging them to vengeance and slaughter. Presently they advanced with frightful yells, and dancing their war dance, bid defiance to the Christians who were assembled on the other side of the fence, opposite to the enemy. One of the Christian chiefs walked quietly up and down between the parties, telling the enemy they were acting contrary to the word of God, and that his own party were restrained only by the fear of God from attacking them. The Christians had, indeed, nothing else to fear; they were one hundred to twenty on Ripa's side. At length one of the enemy, in striking at the fence with his hatchet, cut Noa, the Christian chief, on his head. He tried to conceal the wound, but his friends perceiving it, made a rush from the village, every one with his musket levelled. In another moment, Ripa and his party would have fallen; but Noa, the wounded chief, sprang forward and exclaimed, "if you kill Ripa, I shall die with him," and then moving on towards Ripa, shielded him with his own body from destruction.

Some years ago, adds Mr. Davies, the very sight of blood would have been the signal for dreadful slaughter. But by this Christian forbearance of Noa, the evil was overcome, and peace made between the parties.—Report of the Birmingham Auxiliary Church Missionary Society.

THE ALL-PERVADING INFLUENCE OF SLAVERY.

The Cincinnati Herald mentions several facts that must make us blush as a people for the subserviency of our literary men, and that tell no flattering tale of the progress of Anti-Slavery sentiment in the country. A beautiful edition of Longfellow's poems was recently issued by Carey & Hart, of Philadelphia. On examination it was discovered that several excellent poems, denunciatory of Slavery, had been omitted. The author, on being interrogated, acknowledged that they had been left out with his consent; saying that he could not get the work published, only on condition that they were omitted.

Paulding wrote and published, in 1816, a work that contained, on one page, an allusion to Slavery and the Slave Trade, as conducted in the South. In 1835-'6, after he had become a politician, another edition of the work was published, but in order to give it currency the offensive page was stricken out, and another inserted, depicting the evils to flow from Abolitionism! He was made Secretary of the Navy under Mr. Van Buren.

The last edition of Bancroft's History, published in 1841-'2, contains a new chapter, devoted to a notice of Slavery, in which it is spoken of as a patriarchal institution, and placed on a footing acceptable to the peculiar institution. He has his reward, as Mr. Polk's Secretary of the Navy!

THE NON-SLAVERHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, FOURTH MONTH 1, 1846.

CORRESPONDENTS.—The issuing of this journal has put us "in communication" with numerous individuals approving, and a few disapproving of the publication, but with no one denying its great fundamental principle, that it is the buying and using of the productions of slave-labor which makes slavery to exist. It is to be remarked, as no small evidence of moral progress, that the truth of our motto, which asserts the responsibility we are under for the motives to action which we intelligently give to others, is also uncontroverted by any. The time seems fast passing by, when the inquiry, though old as Cain, "Am I my brother's keeper?" will be accepted as a significant argument. We feel and know that in the social relation we occupy this position of keeper one of another, and that we are called individually to a conduct corresponding with it. "Woe unto him that giveth his neighbor drink, that putteth thy bottle to him and makest him drunken also," is no higher denunciation of the man who literally tempts his neighbor with the inebriating draught, than it is of him who gives an inducement to his brother for the commission of any other wrong. There is but one short step from the reception of this doctrine to the enacting of it. That step farther taken by all those who are intelligent enough to receive the doctrine, and slavery would soon cease to exercise its present despotic sway!

Many of our correspondents shall have private answers to their inquiries and suggestions, when time will permit. Some of them will see their communications in the present paper. One will perceive his to be much abridged, our space not allowing more room to his important suggestions. Others will find the subjects they refer to, treated of in this or succeeding numbers. Those who desire the early enlargement of our paper are informed that up to the present time, our issue continuing to be large, the subscription list falls far short of paying the expenses of paper and printing. Subscribers names, however, are coming in daily, inducing the hope that, at a short period hence, we may double the number of our pages. This event will occur whenever our subscription list shall nearly approximate those expenses. We hope that our friends will be encouraged by this view of the case to renewed efforts for obtaining subscribers. We notice below the most prominent objections which have been offered to our paper and to the cause which it especially advocates.

It is asserted that it is neither "safe" nor "prudent," and even indicative of "insubordination" for individuals, members of the religious society of Friends, or for associations of such individuals, "to go ahead of the Society," in endeavoring to promote a testimony against the use of slave produce, "which the body of Friends has not thought it best to establish." We have yet to learn that the theory here inculcated has any foundation in the principles or constitution of our religious society. It savours to us as belonging more to a hierarchy, which claims to be the infallible expositor of individual duty, than to the religious community whose early history was marked by its bold advocacy of an unfettered conscience. We at once concede to the Body its full right to determine its principles and plans of united operation; but we claim for the individual members, also, their right to determine the principles and rules of action which shall guide them in their several individual duties, when such action does not contravene the acknowledged doctrines and discipline of the Body.

The objection adverted to may be fairly tested by applying it to reforms already accomplished within the society. Admitting its truth, these conclusions would follow—that so long as the Society of Friends permitted its members to hold slaves, it was unsafe, imprudent, and destructive of good order for individual members to pronounce the act of holding slaves an immorality—that so long as the Society permitted its members to use alcoholic drinks it was wholly improper for a few members to denounce that drinking as wrongful and of bad tendency! When would reform begin if no one could suggest and urge it, until the body had adopted it? When did the body simultaneously enact a previously unproposed reform? To both these questions the answer is obviously, NEVER!

We highly appreciate the benefits of religious society, and regard with deference its proper restrictions; but we desire never to lose sight of the solemn fact that, at the GREAT AUDIT, we are not to answer collectively, but SEVERALLY, for the talents committed to us for improvement. The humble pound, delivered to our individual care, is not to be kept laid up in a napkin, though this may be of the most specious whiteness, but is to be improved. Our candle is to be set upon a candlestick, our city upon a hill, and whether our associates, religious or civil, say aye, or nay, to our course of action, we are to follow the light in our own conscience as conducting us into the only sure path of ultimate safety.

It is a mere assumption, however, to say that we go in advance of the principles of the Society, in seeking to promote a testimony against the use of slave produce. This subject was well discussed in the circular addressed to Friends in the ninth month last, by a committee of the Free Produce Association of Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, and published in our first number. We present some additional views. Our discipline enunciates principles rather than defines particular offences. Thus it holds up to censure any in membership with us, who shall "IN ANY WISE be concerned in purchasing, disposing of or holding mankind as slaves, or shall by ANY MEANS encourage or countenance a traffic in slaves," or be in any way "accessory to this enormous national evil." Now if a Friend shall make manacles for the slave, shall let his vessel for the slave trade, shall provision such vessel, shall even write a Will for another, bequeathing slaves into further bondage, although such acts are not specified as offences, can any one doubt that he would be amenable to our discipline, and make himself the subject of religious care? But, as much as is the altar above the gift which it sanctifies, so is the commerce in the productions of slavery above the mere incidents which that commerce produces. Without it there would be no manacles for the slave, no ships hired for the foreign and internal slave trade, no provisioning those ships, no bequests of slaves, no slavery! To be the cause of slavery and the slave trade, which the users of slave produce are, is, at least, to be in some wise concerned in holding mankind as slaves, and is by some means to encourage and countenance a traffic in slaves, and to be "accessory to this enormous national evil."

We are sorry to find that one or two esteemed Friends have objected to our advocacy of abstinence from the products of slave labour, because it happens that those who have set up a new Yearly Meeting in Indiana are concerned to maintain this testimony. Should they not rather have considered, first, whether the principle is in accordance with Christianity? And this point once settled in their minds in the affirmative, should they not as Christian friends rejoice to find any of whatever name endeavouring to uphold it?

We understand our friends as connecting with their objection the apprehension that the discussion of this question may lead into separation. We entertain no fears of this kind. We can perceive no motive which should induce us to separate from our religious society, though we should have to grieve, our life-long, at the greater number of our fellow members continuing to uphold slavery by giving to the slaveholders their principal inducement for clinging to the system.

We are pleased to be able to put in contrast with those objections the letter from a Friend in the western quarter of Indiana, which appears under the head of Communications, and which indicates a favorable opinion of our objects in that portion of the Society; and we may state, as an encouraging and gratifying fact, that up to the present time, a large proportion of our subscribers are members of Indiana Yearly Meeting.

We take the liberty of making a quotation from the letter of a much respected correspondent. We hope he will yet perceive more clearly than he now appears to do, that a testimony, to be adopted by the many, must have its commencement with the few; that, in all reforms, there is, "first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear," and that even the consistent life of the few may convince many slaveholders of the sin of slavery, which the brilliant declamation of thousands, themselves reveling in the spoils of slavery, would fail to effect. Our friend writes:

"I have thought, in time past, that if we, as a religious society, acting under purely conscientious feelings, could have practically borne a united testimony, to some considerable extent, against the use of slave-grown produce, it would have had its weight and been received as coming from principle, and have carried conviction with it. But otherwise I cannot see how abstinence can be of any use towards removing the sin of slavery, or convincing the slaveholders of the inconsistency of it."

As already intimated, many kind friends have sent us letters of approval. The briefest and one of the earliest of these acceptable testimonials was from Gerrit Smith, of Peterboro', New York, in these words: "My dear friend, I have this day received the 'Non-Slaverholder,' I rejoice in its appearance. May the Lord render it a great blessing to the cause of the poor slave. Let one copy be sent to me as long as the within five dollars will pay for it."

A Friend writing from Logan county, Ohio, after mentioning that two dollars enclosed were to pay for two copies of the Non-Slaverholder, says:

"I feel so deep an interest in the paper, that I know not how to refrain from making an effort to obtain it; especially as it proposes to hold prominently to view the subject of abstinence from the productions of slave labour, as a means of abolishing slavery; a subject which has claimed the serious attention of a few of us in this section for several years past. It appears to me that almost any one who will take the pains to investigate it thoroughly, must arrive at the conclusion, that those who purchase and consume the productions of the slaves' labour, are those who support the system of slavery; and that the society of Friends will find it to be just as much their duty to bear their testimony against it, as Friends formerly did to bear theirs against holding slaves. I therefore hail the appearance of the Non-Slaveholder with joy, and with all my heart wish you encouraged to persevere, looking for best wisdom to direct and strengthen you, and I confidently believe that your labours will be blessed."

A correspondent from Erie county, New York, enclosing one dollar for the Non-Slaveholder, remarks upon the importance of abstinence from slave produce, and expresses a desire that free labour goods be deposited in Buffalo for sale. He says they are much wanted, and that if to be had through a channel that could be depended upon, "they would be bought by many" in that vicinity, including a considerable number not in religious profession with us; and that a "higher price" would be given for them "than for slave labour goods." This Friend expresses the opinion that even Friends can accomplish much by united action; meaning that their number is not so inconsiderable, but that a sensible impression might be made on slavery, did the great body of the Society abstain from slave grown articles, and take pains to encourage the production of a sufficient quantity of those articles, by free labour, to supply their wants. It is not, however, probable that Friends would be alone in the support of this righteous testimony. Where our Christian brethren of other denominations, have not already taken it up, it is reasonable to suppose that the example of Friends would have a good effect upon their minds, and induce many to join us in this peaceful and consistent remedy. May we not also entertain the hope that slaveholders, seeing our consistency, will likewise be brought to reflect more and more on the nature of that system, which is so odious in the eyes of their northern brethren, that these cannot assist in any way in its support.

While we stand aloof and charge the sin of slavery on them exclusively, and yet partake freely of its products, they may well question our sincerity, and despise our exhortations; but when they shall see non-slaveholders acting out their professions by a consistent non-participancy in the fruits of slavery, how can they resist such an appeal?

We subjoin the following foreign notices of our periodical:

From the "British Friend" published in Glasgow.

"THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.—This is the title of a Monthly Journal, a copy of the first number of which, dated 1st month, 1846, has been kindly sent us by the conductors, Abraham L. Pennock, Samuel Rhoads, and George W. Taylor.

The price appears to be one dollar per annum, payable in advance.

America, already abounding with similar periodicals, the originating of an addition to the number may to some appear uncalled for, and its obtaining support very questionable. The conductors, however, have chalked out a line peculiarly their own—that of advocating, chiefly, the propriety of abstinence from the productions of slavery. The following sentence from the Prospectus of the Non-Slaveholder, is well deserving consideration:—

Let the principle of non-participancy (of slave labor production,) be adopted and carried out by a body of people, not numerically greater than the Religious Society of Friends, and it would make the Balaazar of slavery tremble on his throne, for he would see written on the wall of his palace, 'Thy kingdom is divided.' Not only would the 5000 slaves now bleeding and toiling for such a body of people be emancipated from his control, but so much of his dominions as that body wanted for free cultivation, and so much as others wanted, incited by this high example, and a similar motive, would be irrevocably taken from him; and he would read in the growing increase of this sentiment, the farther inscription: 'God hath numbered thy kingdom and finished it!'

We hope to notice the future numbers of this interesting publication."

From "The Friend" published in London.

"The grand yet simple means for the termination of slavery, the refusal, namely, to make use of its products, remains yet to be fully tried. We have no doubt whatever, that the self-denial practised by a very considerable class of persons, when the enfranchisement of our West Indian laborers was pleaded for with such unwearied steadfastness, and so irresistible a claim, contributed most essentially to that blessed result. The consumption of slave labour articles, in which we are partakers to a prodigious extent, may appear less revolting to us now than at that period, because the great workshop of iniquity exists only under foreign governments; but we cannot close our senses to the fact, that slavery is slavery, wherever it be found, and that it is our duty, by every means in our power, not to be sharers in its sin.

With these views we have read with much pleasure, the first and second numbers of a magazine lately set on foot by some Friends of Philadelphia, called The Non-Slaveholder, and having for its motto these words of J. G. Whittier, "Whoso gives the motive, makes his brother's sin his own." The paper has our hearty good wishes; the spirit and tone are such as recommend it to the thorough approbation of Friends, and of the philanthropic public in general; and the materials seem likely to be both abundant and interesting. Whilst the great object towards which it is directed, is the overthrow of the slave system, and the great means which it recognises to this end, the influence of "a consistent life;" its pages will be diversified with other harmonious subjects, as is expressed in the following paragraph of the Prospectus: "Directing our operations mainly against slavery, we shall not be precluded from occasionally advertising to parallel reforms—thus to those which seek the avoidance of war and the abrogation of the death penalty. Life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, are inalienable rights, and scarcely separable."

ANTHONY BENEZET'S LETTER.—Our readers will find on page 51 a letter highly characteristic of its philanthropic author. It was written previous to the parliamentary enquiry which was instituted mainly through the indefatigable exertions of Clarkson, and terminated with the abolition of the Anglo-African slave trade. The success which crowned that memorable moral warfare, after twenty years of toil and disappointment, and the more recent triumphs of christianity, in the total abolition of slavery within the British dominions, "should inspire all who wage the desperate strife of humanity against the selfishness and the cupidity of our race."

It is true that the people of the free states of this Union do not possess the power to legislate for the abolition of slavery in the states where it exists; but there is much moral and religious power within their grasp, and they may, and of course should, exercise their right of suffrage, if they exercise it at all, to secure emancipation in the District of Columbia and the Territories. In addition to this, they may effectually reach slavery in the States at its most vulnerable point—the market for its productions. We are sometimes discouraged by the reflection that it is needful to solicit the attention of Friends and others who profess to be abolitionists, to the incontrovertible truth, that their principles necessarily involve the duty of avoiding the use of those productions; but the recollection of instances such as that presented in this letter, where Anthony Benezet thought it necessary to urge upon Richard Shackleton the serious perusal of a certain pamphlet, that he might be led to perceive how forcibly the continuance of the slave trade called for his "most deep consideration," cheers us onward in hope.

Anthony Benezet thought it surprising that an evil of so deep a dye as the foreign slave trade passed so long uncensured, and even received the countenance of a Christian government and the support of law. We have no doubt that the day will come when it will be yet more surprising to our posterity to read in the records of the present period, how closely their fathers were connected with slavery by indiscriminately dealing in and using its avails. They will doubtless clearly perceive, when slavery no longer exists, the foundation upon which it rested. Their perceptions of truth, in relation to this subject, will not be obscured by self-interest; nor will they experience the prejudices which now blind our people, or the fears of "dangerous consequences to the peace of the church," which, in the present day, as in former times,* unhappily pervert the feelings and paralyse the exertions of so many amongst us.

May we dwell under a deep consciousness of the "corrupt motives which give life to slavery;" and constantly hold in remembrance "the groans, the dying groans which daily ascend to God, the common Father of mankind, from the broken hearts of these our distressed fellow men?" Let us not permit our convictions to be stifled and our sympathies deadened, by the cruelly deceptive representations that "the slaves are happy and contented;" that being "well fed, well lodged, and well clothed, and having increased attention to their religious instruction, they are in a very comfortable condition, and it is better to let well alone." It is truly sorrowful that any professor of Christianity should, in this day of light, remain silent and inactive, under this delusion.

The language used by Anthony Benezet in describing the "woeful effects" of slavery upon the "lucky oppressors," is exceedingly strong, but not less true; as all must acknowledge who have made themselves acquainted with the immorality and the darkness—"thick, gross and palpable"—which prevailed in the West Indies, previous to the abolition of slavery there, and which are now prevalent in many places where slavery exists.

Phillippo, in his "Past and Present State of Jamaica," treating of the state of the whites and * See extract from I. Norris' Letter in our first number.

blacks, says: "The language of the Apostle seemed strikingly descriptive of their entire depravity. 'There is none righteous, no, not one; there is none that understandeth, there is none that seeketh after God. Their thrones are open sepulchres; with their tongue they have used deceit; the poison of asps is under their lips; their feet are swift to shed blood, and the way of peace they have not known.'"

We do not mean to assert that this is the universal condition of the whites and blacks in all the slave states of this Union; but we have abundant evidence to show, that it is too general in many parts of them. Indeed what else can be expected, while the professed Christian Church does not recognise the marriage of slaves as binding until death separates them, but only during the time that their masters allow them to live together: and has officially declared* that where they are separated, they ought to be allowed to marry again, and that those who are members of religious societies, are liable to "church censure" if they refuse to take new companions at the will of their masters.

The question, "Can we be both silent and innocent spectators?" of this heathenish state of society? is as pertinent now as it was in the days of Anthony Benezet. May each individual put it seriously to himself, with a solemn conviction that he will have to answer it in the awful day when inquisition is made for blood.

THE SLAYER PONS.—It is remarkable that during one week of the last month, three vessels have arrived in this country as prizes to the American squadron, having been captured while engaged in the slave-trade on the Coast of Africa. The "Panthea," and the "Robert Wilson," came into Charleston, and the barque "Pons of Philadelphia," into this port. By the accounts we publish, it will be seen that the "Pons" shipped 913 slaves at Cabenda, between the ages of 8 and 30, and that only 47 were females! The statements in the public papers of the miserable condition of these poor victims of the sordid passions of man, accompanied by the presence of the slaver in our port, have awakened the sympathies of this community to a degree not often witnessed. A libel of information has been filed in the District Court of the United States against the barque as a vessel of the United States, and owned by citizens of the United States, for being engaged in the transportation and carrying of slaves from one foreign country to another. The third of this month is fixed for the trial, and the issue will be awaited with intense interest, as indicating how far the laws of the United States are operative in preventing American vessels from engaging in the foreign slave-trade under the mask of foreign owners.

* Document issued by the "Savannah River Baptist Association of Ministers."

The Pons was built in New Jersey, and registered in Philadelphia "28th of January, 1842," and again, having new owners, on the "30th December, 1843." On the "18th July, 1845," she was at Rio de Janeiro, and was regarded as an American vessel, as appears by a bill of lading found on board at the time of her capture. Being under American colors, and having the name of "Pons of Philadelphia" on her stern, she was considered by the captain of the United States ship Yorktown, as an American vessel, and captured as such. It is alleged that she was sold at Rio by the American owners; but as she had no papers on board at the time of her capture, evidence of this allegation has not appeared.

No comments of ours could add to the horror which every Christian must feel in reading the accounts from Monrovia. But while we yield to none in the intensity of our detestation of this truly "infernal" traffic, we must beg our readers to enter into an impartial and full examination of its origin and object, and also the means by which it is supported. For ourselves, we regard the difference, if there be any, as only in degree of moral turpitude, between sending a vessel to Africa to convey slaves to Cuba or Brazil, and sending one to Havana or Rio to convey the productions of their labour to Philadelphia or New York. It is a well known fact that the mortality of the slaves on the sugar and coffee plantations of Cuba and Brazil, occasioned by the severity of their labour and treatment, is so great that they would become extinct in a few years if fresh supplies were not obtained from Africa. The atrocious practice of importing males almost exclusively, which has long been known to exist, and of which the Pons furnishes an instance, proves that the planters do not look to a natural increase of their slaves to meet the demand for the products of their labour. The constant need of laborers to fill the places of those who are destroyed on the plantations is, therefore, indisputably the origin of the slave-trade. It is equally clear that the continuance of this trade is necessary to furnish the present exportation from Cuba and Brazil of sugar, coffee and cotton; and any increase of demand for these articles must necessarily induce a corresponding increase of the slave-trade. The object, then, of this trade, is, simply, to furnish the means of supplying that demand. The truth of our motto, that, "whoso gives the motive, makes his brother's sin his own," cannot be called in question: and we are constrained to solicit our readers, individually, to ask themselves the question: whether the purchasers and consumers of the products of the labour of Brazilian slaves do not give the motive which sent the slaver Pons to Africa? Can any man of common understanding fail to see the necessary connection between the importation of slaves into Brazil and the exportation from that country of the products of their labour? The mission of the Pons to Africa being, therefore, an essential part of the system by which those products are supplied, we do not perceive why it should be condemned if the importation and consumption of them are to pass uncensured. It is true that the laws of man allow the one and prohibit the other; but this circumstance cannot change the nature of the act in either case. The foreign slave-trade was formerly allowed and recognised, as a legitimate commerce, by law, and this sanction is still extended to the American slave-trade; yet all who have a higher standard of right than the mere enactments of human legislators, place them in the same category of wrong.

An impartial and comprehensive view of the whole subject must, as we conceive, lead the enlightened Christian to reject both the corrupt tree and its fruits. If the Pons had succeeded in landing her cargo of Africans on the shore of Brazil, their labour would soon have furnished a cargo of sugar for our market! We look upon the slave-trade and slavery as sinful in the sight of a just and holy God; shall we then expect to escape the responsibility of their continuance if we contribute the support for which and by which alone they are sustained?

SUPPLY OF FREE GOODS.—Since the first number of our paper was issued, we have received many proofs, not only that a latent feeling of uneasiness under the practice of using the productions of slavery prevails extensively in this country, both in the northern and in some of the slave states, but that a strong desire exists to adopt efficient measures to abandon that practice and substitute articles which have been produced by the labour of freemen.

Inquiries have been made in many quarters, whether the Free Produce Associations of Friends in Philadelphia and New York will be willing to appoint agents and furnish them with small stocks of free goods, groceries, &c. We cannot give an official answer, but from some knowledge of the resources and proposed operations of those bodies, we believe they will not be able to adopt the plan thus suggested. The Board of Managers in Philadelphia, we have reason to know, have not been unmindful of their duties, and have met with much encouragement to persevere. They have had 63 bales of "surely free" cotton collected in Mississippi by a trustworthy person, a resident of another state;—52 bales have arrived in Philadelphia, and 19 are now in the hands of a manufacturer. The cotton, so far as it has been examined, is of excellent quality, and a variety of goods will probably be ready for sale in a short time. A Friend in England has recently sent us patterns of muslin and calico prints, already manufactured at Manchester of free grown cotton.

New channels being thus opened through which free cotton goods may soon be procured, and the opening of a general free produce store in Philadelphia, and another in New York being contemplated, we trust that what remains to be done to connect these operations with distant parts, where the productions of free labour may be wanted, will be supplied by the exertions of individuals or associations, impressed with the importance of the subject in those places.

It will be the province of the Non-Slaveholder to be an auxiliary in this cause, endeavouring to promote the doctrine of abstinence, and suggesting modes and motives for making its practice easy and general. We invite the aid and co-operation of those who are desirous of hastening the day when liberty will be proclaimed to the captive, and the prison doors opened to them that are bound.

AGENTS.—We are preparing a list of Agents, and will probably publish it in our next number. For the information of our friends in Great Britain and Ireland who may wish to receive the Non-Slaveholder, we now state that CHARLES TYLOR, of STAMFORD HILL, near LONDON, has kindly consented to act as our agent. The paper may reach subscribers in England by steamer from Boston, in two weeks from the day of its publication.

INTELLIGENCE.

From the London Friend.

The apprehension of a war between this country and the United States, an event which might well be regarded as the crowning folly of our age, has induced the Meeting for Sufferings to step forward in the capacity of peace-maker on behalf of the Society. "A memorial has been accordingly drawn up, addressed to our government, and on the 14th of 2d month, was presented to Sir Robert Peel, in a private interview, by several Friends. The Premier was accompanied by Lord Alton

DREN. He received the deputation with something more than courtesy, evincing by his remarks a deep interest in the object of the memorial, and suggesting that our American brethren should use their influence in a similar manner for its accomplishment. The memorial is as follows:

TO SIR ROBERT PEEL, BART, FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY.

"We the undersigned, members of the religious Society of Friends, respectfully inform Sir Robert Peel, that we constitute a standing committee of said Society, fully authorized to act on its behalf, during the intervals of our Yearly Meeting, in publicly upholding our well known Christian principles, as occasion may require.

"One of the most important of these principles has respect to the peaceable nature of the Gospel dispensation, under which, as we believe, all wars and fightings are in their own nature unlawful, being utterly opposed to the spirit and precepts of Christianity. Our blessed Saviour struck at the very root of them when he said, 'Love your enemies—do good to them that hate you.'

"According to our deliberate conviction, this command is of universal application, comprehending in its scope and intention, not only individuals as such, but men in their corporate capacities, and governments as representing nations.

"While the scriptural grounds of these sentiments appear to us to be clear and decisive, we are strongly impressed with a sense of the horrors and crimes with which war never fails to be accompanied, and of the extreme impolicy, as well as unrighteousness, of having recourse to so barbarous and destructive a method of settling the disputes of nations.

"Under these convictions, we have been brought into deep religious concern and solicitude on account of the difference which now subsists between the Government of this country, and that of the United States, and the dangers of hostilities which the question at issue has appeared, from time to time, to involve. For if war is always terrible—always to be deprecated—this is pre-eminently the case when it arises between nations so closely allied by the ties of consanguinity and religious faith (not to mention the most intimate commercial relations) as are the subjects of this Realm, and the citizens of that great Confederation.

"We are painfully sensible that should the peace now subsisting between the two countries be once broken, it is impossible for any man to calculate how great would be the amount, or how long the duration of commercial distress, moral depravity, physical suffering, cruelty, and sloughter, which would be the consequence of this fearful event; or what might be the extent to which these calamities would spread on both sides of the Atlantic.

"While we consider it to be our duty to represent these views to Sir Robert Peel and the other members of the present administration, we rejoice in observing the cordial desire which they have so clearly manifested to avoid these dreadful evils; and we are desirous to express our heartfelt gratitude to them for their repeated endeavors to obtain a settlement of the difference, by the safe and unexceptionable course of arbitration.

"At the same time, we trust we shall not be outstepping our right province as Christian patriots, and friends to the whole human race, in earnestly beseeching the Government to make every concession, (as it relates to the mode of arbitration or in other respects) which may be found necessary to the peaceful termination of the dispute; and even to suffer wrong rather than adopt the tremendous alternative of plunging the two countries into war—thus evincing that they are guided by that 'wisdom which is from above,' and which is 'first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated.'

"We are fully persuaded that in thus acting on the comprehensive ground of Christian principle, Great Britain will find her highest reputation and her truest honor.

"In conclusion, we would express our fervent desire that He who ruleth in the kingdoms of men and hath all hearts at his disposal, may so influence the councils of those who are in authority, both in this country and in America, as speedily to bring about the pacific settlement of the question at issue, and give them richly to partake of the blessing pronounced by our Saviour himself—'Blessed are the peace-makers, for they shall be called the children of God.'

"Given forth by the Meeting aforesaid, this Eleventh day of the Second Month, one thousand eight hundred and forty-six."

[Signed by 52 Members.]

FROM THE COAST OF AFRICA.

Capture of an American Slave.—We are indebted to our correspondents of the Salem Register for advices from the Coast of Africa, received by the Otho. A vessel, supposed to be from Philadelphia, with nine hundred slaves on board, has been captured by the Yorktown, and sent home. The particulars are given in the letter below.

SALEM REGISTER OFFICE, March 9, 1846.

Capture of an American Slave with Nine Hundred Slaves.—Capt. Ryder, of the Otho, from Port Praya, has furnished us with Monrovia papers to Dec. 10, and a Circular from the Methodist Missionaries at Monrovia, dated Dec. 17. The Circular gives the particulars of the capture of the barque Pons, of Philadelphia, with 900 slaves, on the 1st of December, by the U. S. ship Yorktown, Capt. Bell, in lat. 3° South, 3 days out from Cabenda, bound to Rio Janeiro. When the Pons was first seen, she raised American colours, supposing the Yorktown was a British cruiser; but discovering the mistake, immediately hoisted the Portuguese flag. On boarding her, and demanding her papers of the Portuguese Captain, he replied, "I have thrown them overboard." On being asked what was his cargo, he said, "about 900 slaves." On further examination it was found that she had shipped 913, between the ages of 8 and 30, only, 47 of them females, and left at the factory 4 or 500 which they had intended to have taken in the same vessel, but were prevented by the proximity of a British cruiser, from which they narrowly escaped. The Pons was put under the charge of Lieut. Cogdell, and was 14 days in getting up to Monrovia, during which time about 150 of the poor wretches died—some of them jumping overboard in a fit of desperation—and on their arrival at Monrovia, several of the slaves were in a dying state, and many were so emaciated that their skin literally cleaved to their bones, and the stench of the crowded hold was almost suffocating.

The recaptured slaves were landed at Monrovia, and measures were adopted for taking care of them, by the United States Agent for Liberated Africans—300 of them by the Methodist Mission establishment there, who have issued a circular, appealing to the Christian public for aid.

The Pons had sailed for the United States, (supposed for Philadelphia,) under the charge of Lieut. Cogdell.

A letter from one of the Methodist Missionaries gives a horrid account of the sufferings of the slaves, and says it is utterly impossible for language to convey an appropriate idea of the horrors of their situation; the living and the dying were huddled together with less care than is bestowed upon the brute creation; the thermometer at 100 to 120 in the hold. Most of the slaves were in a state of nudity, and many had worn their skins through, producing putrid ulcers, which fed swarms of flies.

MORE ABOUT THE SLAVER PONS.—The Commet-

cial Advertiser has received a copy of the "Appeal to the Humanity and Benevolence of the Christian Public," issued from the Methodist Episcopal Mission Office at Monrovia on the arrival of the slaver Pons, captured by the U. S. sloop of war Yorktown, from which we obtain a few additional facts and details in regard to this affair. The appeal states that a majority of the slaves were boys from 10 to 20 years of age. Of girls there were only 47. Their delight on landing was indescribable. One hundred were taken charge of by the M. E. Mission and about 200 more were distributed among responsible persons in the colony.

A letter from one of the Missionaries, Mr. Hoyt, describing the scene when he went on board the slaver with Gov. Roberts, says:

The decks were literally crowded with poor abject beings. Here and there might be seen individuals in the last agonies of expiring nature; unknown and apparently unnoticed. There was no offer of sympathy to alleviate in the least their misery. Their companions appeared dejected, weighed down with their own sorrows. In another part of the vessel lay a little boy pining away, with two others watching over him.

They were not brothers, but had been captured from the same place. They had procured a bit of muslin that had probably been thrown away by some of the crew, and had placed it under his aching head for a pillow. For the fourteen days that the vessel had been under the charge of the present commander, they had been assiduous in their care; one or the other of them attending on him constantly, and keeping watch alternately at night for this purpose.

Five had been thrown over, dead, this morning, and many more apparently just expiring.

At a special meeting of some members of the Tabernacle Conference, it was resolved to take one hundred of the captives under the charge of the Mission. A subscription was opened on the spot which produced $135. It was resolved to select such as were between the ages of 10 and 17.

Mr. Benham in a letter describing a visit to the ship, mentions the dying boy and his attendants, and adds:

Through an interpreter, I commended them for their kindness to the little sufferer, and promised to take them to live with me, and they should bring with them their sick companion. I gave each a slip of paper with my name, directing them to keep them, so that I might know them when they landed.

The elder boys are brothers, the younger was from the same tribe.

During the night the little sick boy died, as did also several others, and was thrown into the sea. When the brothers arrived near the beach they plunged into the water (as all the captives were required to do) and washed themselves, but came out with the slips of paper clenched in their hands. One of these we have named John Wesley, the other David A. Shepard, and have taken them to educate.

On arriving at the beach small quantities of biscuit and water were given to the sufferers. When it was supposed the danger of depletion was over, water was poured into a log canoe, into which they plunged like hungry pigs into a trough, the stronger faring the best.

Near where I sat was a small pool of brackish water, in a state of stagnation; altogether unfit to be drunk; but on their discovering it they plunged into it, swallowing its black contents with great avidity.

Several of the citizens succeeded with threats and whips finally in driving them from it. In walking half a mile along the beach, several of them lay down to die, but were carried along by their suffering companions, or the citizens.

Mr Benham says the subscription would be offered again at the anniversary of the Liberia Conference Missionary Society, when it was hoped the $135 would be increased to $500. Of the 100 children taken by the mission 19 were girls.

Mr. Benham's letter concludes with a strong appeal to the Missionary board, and the friends of African Missions generally, to contribute money for the purpose of clothing, feeding and educating these unfortunate children.

THE GUILT OF OUR COUNTRY.—Charles H. Bell, commander of the Yorktown, in his official communication to the Secretary of the Navy, giving an account of the capture of the Slaver Pons, says:

"I regret to say that most of this misery is produced by our own countrymen; they furnish the means of conveyance in spite of existing enactments; and although there are strong circumstances against Berry, the late master of the 'Pons,' sufficient to induce me to detain him, if I should meet with him, yet I fear neither he nor his employers can be reached by our present laws. He will no doubt make it appear that the 'Pons' was beyond his control when the slaves were brought on board. Yet, from the testimony of the men who came over from Rio as passengers, there is no doubt that the whole affair was arranged at Rio between Berry and Gallano before the ship sailed. These men state that the first place they anchored was at Onin, near the river Lagos, in the Bight of Benin; here they discharged a portion of their cargo, and received on board a number of hogheads or pipes filled with water. These were stowed on the ground tier, and a tier of casks containing spirits were placed over them. They were then informed that the vessel was going to Kabiinda for a load of slaves.

On their arrival at the latter place, the spirit was kept on board until a few days before Berry gave up the command, covering up the water-casks in order to elude the suspicion of any cruiser. For twenty days did Berry wait in the roadstead of Kabiinda, protected by the flag of his country, yet closely watched by a foreign man-of-war, who was certain of his intention, but the instant that cruiser was compelled to withdraw for a few hours, he springs at the opportunity of enriching himself and owners, and disgracing the flag which had protected him."

The fact that these infernal slavers deem themselves peculiarly safe under the American flag should clothe our nation with blushes! So much for having a 'peculiar institution' with its hosts of Argus-eyed defenders to control and shape our legislation at their will! If there were an honest determination on our part to detect and punish such villainy, who believes that these slavers would dream of finding protection under our flag? And how can such a determination exist in a nation which hugs to its bosom the institution of which this traffic is but one of the natural fruits? Freemen of America! will you not consider these things!—N. Y. Tribune.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY IN TUNIS.

It gives us sincere pleasure to announce that his highness the Muschir Ahmed Bashaw Bey, of Tunis, has completely abolished the system of slavery throughout the whole of the territories subject to his control. This important event was officially communicated by this enlightened and humane prince to the British consul, Sir Thomas Reade, on the 22nd January last. It will be remembered that his Highness commenced this good work several years since; first, by emancipating his own personal slaves; then by destroying the slave markets throughout his dominions; and then by issuing a decree that all children born under his sway from the 8th of December, 1842, should be free. These things he did, to use his own words, "for the glory of mankind, and to distinguish them from the brute creation." The crowning act has at length taken place, and the Bey of Tunis, like the Queen of England, now reigns over a free people.

To Sir Thomas Reade this consummation of his earnest and honourable labours in the cause of suffering and oppressed humanity, must be a high reward. We cordially congratulate him on this noble triumph of the anti-slavery cause in northern Africa.

Nor can we forget on this occasion, another of our countrymen, Mr. James Richardson, who, in the early part of the year 1842, represented at Tunis, the British and Foreign, and its auxiliary, the Anglo-Maltese, Anti-Slavery Society. That gentleman has subsequently visited Morocco and Tripoli, pleading every where the cause of human freedom. Our last news from him is dated Ghadames, on the border of the great desert, the 18th of November, 1845, in which he states, "a caravan of forty slaves arrived here the day before yesterday, they were the property of the merchants of this city, and were distributed in twos and threes amongst the inhabitants. They were brought from Ghat by the Tonaricks. Some of them were quite children, and were so knocked up when they arrived that they could not walk. The caravan, with which I proceed for Soudan, starts to-morrow afternoon; I go regularly equipped in Moorish dress to prevent curiosity en route. With us go some Sonf Arabs to purchase slaves for Algiers!" Brit. and For. A. S. Reporter.

REJECTION OF SLAVE GROWN SUGAR BY THE ENGLISH GOVERNMENT.

The question of the sugar duties is likely to be again debated in Parliament. The note of preparation has been struck; and probably, a great effort will be made to open the British markets to the blood-stained produce of Cuba and Brazil. Our own opinions on this subject are too well known to need reproduction here. We both differ and agree with the contending parties in Parliament. We would have no difference in the amount of duties levied on sugars, whether imported into this country from the British Colonies and British India, or from foreign states where they are wholly produced by free labour. On the other hand we would prohibit the introduction of slave-grown produce come from what country it may. The interests of humanity, the progress of human liberty, and the extension of civilization and religion among men, appear to us peremptorily to require the application of these principles in our commercial intercourse with the nations of the earth.

Sir Robert Peel has announced it as the intention of Government, still to exclude the sugars of countries polluted with the slave-trade, and to maintain a differential duty between the produce of British and foreign possessions, where they are raised by free labour.

It is quite clear to us that until foreign free-labor sugar shall be allowed to come into full competition with our own, the necessary economy in its culture and manufacture will not be secured;—nor a full and adequate supply be obtained for the British market. At present nothing can be more wasteful, we had almost added more rude, than tropical agriculture. It therefore requires a strong stimulus to improve its character, and give it extension; and, at the same time to reduce its cost. We know what can be done by resident proprietors with capital and the requisite skill to apply it, without having recourse to the costly and unsatisfactory experiment of foreign labour, and we assert that with these, the exports of the British colonies might soon be doubled.

That the British government will maintain its position in reference to the sugars of Brazil and Cuba we entertain no doubt. Not only have we the assurance of Sir Robert Peel, that such will be the case; but the official correspondence laid, a few days since, on the tables of the House of Commons, respecting the sugars of Cuba and Porto Rico, is conclusive on this point.

And in maintaining this policy we are glad to perceive the government are likely to have the powerful aid of a nobleman whose virtues endear him to all classes of men in this country, and whose talents entitle him to the highest place among statesmen, Lord Morpeth.

His lordship has seen slavery face to face; he has been brought into personal contact with the victims of the slave trade; he has witnessed the horrors and degradation, the suffering and death connected with both; and is capable of appreciating the motives which influence, and the arguments which sustain, the conscientious recommendation of those who, like himself, would ever disconnect from all fellowship with the glorious cause of free trade, the blood-red flag of the slave trade.—British and Foreign A. S. Reporter.

The law passed last session for ameliorating the condition of slaves in the French colonies is a dead letter. That law amongst other things provided that the slaves who undertook to feed themselves should have the Saturday of every week given to them for that purpose. It appears that two gangs of slaves belonging to two planters of the names of Deslandes and Mareil, of Martinique, instead of working in their gardens hired themselves to a M. Delapalun, who employed from 150 to 200 of them, at 2 fr. 50 cts. the men, and 2 fr. the women for the day. Now, it happens that M. Delapalun is considered a dangerous man, from the fact of his being a declared abolitionist, and from his refusing to employ any other than free labor in the manufacture of his sugar. He is, moreover, a mulatto. The two planters referred to determined that their slaves should not work for him; but they having persisted in doing so, application was made to the mayor of the district, M. Delatouche, to grant them the assistance of a body of police, as they were resolved to punish them for disobedience of orders. The police were accordingly placed at their disposal, and the whole of these negroes, men and women, were cart-whipped to the extent of thirty-nine lashes each!

FREE COLORED PERSONS IN MISSOURI.

A case has recently been decided in St. Louis, of interest to colored men. Andrew Hatfield, a native of Pennsylvania, having lived in Missouri six years, without obtaining a license, according to the law of that State, was arrested and fined ten dollars. He was brought before Judge Krum, on a writ of habeas corpus, and a discharge contended for on the constitutional ground that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States," and also a resolution of Congress that the constitution of Missouri should not exclude the citizens of other States from their rights and privileges in that State. The discharge was granted. The question is a very similar one to those in which Massachusetts has a controversy with South Carolina and Louisiana.

A WHITE SLAVE.

A gentleman lately from Natchez, Miss., informs us that a few days before his departure, a gang of slaves, from Virginia, were sold in the vicinity of his boardinghouse. Among them was a lad, sixteen or seventeen years of age, who had a very light complexion, auburn hair and blue eyes. The opinion was freely expressed by those around the auction block, that the boy was of purely white descent. That consideration, however, did not deter the democratic republicans of Natchez from bidding for him. He was sold for about $300. Indiana Freeman.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Annual Meeting of the Free Produce Association of Friends.

The first annual meeting of this Association will be held in Clarkson Hall, Cherry street above Sixth, on 3d day evening, 4th mo., 4th, at 8 o'clock; being the week of Yearly Meeting. Friends of both sexes are invited to attend. A detailed report of the Board of Managers will be given at the meeting, showing the encumbrances they have met with in procuring free cotton, and the arrangements in progress for manufacturing it into various articles for clothing, and exhibiting testimonials of satisfaction from various Friends, within the limits of different yearly meetings, in relation to the objects of the Association. GEO. W. TAYLOR, Secretary.

AGENTS.—We are indebted to the kindness of many of our friends who have forwarded the boxes of subscribers, and we trust in such neighbourhood where our paper has been received, some one will be willing to act as Agent, and forward us his name. The terms will be found below.

CONTRIBUTIONS.

Those who feel disposed to assist the Free Produce Association in procuring and manufacturing free cotton, and in opening a store for the sale of free goods, will please contribute either in the way of a loan without interest, or donations to their fund for those objects. Such contributions will be received by either of the undersigned.

ELIhu PICKERING,
SAMUEL ALLISON, Jr.,
THOMAS WISTAR, JR.,
SAMUEL RHOADS,
GEO. W. TAYLOR.

Committee
on Finance.

THE LONDON FRIEND, now in its fourth year, has an extensive circulation in England and Ireland, and is rapidly increasing in America.

The principles of the Society of Friends and the most recent intelligence connected with it, are the chief objects of the Journal, but it is also the medium of sentiments and information on various philanthropic subjects, as well as respecting literary and other useful pursuits.

The London Friend is published on the 1st of every month, and leaves Liverpool by steamer on the 4th. Price two dollars per annum, including postage to America. Names of subscribers will be received by G. W. TAYLOR, Philadelphia; MAHLON DAY, New York; and SAMUEL BOYCE, Lynn, Massachusetts.

London, 24th 2d month, 1846.

HENRY LONGFORTH, Bookseller, Publisher and Stationer, No. 347 Market St. Philadelphia, has constantly on hand a large assortment of School, Juvenile, and Miscellaneous Books, and all kinds of Stationery, which he will furnish wholesale and retail at very low prices. He has published a number of very valuable works, which would be very suitable for gratuitous distribution by Tract Associations and private benevolent individuals; among them are brief accounts of William Bush, brief account of the late Elizabeth Fry; the Love Conquest, Sonnet's Oration on Peace, Porteus on Christian Revelation; also Thoughts on Holiness and Discipline, Life in the Inner World, Geographical, Historical, and other Lessons for memory.

For sale as above, Portrait of the late William Allen, and Jonathan Dymond.

FREE COTTON GOODS.

To accommodate Friends and others who wish to supply themselves with free cotton goods, but cannot conveniently give or lend money to aid in the manufacture, the Finance Committee of Friends' Free Produce Association, propose to receive from such individuals any sums of money they may choose to pledge, and furnish them with goods to the same amount when these are ready for sale.

ELIhu PICKERING,
S. ALLISON, Jr.,
THOMAS WISTAR, JR.,
GEO. W. TAYLOR,
SAMUEL RHOADS,
Committee.

FREE LABOR STORE.—The subscribers having purchased the stock, and fixtures of the store at the N. W. corner of Fifth and Cherry streets, of Lydia White, would respectfully inform the Friends and those who prefer using the produce of free labor, that he will continue the business as heretofore, and hopes by attention thereto, to merit and receive a continuance of the patronage bestowed on the former concern.

JOEL FISHER.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER is published on the first of each month, at One Dollar per annum, payable in advance, or six copies to one address for five dollars. It may be proper here to remark that pecuniary profit forms no part of our object, and that the whole amount of subscriptions which may be received after paying the expense of publication, will be devoted to the cause of emancipation.

ABRAHAM L. PENNOCK, SAMUEL RHOADS and GEORGE W. TAYLOR, Editors and publishers; either of whom will receive subscriptions, payments, and communications.

By decision of the Post Master General, the Non-Slaveholder is subject to newspaper postage only.

PRINTED AT

Merrihew & Thompson's Book and Job Office,
No. 7 Carter's Alley.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

"Whoso gives the motive, makes his brother's sin his own."

VOL. I.]

PHILADELPHIA, FIFTH MONTH, 1846.

[NO. 5.]

ASSOCIATED ACTION.

FREE PRODUCE ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDS.

The first Annual Meeting of the Free Produce Association of Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting was held at Clarkson Hall, on the evening of Fourth month 21st, 1846. The following were its principal transactions:

A report from the Board of Managers was read and approved.

The Treasurer's report, showing the financial operations of the Association since its commencement, was also presented and read.

A Committee was appointed to bring forward the names of officers to the next annual meeting. The officers now under appointment, not having served a year, were continued until then, being as follows: Secretary, George W. Taylor; Treasurer, Samuel Alsop; Managers, Enoch Lewis, Elihu Pickering, Abraham L. Pennock, Edward Garrett, Samuel Rhoads, Thomas Wistar, Jr., Samuel Allison, Jr., and Israel H. Johnson.

The above Committee was also directed to audit the Treasurer's account, previous to its presentation at the next annual meeting.

The time and place for holding that meeting was referred to the Board of Managers.

The Minutes of the Managers were submitted to the Association, but, from want of time, the reading of them, except so much as was contained in the report of the Manufacturing Committee, was dispensed with. From the report it appeared that the manufacture of upwards of 10,000 yards of cotton cloth had been contracted for, a small portion of which had been furnished, and most of the residue was now under process of being made. They consist mainly of the following descriptions of goods—Shirting and Sheeting Muslins, Prints, Apron and Bed Checks, Bed Ticking, Canton Flannel, Twilled Muslins, Ginghams and Pantaloon Stuffs.

The Managers were directed to publish their report for circulation, in such form as they should deem proper, and to request its insertion in the several papers conducted by Friends. The report is as follows:

TO THE FREE PRODUCE ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDS OF PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING.

In this First Annual Report, the managers may remark, that as little more than seven months have elapsed since their appointment, and their field of labor was in great measure unexplored, it may be presumed that the Association will not be disappointed if no very important consequences should yet appear as the result of their efforts.

Information of our Association and of the great object in view, as well as an outline of our plan of procedure, has been widely disseminated; in consequence of which, numerous testimonials of approbation of the object to which our labours are directed, and of the mode which we have adopted for diminishing the evils and curtailing the limits of slavery, have reached us from various quarters. A number of applications for a supply of cotton goods and groceries, obtained through the medium of free labour, have also been received, and the managers confidently believe that whenever the operations of this association shall become so far matured as to secure a supply exclusively through the instrumentality of free and compensated labour, of those articles which now reach the market through the medium of slave-labour, and the public at large can be clearly convinced that the goods which we offer to their acceptance are not, either wholly or in part, extorted from the drudgery of slaves, there will be no want of a demand. Though we may justly regret the general apathy which appears in regard to the iniquitous system of slavery, yet we are fully convinced that the people of these United States generally, are too much enlightened to regard the slavery of the African race with any other feelings than those of disapprobation. The people throughout the various sections of the Union are generally aware that this unrighteous system, on what side soever we view it, is obnoxious.

ious to unanswerable objections. But the products of slave labour are so blended with the common conveniences of life, and so completely interwoven with the commerce of our country, that few among us have the penetration to discover, or the resolution to pursue, the means of disentangling the connection.

The proposition announced in our circular of Sixth month last, that both slavery and the slave-trade, of which the citizens of Philadelphia have recently had such an appalling exhibition, owe their vitality to the market for the products of slave labour, appears too obvious for dispute; yet we have no doubt there are many, both in and out of our society, who apprehend that if they purchase groceries or cotton fabrics which are ostensibly the products of free labour, they may be actually supporting the system of slavery as fully as those who obtain similar articles which are avowedly produced by the labour of slaves, and be in addition to this, paying a bounty on falsehood. Now, we conceive, that all we need do to secure the custom of such purchasers as these, and of all others who are really conscientiously opposed to the slavery of our fellow-men, will be to secure such channels of communication as to furnish ourselves with satisfactory evidence that no deception has been practised upon us, and then to disseminate our information sufficiently in detail, to remove all reasonable doubt in regard to the purity of the channels through which the goods are obtained.

With a view to the first of these objects, this board, soon after its organization, opened a correspondence with several persons residing in various parts of the Union, making inquiry in regard to the channels through which a supply of free grown cotton might be obtained. Several sources afforded a reasonable prospect of a supply; but there was one which arrested our particular attention as it afforded an encouraging hope that through it we might not only procure a present supply, but obtain the requisite information for securing such further quantities as we hope the more extended operations of future years will require. We learned that two persons, residing in Indiana, upon whose integrity we might fully rely, had gone to the state of Mississippi, and expected to remain several weeks in a district where, as we had been previously informed, large quantities of cotton are cultivated exclusively by free labour.

The season for picking cotton having arrived, no time was to be lost, and at a special meeting of this Board, the Committee on Manufactures was authorised to engage those individuals to purchase about fifty bales. Though they were about leaving Mississippi when our communication was received, they immediately resolved to remain there and endeavour to execute the trust. The first picking, which contains the best cotton, had been chiefly sold, but they succeeded in engaging sixty-three bales. The gins being mostly owned by slaveholders and worked by slaves, some difficulty was experienced in getting this cotton cleared of the seed. But this difficulty was surmounted, partly by hiring gins and employing free men to perform the operation, and partly by engaging slaves to perform it during the Christmas holidays, and paying them in full for their services.

Our friends met with considerable trials, but the integrity of their motives sustained them, and they found many warm friends, who gave them efficient assistance, even among the holders of slaves. They became acquainted with several settlements in Mississippi, consisting of non-slaveholding farmers, in each of which from fifty to two hundred bales of cotton, raised by the hands of freemen, might be procured. These farms, lying in two or three counties, would furnish collectively, not less than six or eight hundred bales. Some difficulty, however, exists from a want of gins in suitable locations. In several instances, individuals appeared disposed to erect the necessary buildings and purchase gins, in case some pecuniary aid could be furnished on loan. One case presented so favourable an opportunity of procuring for the demands of next year, a supply of one hundred and fifty or two hundred bales at a single point, that our friends ventured upon an arrangement for supplying two or three hundred dollars towards purchasing a gin, intending to take the responsibility on themselves if declined by this Board. The subject being duly considered, we judged it consistent with our duty to support the measure, and accordingly authorized the Committee on Manufactures to advance the money on proper security, to be repaid in cotton as soon as practicable. At the date of our latest advices from Mississippi, the buildings were in progress, with an expectation that they would be ready for business early in the ensuing season.

Information from other parts of Mississippi, and from Georgia, Alabama and Tennessee, fully warrants a belief that many hundreds of bales of free grown cotton may, by proper exertions, be obtained from thence.

Of the sixty-three bales, purchased as above mentioned, fifty-two have arrived, and information has been received that the remaining eleven have been shipped at New Orleans. This cotton, as far as it has been examined, appears to be of excellent quality. Our Committee on Manufactures has been endeavouring to make arrangements for working it up, and nine of these bales, together with ten which we have furnished to the American Free Produce Association, are in possession of a manufacturer. We are not likely, however, to obtain immediately, the finer fabrics from this quarter, but hope to effect that object at no distant day.

A difficulty presents in the manufacturing department which is not necessarily connected with the business. A small quantity of cotton cannot be carried through the various operations of a mill, free from mixture with the products of slavery, without involving some additional expense. This difficulty would evidently be obviated by furnishing one or more mills with a sufficient quantity of free cotton to supply their whole demand. Several manufacturers have expressed a willingness to restrict their operations to free grown cotton in case they can obtain it at the usual price. As the cotton raised by free labour is now thrown into the markets undistinguished from the products of slave labour, they must be sold at the same price; consequently the only enhancement in the cost of the former must arise from the expense of keeping it, during its transit from the field to the manufacturer, separated from the produce of slavery. May we not reasonably hope that a very little time will enable us, with proper exertions, to create such a demand for the goods which come to us untouched by servile hands, that the very small advance in their cost, which may arise from the separate transmission of the raw material, will present no obstacle to their sale? In the first operation of the system which we have associated to establish and support, some pecuniary sacrifices must, unquestionably, be made, yet we confidently believe, that with proper care and perseverance, arrangements may be made, by which the free raw material may be furnished to the manufacturer at a very insignificant advance upon the cost of slave produce; and that the confidence of the community being gained in regard to the character of our fabrics, the demand for free goods will make it the interest of the manufacturers to produce them.

The attention of the Board has also been directed to the inquiry, from what places and through what channels other tropical products may be obtained; but upon this subject we are not prepared to make a detailed report. We may, however, observe that large quantities of free grown coffee are imported into this country from Java, Hayti, Laguayra, Maracaibo, &c. Rice is also brought from the East Indies and North Carolina, and sugar from Mexico, Laguayra, and other places where slavery is either not tolerated, or is in course of rapid extinction through the operation of laws enacted for its abolition. Maple sugar may also be obtained in considerable quantities from various parts of our own country, more particularly from Vermont. The establishment of a free produce store has likewise been kept in view, and we expect will be effected in a short time; there being already one free produce store in this city, which has been kept by an individual for several years past.

Agreeably to the direction of the Association at the meeting in 9th month, last, an address was prepared and forwarded soon after the organization of the Board, to the philanthropist Thomas Clarkson, acquainting him with our association, and the object which we have in view, together with a request for further information, if any remain in his possession, relative to the abstinence from sugar which took place in England about the year 1792, and its effect in promoting the abolition of the Anglo-African slave trade. Having recently ascertained that this address had not reached him, a copy has been forwarded. As we have been informed by a friend who saw him a few weeks ago, that, notwithstanding the infirmities of age, he was still able to write a letter with his own hand, we indulge a hope of yet receiving a communication from him.

In conformity to the provision contained in the 7th article of our Constitution, an Essay has been prepared by a committee of the Board, "On the duty of abstaining from the productions of slave labour, especially in reference to the destruction of human life which slavery occasions," and nearly five thousand copies have been distributed.

We have had the satisfaction to learn that some Friends in England have associated for the purpose of promoting the use, and furnishing a supply of articles which are produced by the labour of freemen. They have issued an address which has been extensively circulated in their country and ours. In this address they have brought into view the great increase of American cotton, and the cotemporary extension of slavery in the United States.

In allusion to these collateral and connected facts, they inquire, "shall we then continue to uphold and furnish an inducement for the maintenance of this vast system of crime and misery which we profess to deplore and abhor? Humanity, justice and religion," they add, "forbid us so to do; and we therefore confidently cherish the hope that as one means of discountenancing slavery, many of our countrymen and countrywomen will now be found willing and determined, as far as in them lies, to relinquish the use of American slave grown cotton.

Nor will they, we trust, be less resolute in reference to other articles, the produce of slave labour, among which we may specially reckon Carolina rice and tobacco in all its forms."

Our English Friends have already manufactured a variety of cotton goods, and kindly sent us samples of them. From this quarter we therefore hope to obtain a supply which, added to the fabrics produced from free cotton in our own country, may furnish a sufficient variety to meet our necessary demands, and facilitate the exclusion of the products of slave labour.

It will no doubt be satisfactory to the Association to be informed that the Committee of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society are now directing their energies to an attack upon slavery in its most vulnerable point; an effort to exclude from the markets of England every article which is produced by the labour of slaves. They have vigorously opposed every measure which they judged likely to extend the cultivation of tropical products by servile hands, and have turned their inquiries to the means of promoting the culture of those products by the labour of freemen. The committee have also used their influence with their own government to continue the discriminating duties which exclude from Great Britain the slave grown sugar of Cuba and Brazil, and we have the satisfaction to learn that the British Government, while it has recently proposed to reduce the duties on free sugar, has determined upon the continued exclusion of that which is produced in those countries by slave labour.

We find many indications that the attention of the people of England is seriously awakening to the consideration, that by their extensive consumption of the products of slave labour, they are largely contributing to the support and extension of slavery. In the Appendix to the Fifth Annual Report of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, they emphatically remark, "the time when the Southern States approached nearest to the abolition of slavery, was also the time when there was the smallest demand in England for their staple produce;" and that, "it is the demand for American cotton at Liverpool that rivets the chain of the slave." Can British abolitionists, can British Christians, acknowledging the truth of these declarations, continue their contributions to the maintenance of a demand so destructive to the morals, the happiness and the inalienable rights of their fellow men?

Before closing this Report, a few general observations may be subjoined. Not a year has yet passed away since the first meeting was held from which the formation of this Association may be dated. That meeting consisted of a very small number, and the early movements of our body were attended with various discouragements. Though the great truth that the most effectual mode of assailing the gigantic system of slavery is to destroy the market for the products of slave labour, appeared one of the clearest of self-evident truths, yet there were few who seemed willing to follow it in its practical results. In looking towards a supply of cotton goods, which the habits of our age and country have classed among the necessities of life, we beheld the Southern States under the domination of slaveholders and the land cultivated by slaves, with here and there a solitary planter, like an oasis in a desert, who raised a few bales of cotton by the labour of freemen. But almost simultaneously with our association, a powerful auxiliary appeared at our side. Our Friends in New York in their last Yearly Meeting, authorized the circulation amongst their meetings of an address advocating the principles which we have associated to maintain. This indicates an advance which can admit of no retrogression. We must also be greatly encouraged by the reflection that the very limited inquiries which we have found opportunity to make, have elicited an amount of information relative to the production of free grown cotton which is no less cheering than unexpected. The efforts of the English philanthropists have evidently given a direction to the movements of their nation from which the ultimate extinction of negro slavery throughout the civilized world may be anticipated as a possible, if not probable consequence. From these and other similar considerations, we apprehend there is ample encouragement to pursue the course on which we have commenced.

Fifty years ago the African slave trade was prosecuted under the British flag, and with the sanction of English law; now, a slave cannot breathe within the dominions of Victoria. Then the American Congress was constitutionally restricted from abolishing that detestable traffic; now the laws of the Union class the African slaver with pirates. The light of the nineteenth century has penetrated into many of the dark recesses of iniquity, and may we not hope that the sun of the twentieth will shine only on freemen?

But whether in the inscrutable dispensations of an All-wise and superintending Providence, American slavery may be allowed a longer or a shorter date, whilst the system continues, a field of labour must remain to enlist the energies of the friends of our race. Our individual responsibilities are not annihilated by the magnitude or extent of the evil, nor will the labours of those who are zealously devoting their powers of body and mind to promote the best and permanent interests of man, be eventually lost. The history of the past and the prospects of the future, forcibly inculcate the maxim, Cast thy seed upon moist places, for thou shalt find it after many days.

Signed by direction and on behalf of the Board of Managers.

SAMUEL RHOADS, Clerk.

Philada. 4th mo. 17th, 1846.

SELECTIONS.

From the Universalist Review.

JAMES NAYLER.

BY JOHN C. WHITTIER.

"You will here read the true story of that much impugned, ridiculed man, James Nayler; what dreadful sufferings, with what patience he endured, even to the forcing of the tongue with hot irons, without a murmur; and with what strength of mind, when the delusion he had fallen into, which they stigmatized as blasphemy, had given place to clearer thoughts, he could mirror his error in a strain of the beautifullest humility."—Essays of Elia.

"Would that Carlyle could now try his hand at the English Revolution!" was my exclamation, on laying down the last volume of his remarkable "History of the French Revolution," with its brilliant and startling word-pictures still flashing before my vision. To some extent this wish has been realized in the "Letters and Speeches of Oliver Cromwell." Yet I confess that the perusal of these volumes has disappointed me. Instead of giving himself free scope, as in the French Revolution, and transferring to his canvass all the wild and ludicrous, the terrible and beautiful phases of that moral phenomenon; he has concentrated all his artistic skill upon a single figure, whom he seems to have regarded as the embodiment and hero of the great event. All else in his canvass is subordinated to the grim image of the colossal Puritan. Intent upon presenting him as the fitting object of that "Hero-Worship," which in its blind admiration and adoration of more abstract Power seems to us at times a species of Devil-Worship; he dwells, casts into the shadow, nay, in some instances, caricatures and distorts the figures which surround him. To excuse Cromwell in his usurpation, Henry Vane, one of those exalted and noble characters, upon whose features the lights held by historical friends or foes detect no blemish, is dismissed with a sneer, and an utterly unfounded imputation of dishonesty.

To reconcile, in some degree, the glaring discrepancy between the declarations of Cromwell, in behalf of freedom of conscience, and that mean and cruel persecution of the Quakers, carried on under his sanction and authority, the generally harmless fanaticism of a few individuals, bearing that name, is gravely urged. Nay, the fact, that some weak-brained enthusiasts undertook to bring about the Millennium, by associating together, cultivating the earth, and "dibbling beans" for the New-Jerusalem market, is regarded by our author as the "germ of Quakerism," and furnishes an occasion for sneering at "my poor friend Dry-as-dust, lamentably tearing his hair over the intolerance of that old time to Quakerism and such likes."

The readers of this (with all its faults) powerfully written Biography, cannot fail to have been impressed with the intensely graphic description (Part I., vol. II., pages 184, 185, of the entry of the poor fanatic, James Nayler, and his forlorn and drugged companions into Bristol. Sadly ludicrous is it; affecting us like the actual sight of tragic insanity emitting its involuntary comedy, and making us smile through our tears.

In another portion of the work, a brief account is given of the trial and sentence of Nayler, also in the serio-comic view; and the poor man is dismissed with the simple intimation, that after his punishment he "repented," and confessed himself "mad." It was no part of the author's business, I am well aware, to waste time and words upon the history of such a man as Nayler; he was of no importance to him, otherwise than as one of the disturbing influences in the government of the Lord Protector. But to my mind the story of James Nayler has always been one of interest; and, in the belief that it will prove so to others, who, like Charles Lamb, can appreciate the beautiful humility of a forgiven spirit, I have been at some pains to collect and embody the facts of it.

James Nayler was born in the parish of Ardsley, in Yorkshire, 1616. His father was a substantial farmer, of good repute and competent estate; and he, in consequence, received a good education. At the age of twenty-two he married and removed to Wakefield parish, which has since been made classic ground by the pen of Goldsmith. Here, an honest, God-fearing farmer, he tilled his soil, and alternated between cattle-markets and independent conventicles. In 1641, he obeyed the summons of "my Lord Fairfax" and his Parliament, and joined a troop of horse composed of sturdy independents, doing such signal service against "the man of Belial, Charles Stuart," that he was promoted to the rank of quarter-minster, in which capacity he served under General Lambert, in his Scottish campaign. Disabled at length by sickness, he was honorably dismissed from the service, and returned to his family in 1649.

For three or four years he continued to attend the meetings of the Independents, as a zealous and devout member. But it so fell out, that in the winter of 1651, George Fox, who had just been released from a cruel imprisonment, in Darby jail, felt a call to set his face towards Yorkshire. "So travelling," says Fox, in his journal, "through the countries, to several places, preaching Repentance and the Word of Life, I came into the parts about Wakefield, where James Nayler lived." The worn and weary soldier, covered with the scars of outward battle, received, as he believed, in the cause of God and his people, against Anti-Christ and oppression, welcomed with thankfulness the veteran of another warfare; who, in conflict with "Principalities and powers, and spiritual wickedness in high places," had made his name a familiar one in any English hamlet. "He and Thomas Goodyear," says Fox, "came to me, and were both convinced and received the truth." He soon after joined the Society of Friends. In the spring of the next year he was in his field following his plough, and meditating, as he was wont, on the great questions of life and duty, when he seemed to hear a voice bidding him go out from his kindred and his father's house, with an assurance that the Lord would be with him, while laboring in his service. Deeply impressed, he left his employment, and, returning to his house, made immediate preparations for a journey. But hesitation and doubt followed; he became sick from anxiety of mind, and his recovery, for a time, was exceedingly doubtful. On his restoration to bodily health, he obeyed what he regarded as a clear intimation of duty, and went forth a preacher of the doctrine he had embraced. The independent minister of the society to which he had formerly belonged, sent after him the story, that he was the victim of sorcery; that George Fox carried with him a bottle, out of which he made people drink; and that the draught had the power to change a Presbyterian or Independent into a Quaker at once; that in short, the Arch-Quaker, Fox, was a wizard, and could be seen at the same moment of time riding on the same black horse, in two places widely separated! He had scarcely commenced his exhortations, before the mob, excited by such stories, assailed him. In the early summer of the year we hear of him in Appleby jail. On his release he fell in company with George Fox. At Walsay island he was furiously assaulted, and beaten with clubs and stones; the poor priest-led fishermen being fully persuaded that they were dealing with a wizard. The spirit of the man, under these circumstances, may be seen in the following extract from a letter to his friends, dated at "Killett, in Lancashire, the 30th of 8th month, 1652."

"Dear friends! Dwell in patience, and wait upon the Lord who will do His own work. Look not at man who is in the work, nor at man opposing it; but rest in the will of the Lord that so ye may be furnished with patience, both to do and to suffer what ye shall be called unto, that your end in all things may be His praise. Meet often together; take heed of what exalteth itself above its brother; but keep low, and serve one another in love."

Laboring thus, interrupted only by persecution, stripes and imprisonment, he finally came to London and spoke with great power and eloquence in the meetings of Friends in that city. Here, he for the first time found himself surrounded by admiring and sympathizing friends. He saw, and rejoiced in the fruits of his ministry. Profane and drunken cavaliers, intolerant Presbyterians, and Blind Papists, owned the truths which he uttered, and counted themselves his disciples. Women, too, in their deep trustfulness, and admiring reverence, sat at the feet of the eloquent stranger. Devout believers in the doctrine of the inward light and manifestation of God in the heart of man, these latter, at length, thought they saw such unmistakable evidences of the true life in James Nayler, that they felt constrained to declare that Christ was, in an especial manner, within him, and to call upon all to recognize in reverent adoration this new incarnation of the Divine and Heavenly. The wild enthusiasm of his disciples had its effect on the teacher. Weak in body, worn with sickness, fastings, stripes, and prison-penance, and naturally credulous and imaginative, is it strange that in some measure he yielded to this miserable delusion? Let those who would harshly judge him, or ascribe his fall to the peculiar doctrines of this sect, think of Luther, engaged in personal combat with the devil, or conversing with him on points of theology in his bed-chamber, or of Bunyan at actual fisty-cuffs with the adversary; or of Fleetwood, and Vane and Harrison millenium-mad, and making preparations for an earthly reign of King Jesus. It was an age of intense religious excitement. Fanaticism had become epidemic. Cromwell ewayed his parliaments by "revelations" and Scripture phrases in the painted chamber—stout generals and sea-captains exterminated the Irish, and swept Dutch navies from the ocean, with old Jewish war-cries, and hymns of Deborah and Miriam; country justices charged juries in Hebraisms, and cited the laws of Palestine oftener than those of England. Poor Nayler found himself in the very midst of this seething and confused moral Maelstrom. He struggled against it for a time; but human nature was weak; he became, to use his own words, "bewildered and darkened," and the floods went over him.

Leaving London with some of his more zealous followers, not without solemn admonition and rebuke from Francis Howgill and Edward Burrough, who at that period were regarded as the most eminent and gifted of the Society's ministers, he bent his steps towards Exeter. Here, in consequence of the extravagance of his language and that of his disciples, he was arrested and thrown into prison. Several talented women, surrounded the jail, declaring that "Christ was in prison," and on being admitted to see him knelt down and kissed his feet, exclaiming, "Thy name shall be no more called James Nayler, but Jesus!" Let us pity him and them. They, full of grateful and extravagant affection for the man whose voice had called them away from worldly vanities, to what they regarded as eternal realities, whose hand they imagined had for them swung back the pearl gates of the celestial city, and flooded their atmosphere with light from heaven; he, receiving their homage, (not as offered to a poor weak, sinful Yorkshire trooper, but rather to the hidden man of the heart, the "Christ within" him,) with that self-deceiving humility which is but another name for spiritual pride. Mournful, yet natural: such as is still in greater or less degree manifested between the Catholic enthusiast and her confessor; such as the careful observer may at times take note of in our Protestant revivals and camp-meetings.

How Nayler was released from Exeter jail does not appear, but the next we hear of him, is at Bristol, in the fall of the year. His entrance into that city shows the progress which he and his followers had made in the interval. Let us look at Carlyle's description of it. "A procession of eight persons—one, a man on horseback riding single, the others men and women partly riding double, partly on foot in the muddest highway in the wettest weather; singing, all but the single rider, at whose bridle walk and splash two women, Hosannah! Holy, holy! Lord God of Sabaoth!" and other things, "in a buzzing tone," which the impartial hearer could not make out. The single rider is a raw-boned male figure "with lank hair reaching below his cheeks," hat drawn close over his brows, "nose rising slightly in the middle," of abrupt "down look," and large dangerous jaws strictly closed: he sings not, sits there covered, and is sung to by the others bare. Amid pouring deluges and mud-knee-deep, "so that the rain ran in at their necks and vented it at their hose and breeches," a spectacle to the West of England and posterity! Singing as above; answering no question except in song. From Bedminster to Ratcliffgate, along the streets to the High Cross of Bristol; at the High Cross they are laid hold of by the authorities: turn out to be James Nayler and Company."

Truly, a more pitiful example of "hero worship" is not well to be conceived of. Instead of taking the rational view of it, however, and mercifully shutting up the actors in a mad-house, the authorities of that day conceiving it to be a stupendous blasphemy, and themselves God's avengers in the matter, sent Nayler under strong guard up to London, to be examined before the parliament. After long and tedious examinations and cross-questionings, and still more tedious debates, some portion of which, not uninteresting to the reader may still be found in "Burton's Diary," the following horrible resolution was agreed upon:

"That James Nayler be set in the pillory, with his head in the pillory in the Palace Yard, Westminster, during the space of two hours on Thursday next; and be whipped by the hangman through the streets, from Westminster to the Old Exchange, and there, likewise, be set in the pillory, with his head in the pillory for the space of two hours, between eleven and one, on Saturday next, in each place wearing a paper containing a description of his crimes; and that at the Old Exchange his tongue be bored through with a hot iron, and that he be there stigmatized on the forehead with the letter 'H'; and that he be afterwards sent to Bristol to be conveyed into and through the said city on horseback with his face backward, and there, also, publicly whipped the next market day after he comes thither; that from thence he be committed to prison in Bridewell, London, and there restrained from the society of all people, and there to labor hard until he shall be released by parliament; and during that time be debarred the use of pen, ink and paper; and have no relief except what he earns by his daily labor."

Such, neither more nor less, was, in the opinion of parliament, required on their part to appease the Divine vengeance. The sentence was pronounced on the 17th of the Twelfth Month; the entire time of the parliament for the two months previous having been occupied with the case. The Presbyterians in that body were ready enough to make the most of an offence committed by one who had been an Independent; the Independents, to escape the stigma of extenuating the crimes of one of their quondam brethren, vied with their antagonists in shrieking over the atrocity of Nayler's blasphemy, and in urging its severe punishment. Here and there among both classes were men disposed to leniency; and more than one earnest plea was made for merciful dealing with a man, whose reason was evidently unsettled; and who was, therefore, a fitting object of compassion; whose crime, if it could indeed be called one, was evidently the result of a clouded intellect, and not of wilful intention of evil. On the other hand, many were in favor of putting him to death as a sort of peace-offering to the clergy, who, as a matter of course, were greatly scandalized by Nayler's blasphemy; and still more by the refusal of his sect to pay tithes, or recognize their Divine commission.

Nayler was called into the parliament-house to receive his sentence. "I do not know mine offence," he said mildly. "You shall know it," said Sir Thomas Widdington, "by your sentence." When the sentence was read, he attempted to speak, but was silenced. "I pray God," said Nayler, "that He may not lay this to your charge."

The next day, the 18th of the Twelfth Month, he stood in the pillory two hours, in the chill winter air, and was then stripped and scourged by the hangman at the tail of a cart through the streets. Three hundred and ten stripes were inflicted; his back and arms were horribly cut and mangled, and his feet crushed and bruised by the feet of horses treading on him in the crowd. He bore all with uncomplaining patience; but was so far exhausted by his sufferings, that it was found necessary to postpone the execution of the residue of the sentence for one week. The terrible severity of his sentence, and his meek endurance of it, had in the meantime powerfully affected many of the humane and generous of all classes in the city; and a petition for the remission of the remaining part of the penalty was numerously signed and presented to parliament. A debate ensued upon it, but its prayer was rejected. Application was then made to Cromwell, who addressed a letter to the speaker of the house, inquiring into the affair, protesting an "abhorrence and detestation of giving or occasioning the least countenance to such opinions and practices" as were imputed to Nayler, "yet, we being entrusted in the present government on behalf of the people of these nations; and not knowing how far such proceeding entered into wholly without us may extend in the consequence of it, do hereby desire the house may let us know the grounds and reasons whereon they have proceeded." From this, it is not unlikely that the Protector might have been disposed to clemency, and to look with a degree of charity upon the weakness and errors of one of his old and tried soldiers who had striven like a brave man, as he was, for the rights and liberties of Englishmen; but the clergy here interposed, and vehemently, in the name of God and His Church, demanded that the executioner should finish his work. Five of the most eminent of them, names well known in the Protectorate, Caryl, Marston, Nye, Griffith and Reynolds, were deputed by parliament to visit the mangled prisoner. A reasonable request was made, that some impartial person might be present, that justice might be done Nayler in the report of his answers. This was refused. It was, however, agreed that the conversation should be written down and a copy of it left with the jailer. He was asked, if he was sorry for his blasphemies. He said he did not know to what blasphemies they alluded; that he did believe in Jesus Christ; that He had taken up His dwelling in his own heart, and for the testimony of Him he now suffered. "I believe," said one of the ministers, "in a Christ who was never in any man's heart." "I know no such Christ," rejoined the prisoner, "the Christ I witness to fill Heaven and Earth, and dwells in the hearts of all true believers." On being asked, why he allowed the women to adore and worship him, he said, he "denied bowing to the creature; but if they beheld the power of Christ, wherever it was, and bowed to it, he could not resist it, or say aught against it."

After some further parley the reverend visitors grew angry, threw the written record of the conversation in the fire, and left the prison, to report the prisoner incorrigible.

On the 27th of the month he was again led out of his cell and placed upon the pillory. Thousands of citizens were gathered around—many of them earnestly protesting against the extreme cruelty of his punishment. Robert Rich, an influential and honorable merchant, followed him up to the pillory, with expressions of great sympathy, and held him by the hand while the red-hot iron was pressed through his tongue, and the brand was placed on his forehead. He was next sent to Bristol, and publicly whipped through the principal streets of that city; and again brought back to the Bridewell prison, where he remained about two years, shut out from all intercourse with his fellow-beings. At the expiration of this period he was released by order of parliament. In the solitude of his cell he said the angel of patience had been with him. Through the cloud which had so long rested over him, the clear light of truth shone in upon his spirit; the welling chaos of a disordered intellect, settled into the calm peace of a reconciliation with God and man. His first act on leaving prison was to visit Bristol, the scene of his melancholy fall. There he publicly confessed his errors, in the eloquent earnestness of a contrite spirit, humbled in view of the past, yet full of thanksgiving and praise for the great boon of forgiveness. A writer who was present says, the "assembly was tendered, and broken into tears; there were few dry eyes, and many were bowed in their minds."

In a paper, which he published soon after, he acknowledges his lamentable delusion. "Condemned forever," he says, "be all those false worshipers with which any have idolized my person in that Night of my Temptation, when the Power of Darkness was above me—all that did in any way tend to dishonor the Lord, or draw the minds of any from the measure of Christ Jesus in themselves, to look at flesh, which is as grass, or to ascribe that to the visible which belongs to Him." "Darkness came over me through want of watchfulness and obedience to the pure Eye of God. I was taken captive from the true light: I was walking in the Night, as a wandering bird fit for a prey. And if the Lord of all my mercies had not rescued me, I had perished; for I was as one appointed to death and destruction, and there was none to deliver me." "It is in my heart to confess to God, and before men, my folly and offence in that day: yet there were many things formed against me in that day, to take away my life, and bring scandal upon the truth, of which I was not guilty at all." "The provocation of that Time of Temptation was exceeding great against the Lord: yet he left me not; for when Darkness was above, and the Adversary so prevailed, that all things were turned and perverted against my right seeing, hearing, or understanding; only a secret hope and faith I had in my God, whom I had served, that he would bring me through it, and to the end of it; and that I should again see the day of my redemption from under it all; and this quieted my soul in its greatest tribulation." He concludes his confession with these words: "He who hath saved my soul from death—who hath lifted my feet up out of the pit, even to Him be glory forever; and let every troubled soul trust in Him, for His mercy endureth forever!"

Among his papers, written soon after his release, is a remarkable prayer, or rather thanksgiving. The limit I have prescribed to myself will only allow me to copy an extract

"It is in my heart to praise Thee, O my God; let me never forget Thee, what Thou hast been to me in the night, by Thy presence in my hour of trial, when I was beset in darkness; when I was cast out as a wandering bird; when I was assaulted with strong temptations, then Thy presence, in secret, did preserve me; and in a low state I felt Thee near me: when my way was through the sea; when I passed under the mountains there wast Thou present with me; when the weight of the hills was upon me Thou upholdest me. Thou didst fight, on my part, when I wrestled with death; when darkness would have shut me up Thy light shone about me; when my work was in the furnace, and I passed through the fire, by Thee I was not consumed. When I beheld the dreadful visions, and was among the fiery spirits, Thy faith stayed me, else through fear I had fallen. I saw Thee, and believed, so that the enemy could not prevail." After speaking of his humiliation and sufferings, which Divine Mercy had overruled, for his spiritual good, he thus concludes: "Thou didst lift me out from the pit, and set me forth in the sight of my enemies; Thou proclaimedst liberty to the captive; Thou calledst my acquaintances near me; they to whom I had been a wonder, looked upon me; and in Thy love I obtained favor with those who had deserted me. Then did gladness swallow up sorrow, and I forsook my troubles; and I said, How good is it that man be proved in the night, that he may know his folly, that every mouth may become silent, until Thou makest man known unto himself, and hast slain the boaster, and shown him the vanity which vexeth Thy spirit."

All honor to the Quakers of that day, that at the risk of misrepresentation and calumny, they received back to their communion, their greatly erring, but deeply repentant brother. His life, ever after, was one of self-denial and jealous watchfulness over himself—blameless and beautiful in its humility and lowly charity. In the latter part of the 8th month 1660, he left London, on foot, to visit his wife and children in Wakefield. As he journeyed on, the sense of a solemn change about to take place, seemed with him—the shadow of the Eternal world fell over him. As he passed through Huntingdon, a friend who saw him, describes him as "in an awful and weighty frame of mind, as if he had been redeemed from earth, and a stranger off it, seeking a better home and inheritance." A few miles beyond the town he was found, in the dusk of the evening, very ill, and was taken to the house of a friend, who lived not far distant. He died shortly after, expressing his gratitude for the kindness of his friends, and invoking blessings upon them. About two hours before his death, he spoke to the friend at his bed-side these remarkable words—solemn as Eternity, and beautiful as the love which fills it:

"There is a spirit which I feel which delights to do no evil, nor to avenge any wrong; but delights to endure all things, in hope to enjoy its own in the end: its hope is to outlive all wrath and contention, and to weary out all exultation and cruelty, or whatever is of a nature contrary to itself. It sees to the end of all temptations; as it bears no evil in itself, so it conceives none in thought to any other: if it be betrayed it bears it, for its ground and spring is the mercy and forgiveness of God. Its crown is meekness; its life is everlasting love undivided; it takes its kingdom with entreaty, and not with contention, and keeps it by lowliness of mind. In God alone it can rejoice, though none else regard it, or can own its life. It is conceived in sorrow, and brought forth with none to pity it; nor doth it murmur at grief and oppression. It never rejoiceth but through sufferings, for with the world's joy it is murdered. I found it alone, being forsaken. I have fellowship therein with them who lived in dens and desolate places of the earth, who through death obtained resurrection and eternal Holy Life."

So died James Nayler. He was buried in "Thomas Parnell's burying ground, at King's Rippen," in a green nook of rural England. Wrong and violence, and temptation and sorrow, and evil-speaking, could reach him no more. And in taking leave of him, let us say, with old Joseph Wyeth, where he touches upon this case in his Anglia Evangelica: "Let none insult, but take heed lest they also, in the hour of their temptation, do fall away."

From the [London] Anti-Slavery Reporter.

The precarious nature of our present relations with the United States has awakened the attention of British politicians to the great importance of obtaining cotton wool from sources which would render England wholly independent of that country for its supplies. At the present time, it may be said, that the largest and most lucrative branch of our home trade, as well as our foreign commerce, would be exposed to serious hazards, should hostilities unhappily break out between the two countries. As the friends of peace—of permanent and universal peace, and in view of those higher considerations which should influence civilized and Christian men, we not only deprecate war, but would use our utmost exertions to prevent it. War, as it is the greatest evil that can afflict nations during its continuance, is also the greatest crime that they can perpetrate. War, under any pretence, between Great Britain and the United States, would be especially criminal, owing as they do, their origin to a common ancestry, speaking a common language, professing the same religion, and linked together by a thousand ties, which ought never to be broken. We trust divine Providence will so guide their counsels as that peace may be maintained; and the cause of difficulty be amicably and honorably removed.

It is not, however, on the ground of our present relations with the United States, important as that may be in the eyes of politicians, that we should seek our supplies of cotton wool from other countries, but because, in the cultivation of that article, the liberty of nearly three millions of our fellow creatures is trodden under foot, and a despotism, at once the most sordid and the most cruel, built up and consolidated. Who can reflect for a moment on the law and the practice of slavery in the United States without the utmost abhorrence, and without feeling it to be a sacred duty to use every legitimate means for its overthrow?

Our commercial intercourse with the United States has hitherto strengthened the institution of slavery. It has given a new edge to the weapons of oppression, and force to the arms that wielded them. Let us henceforth adopt a wiser and more humane policy, and determine to cripple and destroy that evil to which we have hitherto unhappily given a giant's power.

It is satisfactory to know that cotton wool can now be obtained in large quantities, and of good quality, from various parts of the world, the produce of free labor. British India already sends a large supply to this country and China, and that can be extended to an indefinite extent when the means of cheap and easy transit from the interior to the coast shall be secured by railroads and steam navigation on the rivers. Dr. Wight, the superintendent of the Government Cotton Farms, in the Madras Presidency, in a late communication to the Morning Chronicle, speaks in the most confident terms of the successful results of the late experiment with American cotton seed in Southern India. This gentleman says: "In answer to the prevalent opinion among Americans, that all attempts to cultivate American cotton in India has failed, I am now able to state, as the result actually obtained in the course of our experiment during two consecutive years, and neither of these favourable ones, that our lands, when sown at the proper season, are capable of yielding from 1000 to 1200 pounds per acre." In reference to quality, Dr. Wight observes: "As regards the quality of Indian grown American cotton, I believe that the crop now picking is not inferior to any New Orleans grown on the banks of the Mississippi." And with respect to quantity, he adds: "India is well able to respond to the call of the English manufacturers for supplies. The four southern provinces of the Peninsula—Coimbatore, Salem, Madurai, and Tinnevely—all cotton growing districts, include an area of above 28,500 square miles, 4,000 of which might, nay would, be annually under cotton cultivation in the event of a rise in the price of only one farthing per pound in the local markets. These 4,000 square miles, a mere fraction of India, would, at the rate of 100 pounds per acre of clean cotton, produce 256,000,000 pounds, or more than half the quantity required for home consumption, and that without in the slightest degree interfering with the production of food for their inhabitants." Such being the fact in Southern India, we may add that a still more copious supply can be had from Central India, where experiments in American cotton planting have been carried on with equal if not superior success. We may instance Dharwar in particular, where we learn from the American superintendent that, not only has he completely realized the object the government had in view on the experimental farms, but that the native cotton growers which surround him, are fast imitating his improved mode of cultivation, and purchase all his spare seed. In this district cotton wool can be purchased at one penny per pound. We may add to these gratifying facts, that, in the neighborhood of Dacca, once so celebrated for its beautiful cotton fabrics, a long staple cotton wool has been raised of the most beautiful texture; and there can be no doubt that on the Delta of the Ganges long staple cotton can be grown which shall rival that from the United States. What is wanted is British capital, enterprise, and skill, to effect a complete revolution in our cotton trade, both with respect to supply and cost. Manchester itself can provide all this without difficulty.

Another writer in the Chronicle points out the immense good that would result to the people of India if the growth of cotton wool were extensively promoted. "India," he says, "wants railroads, those grand arteries of civilization, which send with life-full energy the blood from the centre to the circumference of all classes, kinds, and condition of aggregated bodies, to stimulate her industry, to fully develop her resources. He further observes: "In the Report of the Bombay Chamber of Commons, we find that the traffic to and from that city amounts to 187,343 tons annually, consisting chiefly of cotton and salt. Bombay is unapproachable, except by a dangerous sea-board, and she sadly wants a medium of easy communication with the great cotton growing districts of the interior. Cotton has now to be transported 500 miles to the coast to reach Bombay for shipment. Here is necessity the first—strong, palpable, and convincing—of the want of railway communication. Some idea may be formed of the destruction and delay occasioned by these long journeys, when we state that the cotton is carried on the backs of oxen at the rate of ten miles a day, which enormously augments its shipping price. The present cost of conveyance is from £14 to £20 per ton, and the charge by railway need not exceed 2d. per ton, per mile, which would amount to about £4. 5s. an enormous difference." Without attributing, as this writer does, so much to railroads, we perfectly agree with him that by reducing the cost of transit, and the saving of human labor and time, they will confer an immense boon on India, and enable it to bring its cotton to market not only in better condition, but at so low a price as effectually to compete with the slave labor produce of America, and we trust to beat it out of the market. Let that be done, and the doom of American slavery is sealed.

Under present circumstances, with all the burdens upon the land, and restraints upon the industry of the natives, and the cost of transport, to which it is gratifying to know the home government is not indifferent, India sends us at present enough cotton wool annually to keep the price of that from the United States at a low figure, and to supersede to a considerable extent, the cotton formerly received from Brazil. And a still further increase in our supplies from India may be anticipated.

Since the last report of Dr. Wight, it appears, 30,000 acres had been put into cultivation, whilst from one acre alone the produce was 700 pounds, and more was to be expected. All that is now wanted to make East India cotton a most valuable export commodity, is the employment of European agents in the India markets to select the best qualities.

INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.—The following is the 4th section of the bill to protect the rights of American settlers in Oregon, which was read in the House of Representatives at Washington, on the 17th ult.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That provision shall hereafter be made by law to secure and grant to every white person, male or female, over the age of eighteen years, three hundred and twenty acres of land; and to every white person, male or female, under the age of eighteen years one hundred and sixty acres of land, who shall have resided in the said territory described in the first section of this act for five consecutive years, to commence within three years from the passage of this act.

Mr. Giddings moved to strike out the word "white." The motion was lost. Subsequently, Mr. Winthrop, of Massachusetts, moved to add to the bill the following section:—

And be it further enacted, That involuntary servitude, except for crimes, shall not exist in the territory of the United States to which this bill relates.

Mr. Tilden moved to add to the section the following:—

"And no distinction shall be made in said territory on account of color." This was lost.

And the question was put on Mr. Winthrop's amendment, and it was also lost; Ayes 59, noes 67.

JAMAICA.—Cotton.—We have seen some samples of very beautiful cotton, grown during the past season in St. Andrew's, by Henry Gourgues, Esq., of this city. It appears that Mr. Gourgues has kept in cultivation a small nursery of cotton trees for the last three years, during which period he, each season, has produced beautiful samples. Three years ago, Mr. Gourgues exported the crop of 19½ acres of the staple, and which yielded him a profit of more than £11 per acre. It is indeed a pity that some of our enterprising agriculturists do not engage in the cotton culture. It would, we are assured, be productive of a large return for the outlay, and would prove, that even without growing sugar and coffee our island is a valuable appendage to the British crown.—Palm-mouth Post.

PORTUGAL.—The most important subject introduced amongst the Papers since last packet, was a project of law presented by the Duke of Palmella, Conde Lavradio, and Conde Sade Bandeira, for the suppression of slavery in the Portuguese Colonies. The first article declares all children born of slaves to be free from the passing of the present law. The third article declares that all slaves belonging to the state are immediately free. The fifth, that the slaves of private individuals will be free in three years from the passage of the law, the owners to receive indemnity either in money or bills, gradually admissible in the Colonial Custom houses. This project of law has not yet been discussed.—London Morning Chronicle.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, FIFTH MONTH 1, 1846.

FIRST ANNUAL MEETING OF THE FREE PRODUCE ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDS OF PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING.—By the request of the Board of Managers of this association we insert their report in our present number, with a synopsis of the proceedings of the association at its late annual meeting. We trust no apology is needed to our readers for thus appropriating so many of our columns. If the rejection of slave productions is admitted to be a duty, it becomes important, and indeed imperative, that proper measures should be adopted to furnish a supply of similar articles, so far as they are necessary, produced by the labour of freemen. We regard this association, therefore, as an essential means in promoting the system which we would establish as a substitute for that of slavery.

The meeting at Clarkson Hall on the evening of the 21st of last month, was attended by a large number of Friends, the house being well filled. The proceedings of the Managers were approved, and appeared to give great satisfaction and encouragement to those present. Several strangers were in attendance from other Yearly Meetings, and it was peculiarly gratifying to have the company of our friends Josiah Forster, George Stacey and John Allen, from England. The two first have long been members of the Committee of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, which has exerted a powerful influence in sustaining the discriminating duties by which the slave-made sugars of Cuba and Brazil are shut out from the English market; and we trust our dear friends will be found, when they return to their homes, not only the advocates of the rejection of slave products by their government, but efficient co-labourers with their fellow-members, whose address we published in the third number of the Non-Slaveholder.

The goods manufactured for the Association will, at present, be deposited with and offered for sale by Thomas S. Field & Co., No. 38 North Front Street, up stairs; for whose advertisement we refer the reader to the appropriate column of this journal.

SLAVERY ABOLISHED BY ABSTINENCE FROM ITS PRODUCTS.—At the late Free Produce Meeting, some friends from a distance, who were acceptably present and gladly heard, expressed in terms of approval their views in regard to the objects of the association. A suggestion, however, was thrown out by one of them, in the course of his remarks, which called for a brief notice near the close of the meeting, and to which we would now further advert. It was this: that whilst we should certainly and carefully persevere in carrying out the purposes of our association, we should avoid being "so occupied by abstinence as to neglect the great means of abolishing slavery." These means were understood, from the connection, to be those which are usually resorted to by abolitionists for effecting the overthrow of that evil.

We do not object to the duty of using all means which are just and moral for accomplishing that desirable end. On the contrary, we affirm the duty, and would earnestly invite to a full occupation of the means. We object, however, to the comparison which makes abstinence from the products of slavery an inferior instrumentality in the great work of abolition, and we claim for it a more prominent position. A disconnection from the use of these products has been too much treated as a mere austerity practised by individuals in view of a special call to it; and having for its sole end a trial of their faith in the abandonment of comforts otherwise lawful! This view has made the practice less frequent; is the weak apology for its omission; and has led to the further sentiment, that it is not a mode by which any decided impression can be made upon slavery. Our idea is widely different from this. While we believe that the maintenance of a pure conscience leads to the avoidance of all connection with evil, simply because such connection is wrong, and that abstinence should be primarily founded on a sense of the duty of individual purity, independent of its ulterior effects, just as Honesty is to be pursued apart from a consideration of its policy, its effects we consider, would, not the less, make a startling impression upon slavery.

We believe that it is abstinence only which can rightly concentrate, direct and give force to every other anti-slavery operation. Its foundation upon the rock of conscience and self-sacrifice is sure. They who embrace it, should their best devised schemes fail, have something more than mere expediency to fall back upon. They have a predetermined impregnable defence, behind which to rally their forces, and from which, with renewed confidence and power, to press on to victory. The call to that rally is so clear that it needs no might of intellect, but only a pure heart that will heed—to hear it. The very child that plays around its mother's knee will acknowledge its power, and shun with noble heroism continual temptations to violate it. It is so free from passion in its nature that its opposers can have no plea for passionately contending against it. They who embrace it in truth must ever press forward with the steady even tread of conscious might, which cannot be foiled by any human power. The slave-master can find no false position or inconsistency to carp at in its advocacy. He cannot even raise the common cry of interference against those whose first object is to keep pure their own souls. The Principle and Deed are perfect in their nature. They cover him who bears them with an armor that the finest Damascus steel of the adversary cannot penetrate, and give him a weapon which pride and love of power cannot long resist. His acts plead when his words are unheeded. They are a silent yet ever stern rebuker of him who, knowing slavery, palliates or upholds it. They call in trumpet tones upon those who know little of it to examine it thoroughly. Abstinence guarantees and ensures the sincerity of him who abstains, and confirms his endurance in the faith. It constantly reminds him that above his money making are claims of suffering humanity that cannot lightly be put aside. It elevates his love to higher pleasures than those of the body. It purifies the whole man, and gives to his other testimony against slavery a noble cast. Not for strife, not for division, does the self-sacrificing man plead for the truth, but that the Truth may be over all. It holds up to the planter no bribe by which Northerners are wont to seduce Southerners to buy, and whip, and make naked, and starve, and insult, and degrade, and hydrate men. It is two-edged, cutting off the inducement to hold slaves, and laying bare to the quickening truth the conscience of him who holds them. By creating a great and increasing, and sure market for free-grown goods, it offers a bounty to the tens of thousands of non-slaveholders at the South to keep heart and hand clear of the unholy system. It will thus raise up and maintain, in the midst of the cotton and sugar plantations and rice swamps, a body of practical abolitionists, such as we firmly believe no other anti-slavery instrumentality can effect. It will not wait for the slow progress of anti-slavery sentiments which are now being transmitted from the heads of the men of Ohio into those of Kentucky, and by them into those of Tennessee, and by them, finally, into the hearts of the men of the far South; but from the high, pure sky of Truth, it will pour down its blaze of light immediately into the darkest nooks of slave-dom. On every fifty acre free-labor farm, and by every free-labor cotton gin it shall give to the breeze its banner, beneath whose folds shall rally the stout hearts of poor men, who have no large investments and no old family aristocracy to warp them from the pure truth. By it, no more shall the small farmers of the South move by thousands yearly to the far West, to a land where labor is respectable and profitable. By it shall the hardy enterprising children of Pennsylvania, and New York and Massachusetts, go into the south land, and dwell among her effeminate children, and imbue them with their sentiments. Thus shall Despotism be precluded from concentrating her power in the hands of a few wealthy individuals, as she now bids fair to do, and to build up for herself a tower of defence so connected and strong that nothing short of Divine interference shall be able to rend one stone from its walls. And finally—the abolition which abstinence produces is not that which removes the evil into remoter regions without eradicating it; but it is one co-extensive with the wrong, and competent to its destruction every where; by withdrawing the inducement for its perpetration anywhere. It is an ever-productive abolition, constantly yielding results commensurate with its exertion—not lost in its humblest effort, but carrying relief to some sufferer or sufferers; in its greatest, proclaiming liberty to all. It is a Christian, cross-bearing Abolition, assailing the corrupt tree, by laying the axe to the root of it; which, severed or even impaired, the tree, losing its sap and nourishment, must languish and die!

We ask, is the highly professing Christianity of this age incompetent to such an issue with slavery?—or will it make the issue!—and that speedily?

THE ENGLISH DEPUTATION.—Our friends deputed by the Yearly Meeting at London to visit that of Indiana, and to confer with those of its members who withdrew from its jurisdiction about three years since, having performed the service in conformity with their appointment, expected to embark this day at Boston, on their voyage homeward. They leave behind them many attached friends, who wish them a safe return to their families and connections at home, and a peaceful retrospect of their labours of love in this country. It may yet be too early to discern the fruits of those labours. If the Anti-Slavery Friends did not perceive in this visit all that they expected it to be, they felt at least that it was dictated by and performed in that love which seeks to unite in one the household of faith, and if there was lukewarmness on the part of any members of the ancient Yearly Meeting, touching the subject of slavery, we trust they have been, or will be, incited by it to return to their "first love," and to do their "first works." The parties are certainly left not more distant from each other, and we hope they are so much nearer as that the lines now separating them will not be found to be long impassable.

THE ANTI-SLAVERY REPORTER.—Evidences thicken upon us of the interest which the subject of the disease of slave produce is exciting among the friends of Abolition every where. The fourth number of the new series of the excellent periodical at the head of this article, contains two papers on the subject. One of them, an editorial, will be found in this number. The other, entitled "Reasons for withdrawing from our trading connection with the American Slaveholders; and a plan of doing so suggested," is mainly a tract issued at Manchester, the great seat of the British Cotton Manufactures, proposing the formation of a Society in that place for the encouragement of the growth of free labour cotton. The subject is luminously treated under the following heads.—As respects the connection with the American Slaveholder.

I.—By this connection, the American Slaveholder has been stimulated to promote and extend the system of American Slavery; and, in so doing, he has made that system one of peculiar enormity.

II.—It is a connection involving us in guilt.

III.—By our not making any effort to withdraw from this connection, we dishonour the Christian religion."

As respects the plan,

"We must endeavour, earnestly and unceasingly, to obtain from some other and less polluted sources, a supply of cotton cheaper than the American, and of suitable quality."

NEW YORK YEARLY MEETING.—We understand that our friends in New York propose to procure an assortment of Free Cotton goods from Philadelphia, and have them on sale during the week of their next Yearly Meeting, for the accommodation of Friends from the country. Notice will probably be given early in that week of the place where the goods may be obtained.

THE SLAYER PONS.—The trial of this vessel took place early in last month, in the District Court of the United States, held in this city, and no claimant appearing, she was condemned. One half of the proceeds of her sale will be divided among her captors, and the other paid into the Treasury of the United States.

CRUELTY TO SLAVES.—It has been suggested to us that the frequent presentation of the cases of extreme cruelty practised upon slaves, would be more likely to have the effect to draw public attention to the subject of slavery, and move it to an effort for the removal of the evil, than any abstract declamation on the wrongfulness of the system, or the wholesale assertion that it is necessarily one of great cruelty. We have been asked, in this view, to present constantly to the attention of our readers some case or cases of such cruelty, of recent occurrence, and of unquestioned authenticity, in order that the public feeling may be kept alive to the necessity and duty of an immediate remedy; and we have even been requested to make it the primary purpose of our journal to do so. It is probable that if men's hearts were in their right places, the effect would be very powerful of well-attested cases of injury, wantonly practised on defenceless slaves; the effect increasing with the number of the cases; but we apprehend that familiarity with cruelty, induced by the constant exhibition of such wrongs, would have the same effect as familiarity with crime generally has—to make us callous to it. If it were not for this consequence, every page of history would be a lesson of peace instead of an incentive to war, and the vices surrounding us the happy promoters of the virtues which should succeed them. The effect of this familiarity with acts of slave torture in the immediate vicinity of their occurrence, is obviously to make them the subject of but brief attention, and to insure impunity to the perpetrators of them. Thus we hear of no punishment inflicted on the murderers of slaves. Even in the aggravated case of the slave Mousiache, noticed in our first number, which excited a momentary attention in New Orleans, the scene of the brutal and fatal violence practised upon him, the grand jury ignored the bill presented against Joseph Louapre, the master, though on the mitigated charge of manslaughter. Nearer at home, we think, we perceive the effect of such familiarity, though in a much less degree, in the indifference with which accounts of such cruelty are sometimes apparently read by men of generally good sentiment and sound feeling, and in the remarks they sometimes make justifying a rigour practised upon human beings, at which their hearts would revolt if such rigour were inflicted on the brute creation surrounding them. We shall not, therefore, go to the extent of making this journal the especial vehicle of such events. Occasionally, however, their recital may prove salutary and advantageous. We give below, taken from the "True Wesleyan," a respectable Methodist Journal, an account of some cases of high atrocity, the perpetrators of which were professedly church members! The same paper contains other well attested cases of excessive and death-dealing cruelty, and which are, unquestionably, of common occurrence.

FROM THE SOUTH—A SLAVE SHOT.

Dear Brother Lee:—The following is an extract from a letter which I have just received from one of my correspondents in the South, with whom I am well acquainted:

"I hired out two of my negroes to Mr. —, and he attempted to whip one of them about two weeks since. The negro ran—Mr. — took his gun and shot him; did not KILL HIM, but lodged between twenty and thirty shots in him. The doctor informs me that there is a possibility of his getting well. I have been very much alarmed, fearing lest I should lose my property."

Need I inform you that both of the persons, the owner of the negro and the employer, are members of the Methodist Episcopal Church. It is so! This is true, to my personal knowledge, or they were members in 1841. I leave the reader to make such inferences as he may think proper.

The above, however, is quite moderate to many cases I am acquainted with myself in the same section of the country. In the same region where this correspondent lives, there is a man living by the name of B. who was an overseer of one Gen. C's plantation previous to the Florida war. This Mr. B. informed me that during the period of four years that he had charge of the above plantation, "he had killed six of the negroes, and on two occasions he had cut the heads off from two, and stuck them upon poles in the plantation to intimidate the rest." I have seen this same man, who by the bye is a member of the church, take a perforated paddle, and apply it to his own negroes until the blood and flesh would run profusely through the holes.

The cold-blooded murders that take place on the large plantations are indescribable, and I should not wonder that, in the Day of Judgment, it will be found that more cruel tragedies have transpired within the departments of American slavery, than in any system of bloodshed that ever disgraced the history of the world. I could give you quite a list of different circumstances, which I have withheld from publication for two considerations: 1st, the public have so many similar facts; and 2d, the incredibility of such barbarous sacrifices of human life and shedding of blood.

Yours, &c.

WILLIAM H. HOUCK.

POETRY.

THE ARSENAL AT SPRINGFIELD.

BY HENRY W. LONGFELLOW.

This is the Arsenal. From floor to ceiling,
Like a huge organ, rise the burnished arms;
But from their silent pipes no anthem pealing
Startles the villages with strange alarms.

Ah! what a sound will rise, how wild and dreary,
When the death-angel touches those swift keys!
What loud lament and dismal Misereere
Will mingle with their awful symphonies!

I hear even now the infinite fierce chorus,
The cries of agony, the endless groan,
Which, through the ages that have gone before us,
In long reverberations reach our own.

On helm and harness rings the Saxon hammer,
Through Cimbrian forest roars the Norseman's song,
And loud, amid the universal clamor,
O'er distant deserts sounds the Tartar gong.

I hear the Florentine, who from his palace
Wheels out his battle-bell with dreadful din,
And Aztec priests upon their teocallis
Beat the wild war-drums made of serpent's skin;

The tumult of each sacked and burning village;
The shout that every prayer for mercy drowns;
The soldiers' revels in the midst of pillage;
The wail of famine in beleaguered towns;

The hursting shell, the gateway wrenched asunder,
The rattling musketry, the clashing blade;
And ever and anon, in tones of thunder,
The diapason of the cannonade.

Is it, O man, with such discordant noises,
With such accursed instruments as these,
Thou drownest Nature's sweet and kindly voices,
And jurest the celestial harmonies?

Were half the power, that fills the world with terror,
Were half the wealth, bestowed on camps and courts,
Given to redeem the human mind from error,
There were no need of arsenals nor forts:

The warrior's name would be a name abhorred!
And every nation, that should lift again
Its hand against a brother, on its forehead
Would wear forevermore the curse of Cain!

Down the dark future, through long generations,
The echoing sounds grow fainter and then cease;
And like a bell, with solemn, sweet vibrations,
I hear once more the voice of Christ say, "Peace!"

Peace! and no longer from its brazen portals
The blast of War's great organ shakes the skies!
But beautiful as songs of the immortals,
The holy melodies of love arise.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FREE COTTON GOODS.—4-4 Shirtings, bleached and brown, 5-4 Shirtings, do. do., just received from the Manufacturer.

In the course of next week we expect 30 pieces coloured Calicoes, assorted colours; 50 do. Calicoes, various patterns, fast colours, belonging to the Free Produce Association of Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

Deposited at present with, and for sale by

THOS. S. FIELD & CO.,
No. 35 north Front street, up stairs.

FREE LABOR STORE.—The subscriber having purchased the stock and fixtures of this store at the N. W. corner of Fifth and Cherry streets, of Lydia White, would respectfully inform his friends and those who prefer to buy the produce of free labor, that he will continue the business as heretofore, and hopes by attention thereto, to merit and receive a continuance of the patronage bestowed on the former occupant.

JOEL FISHER.

THE LONDON FRIEND, now in its fourth year, has an extensive circulation in England and Ireland, and is rapidly increasing in America.

The principles of the Society of Friends and the most recent intelligence connected with it, are the chief objects of the Journal, but it is also the medium of sentiments and information on various philanthropic subjects, as well as respecting literary and other useful pursuits.

The London Friend is published on the 1st of every month, and leaves Liverpool by steamer on the 4th. Price two dollars per annum, including postage to America. Names of subscribers will be received by G. W. TAYLOR, Philadelphia; MAHON DAY, New York; and SAMUEL BOYCE, Lynn, Massachusetts.

CHOICE FAMILY FLOUR.—The subscriber having opened a family flour store at the new building, No. 35 north Fifth street, corner of Appleton alley, respectfully informs his friends and the public, that he is careful to select the very best flour in the market, excepting only such as has been raised or manufactured by the agency of slave labour. Any flour purchased at this establishment delivered free of extra charge, and shipped if upon order. It does not give entire satisfaction.

CALDER CLOTHING.

Philada., 5th mo. 1st, 1845.

CONTRIBUTIONS.

Those friends of the cause, who feel disposed to assist the Free Produce Association in procuring and manufacturing free cotton, and in opening a store for the sale of free goods, will please contribute either in the way of a loan without interest, or donations to their fund for those objects. Such contributions will be received by either of the undersigned.

ELIHU PICKERING,
SAMUEL ALLINSON, Jr.,
THOMAS WISTAR, Jr.,
SAMUEL RHOADS,
GEO. W. TAYLOR.

Committee
on Finance.

FREE COTTON GOODS.

To accommodate friends and others who wish to supply themselves with free cotton goods, but cannot conveniently give or lend money to aid in the manufacture, the Finance Committee of Friends' Free Produce Association, propose to receive from such individuals any sum of money they may choose to advance, and furnish them with goods to the same amount when these are ready for sale.

ELIHU PICKERING,
S. ALLINSON, Jr.,
THOMAS WISTAR, Jr.,
GEORGE W. TAYLOR,
SAMUEL RHOADS,

Committee.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER is published on the first of each month, at One Dollar per annum, payable in advance, or six copies to one address for five dollars. It may be proper here to remark, that pecuniary profit forms no part of our object, and that the whole amount of subscriptions which may be received after paying the expense of publication, will be devoted to the cause of emancipation.

ABRAHAM L. PENNOCK, SAMUEL RHOADS and GEORGE W. TAYLOR, Editors and publishers: Office of whom will receive subscriptions, payments, and communications.

By decision of the Post Master General, the Non-Slaveholder is subject to newspaper postage only.

PRINTED AT

Merrihew & Thompson's Book and Job Office,
No. 7 Carter's Alley.

THE
NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

"Who so gives the motive, makes his brother's sin his own."

VOL. I.]

PHILADELPHIA, SIXTH MONTH, 1845.

[NO. 6.]

COMMUNICATIONS.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

A portion of your readers will recollect the attempt made nearly twenty years ago, by Elsie Lewis to establish an anti-slavery periodical, under the title of "The African Observer." In looking through the first volume of "The Friend" recently, my attention was arrested by the following remarks relative to it, and designed to promote its circulation: I have thought their republication might be useful, and therefore offer them for that purpose.

Notwithstanding the "voices of the few solitary enthusiasts" continued to cry, and many listened to them, yet I believe the general state of public feeling at this day, demands that we should still "fortify our principles against our inclinations, our indolence, and our interests," and that the members of the Society of Friends should arouse themselves to a just appreciation and faithful fulfilment of their individual duties in relation to slavery. The insidious and successful scheme for annexing Texas to the United States, with the view of strengthening and, if possible, perpetuating slavery; the determination manifested in various plans and efforts of southern politicians and slaveholding professors of religion to maintain the unchristian system, as "a part of the laws of Jehovah, and authorized by the head of the Church;" the almost total impracticability of our reaching the conscience of the slaveholders through the medium of the press; and, above all, our religious obligation to "do unto others whatsoever we would they should do unto us," call loudly upon us to withdraw as far as possible from every connection with slavery—to be customers no longer in the market which sustains it.

"The Friend" of 4th month 5th, 1828, in announcing the discontinuance of the African Observer, says: "We consider its suspension a real loss to the public; but the general apathy which prevails in relation to the momentous subject of negro slavery; the unwillingness of those who are involved in the evil to see its mischief exposed, and the inevitable consequences of persisting in it clearly set forth, renders the number of those who cheerfully support such a work too small to warrant its continuance."

How do these remarks correspond with the opinion now so often expressed, that, at the period alluded to, the people in several of the slave states were upon the point of abolishing slavery, and were only prevented from doing it by the agitation of the subject in the North?

In the Friend of 12th month, 15th, 1827, the following suggestions, in reference to the Observer, appeared:

"The present state of public feeling in the United States on the subject of slavery, is a striking instance of the influence which surrounding objects exert in familiarizing the mind with things that are fitted to excite sensations of the deepest abhorrence.

"A million and a half [now nearly three millions] of human beings are held in chains by men who make a louder boast of their freedom than any other nation on earth; who commenced a bloody war for the sake of abstract principles of liberty, and the unalienable rights of humanity; and the mockery no longer shocks the public feeling. Thirty years ago, the horrors of the African slave trade were the theme of popular declamation from one end of the Union to the other; a slave-trade in many cases as revolting and degrading [and in some of its features far more so,] is now carried on to an enormous extent within our own territories, and it is scarcely noticed but as one of the ordinary incidents of commerce. We are in habits of friendly intercourse with the masters; connected with them by private and social, no less than political ties—they are our best customers for our manufactures and merchandise; their cotton, [their sugar,] their rice, and their tobacco, are indispensable articles of traffic, food and luxury—WE ARE DAILY DERIVING SOME COMFORTS OR PROFITS FROM THE LABOUR OF SLAVES; daily multiplying our relations and connections with the slaveholders. An unwillingness to discuss an unpleasant topic; to offend those whom it is our interest to serve and to please; the suggestion of indolence and timidity, that the evil is too great to be removed: the apathy, which affects the character of superior disengagement, and is in truth but selfishness; all these motives conspire to render slavery an unpopular theme. Here it is, and will remain, (it is said) and why trouble ourselves about it? The slaves are happier, say their masters, than many millions of poor in Europe; happier than their freed brethren at home, and why disturb them? We acquiesce in the conclusion, and turn away from the subject, each one to his own affairs.

"A few solitary enthusiasts, here and there, lift up their voices in the name of humanity, but who listens to their cry? Occasionally, indeed, a political end is to be gained; a question like that of the Constitution of Missouri is agitated, in which political interests give force and persuasion to the arguments of wisdom, and truth, and justice. But when the excitement of party has subsided, the public apathy returns, and scarcely a voice is heard amid the tumult and stir of the crowd, to plead for the oppressed. The miseries which the slaves suffer, the cruelties to which they are subjected, are inflicted and endured in remote and private places; we only hear as by accident, that misery and cruelty are results of their condition; often we only know it by the reaction which they produce; by the stinging of the trodden worm. The surface of society is smooth and placid; the wheels of government move readily along, and the superficial and the selfish are too willing to be satisfied that 'all is well!'

"It is for these reasons more necessary that we should fortify our principles against our inclinations, our indolence and our interests. The powerful appeals to the heart and imagination, which wrought the overthrow of the slave-trade, cannot now be made. The subject is comparatively dry and didactic, involving details of statistics, and rural and political economy, and needing more the light thrown by cool observers of men and things, than the aid of rhetoric and poetry. Those who now labour, must be content to allow others to reap the rewards of fame. To inform the public mind accurately respecting the present condition of slavery, is the first task to be performed. It is surprising to reflect how little the best informed among us have known on the subject. The recent work of an estimable fellow citizen [G. M. Stroud] on the laws of slavery, has for the first time portrayed its legal incidents—upon that point it is a treatise of inestimable value, and will form the text book of future inquiries into the subject. The 'African Observer' was established in conformity with these views, and is devoted to an impartial examination of slavery as it now exists in the Union. The editor has pursued his solitary, and almost unassisted labours, with great perseverance and industry; and we know of no publication which contains, in the same space, a greater amount of solid information on this important subject. We are sorry that his journal is not more widely circulated, for it is essential to the success of future exertions in removing this blot from our national character, that the circumstances and incidents of slavery be accurately known. This knowledge can be best gained by establishing and supporting a Journal like the Observer, which shall deserve and gain a character for impartiality and accuracy, and become in time a depository for the observations and suggestions of persons, resident or travelling in the South. It is evident that a Journal of the kind here described, can contain little to amuse the general reader—it takes higher ground—it rests its claim for support upon the sobriety of its views and the accuracy of its information. It appeals to the understanding of practical and patriotic men. It hopes, by accumulating facts; by setting principles; by investigating, reasoning, detecting and exposing, to prepare intelligent persons for a full discussion of the great question of emancipation, when the public mind shall be prepared for the decision which must one day be made. It is for this purpose that we are anxious that the African Observer should be supported. The good which it will be able to effect may seem to some remote and conditional; for the dreadful catastrophe of a general insurrection may overtake us in the midst of our schemes of emancipation. Yet those who feel on this subject as men of sound principle and Christian charity, are aware that all useful reforms must spring from a correct knowledge of the existing relations of slavery; that the first efforts to gain this, must be unpromising and ill rewarded; and that nothing but the perseverance of Christian principle will accomplish the end. But what will the labour of the most devoted individual avail, if there are none to cheer him in his task; no friendly greetings; no return of sympathy to show that he does not toil on unregarded?

"Our design, in this cursory notice of the Observer, has been to show the obligation which rests upon PHILANTHROPISTS, TO SUPPORT A JOURNAL OF THIS CHARACTER. We shall make occasional extracts in our future numbers, from the work itself; and by so doing, justify the opinion we have given of its merits, and induce, we hope, many of the subscribers to the Friend, to become the supporters of the African Observer."

These suggestions, clear and urgent as they were, did not effect the purpose of obtaining for the 'Observer' the patronage necessary to its continuance. It is extraordinary that a periodical so well conducted, in all those circumstances in which we have undertaken to read lessons of instructions to the anti-slavery press, should have failed among a people themselves professing to be highly anti-slavery. It did fail, however, and that failure may be admonitory of the issue of all similar enterprises amongst us. Still the truths which are contained in those remarks cannot perish, and they may have been recorded to give impulse to your enterprise. Their republication is suggested by such a hope.

BENNET.

To the Editors of the Non-Slaveholder.

R—, (ILL.) MARCH 20, 1846.

Friends!—Such I call all men who are engaged in any of the various modes now on foot for abolishing slavery. I to-day had the pleasure of seeing the 'Non-Slaveholder,' published by you—and sent to this post office for several Friends of this neighbourhood. I shall take pleasure in distributing them, and trust that the paper will do good. I, as an abolitionist, can recognise the 'Non-Slaveholder' as a co-worker worthy of commendation. I was raised in the South, in a small neighbourhood of Friends, and from my earliest childhood remember that that little band of simple Quakers, was distinguished as anti-slavery men—not merely in theory, but in practice also. They owned no slaves, hired no slave labour when the master was to receive the pay, bought no slave labour produce, distributed anti-slavery publications, not only among themselves, but among their neighbours also, talked with their neighbours on the subject, and preached on the subject, and made it a special duty at every election, to inquire what were the principles and practice of the candidates on that question. They and others held meetings and organised an abolition society—and I have reason to know that this little society, mainly established by Friends, did good. Beside the measures already named, the society reclaimed hundreds of kidnapped free negroes, and since its organization there have been hundreds of slaves liberated in that county—and to this day, although the little band of Quakers have removed, their labours continue to bear fruit, and that county is a check to slavery, though in the very heart of it, sends an anti-slavery member to the Legislature, and is whig when democratic candidates are more pro-slavery, and vice versa, and the Methodist, Baptist, and Presbyterian Churches of that vicinity are more anti-slavery than the same churches in other places. All these results I must attribute to the agency of that little Society of Friends, not exceeding a dozen families; and had every county of the United States such a little society as that, fifty years hence could not fail to usher in a Jubilee. But on leaving the sunny South, it was my fortune to settle near a large Society of Friends; those were from New England, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Virginia, North and South Carolina, Tennessee, &c. But I can scarcely recognise them as Friends, so very different are they on that question. Like other people I see them eat and wear slave-labour; like other people I see them refuse to circulate anti-slavery publications, or to form or countenance anti-slavery associations, and I doubt whether one of your papers will be subscribed for in this neighborhood; like other people I have heard them join in condemnation of distinguished anti-slavery men; like other sects in this country some of them are anti-slavery and some pro-slavery, though none of them I believe, justify slavery, yet many of them say (as is fashionable,) 'it will never do to turn them [the slaves] loose among us,' 'the master must be paid for his property,' &c.; but these results instead of staying the efforts of anti-slavery men, should call out redoubled zeal and effort, and therefore I hail the 'Non-Slaveholder' as a messenger of good from a source that will be heard.

The Church action of the Society of Friends is good, and is producing good fruits, but is this a cause why that people should stand still on the fence of the harvest field, while others are toiling through the heat of the day? because those other laborers were a few years ago behind in the work, shall they now lead on the glorious cause without you aid?

There are three means or weapons that may legally and peaceably be wielded, for or against slavery. Thus I hold that when a man joins a pro-slavery church, and uses no means to change that society, that man supports slavery. When a man buys goods and hires labour and makes no preference in favor of free goods and labour, that man contributes his mite in support of slavery. When a man goes to the polls and rejects a Liberty man and votes for a pro-slavery man, that man contributes his mite in support of slavery.

Thus by the use of these three means, a small number of active men may wield an influence that the world will feel. Hence I hail all those who employ either or all those means, as collaborators in the glorious cause.

Yours truly,

For the Non-Slaverholder.

FAIRS.

That a righteous testimony against the grievous sin of slavery should be continuously upheld by all professed followers of the merciful One who came to "undo the heavy burdens," to "let the oppressed go free," and "to break every yoke,"—must be the sincere desire of every one from whose heart is breathed the aspiration, "Thy will be done!" Though many Christian men and women may differ from me as to the mode of bearing this testimony, I cannot understand, and I will not readily believe, that it is to them any more than to myself a matter of indifference. Nor is it of small importance that all who seek as religionists, as moralists, or as philanthropists, the spread of truth and right, and the annihilating of error and wrong, should, by close investigation into their own motives of action, thus trying their deeds in the true light, aim at the avoidance of all violation of pure principle mingled with their intended good.

A notice has appeared in the British Friend, and also one more brief in the London Friend, of an Anti-Slavery Fair proposed to be holden in Philadelphia "next year, for the benefit of the Liberty Party;"—and the names are given of six Friends* to whom it may be supposed the following sentence is designed to apply,—"they intend to make a great and general effort." This notice is extracted from a private letter, probably not designed for publication, written by a highly valued personal friend of the individuals referred to, and addressed to a much esteemed friend in England. The reference to the individuals therein named, (of whom the writer of these remarks is one, and for several of whom he can speak,) was not authorised by them, nor, perhaps, was it needful that it should be in a private letter, as it was probably based upon a knowledge of their deep interest in the cause of abolition, and a conviction that they would faithfully pay over any contributions which might be sent to them in trust for the above purpose. The writer has no fault to find with any one in this matter. Mistakes are readily made, and, where good feeling exists, they are easily rectified. I do not know whether any of the friends referred to would feel free to originate a fair. There are some of them who would decidedly object to being concerned in one. It may be that some, who had not previously given to the subject a thorough investigation, have felt startled at seeing their names in print in connection with a mode of action meant to be purely benevolent, but to which the deliberate sanction of their religious judgment had not been given, and for the unequivocal advocacy of which they were not fully prepared. It may be said of some of them that they had never had connection with a "fair," while others, who may have acted upon an impulse, could not feel themselves as individuals released from a present responsibility, because they had not yet seen "a more excellent way." The writer for himself must withdraw the identification of his name with "the Liberty Party." Having long conscientiously refrained from voting for Slaveholders, it is nevertheless undesirable to him to be placed by others in a position which he has not selected for himself. And this having been done, will it not be admitted that he has thus obtained a right to express his dissent from a course of which he is made publicly to appear the advocate?

*There is I believe no ground for supposing that that this effort was to be made exclusively or chiefly by members of the Society of Friends.

It would be unjust and ungenerous were I to confound any of the anti-slavery fairs which have been held in Philadelphia with those in which raffling or "illegal gambling," exorbitant overcharges, or other deviations from strict integrity have been practised; fully believing as I do that these errors have been carefully guarded against, and that the conductors of them have considered themselves simply as engaged in an honest business partnership, the whole profits of which were to be applied to a charitable purpose.

In guarding against those deviations into which a benevolent zeal may lead, but from which there is a simple and sure preservative, it is the part alike of christianity and of philosophy to pursue such a mild and rational course as may have the effect at once of convincing the judgment and cherishing those amiable sensibilities, which may have been misdirected. And let none, in pointing out the minor errors of others, seek to screen themselves in still greater deviations from "quaker thoroughness." Such would it be, as I conceive, to proscribe those whose sympathy for the bondman makes it painful to them to use the product of his unrequited labours; or to throw wide open to the slaveholder the incentives of commerce; or to swell the evil current upon which the slaveholding or pro-slavery candidate seeks to float into office. Whilst it is right and attainable for each one to know for himself the path of individual duty, perhaps there can scarcely be found among the disciples of the great Exemplar, a safer model for the abolitionist than is presented in the life of the meek philanthropist Woolman. How desirable is it that we should endeavour, by guards on every point, to preserve involute that tenderness of conscience in which he was enabled to walk in the light, favoured with "a certain evidence of divine Truth," bearing a testimony to it far in advance of most of his brethren of that day or of this. And whilst we should certainly seek to be clothed upon with a like spirit of condescension and humility,

"Slow to reproach, forbearing in the right,"

we can scarcely believe in the genuineness of his testimony against slavery, and suppose that it ought to be in any respect abated by the generation which has succeeded him.

Burlington, 5th mo., 1846.

W. J. A.

SELECTIONS.

BIRDS.

BY LYDIA MARIA CHILD.

There is nothing which makes me feel the imprisonment of a city, like the absence of birds. Blessings on the little warblers! Lovely types are they of all winged and graceful thoughts. Dr. Follen used to say, 'I feel dependent for a vigorous and hopeful spirit on now and then a kind word, the loud laugh of a child, or the silent greeting of a flower.' Fully do I sympathize with this utterance of his gentle and loving spirit; but more than the benediction of the flower, more perhaps than even the mirth of childhood, is the clear, joyous note of the bird a refreshment to my soul.

'The birds! the birds of summer hours,
They bring a gush of glee,
To the child among the fragrant flowers,
To the sailor on the sea.
We hear their thrilling voices
In their swift and airy flight,
And the inmost heart rejoices
With a calm and pure delight.
Amid the morning's fragrant dew,
Amidst the mists of even,
They warble on, as if they drew
Their music down from Heaven.
And when their holy anthems
Come pealing through the air,
Our hearts leap forth to meet them,
With a blessing and a prayer.'

But alas! like the free voices of fresh youth, they come not on the city air. Thus should it be: where mammon imprisons all thoughts and feelings that would fly upward, their winged types should be in cages too. Walk down Mulberry street, and you may see, in one small room, hundreds of little feathered songsters, each hopping about restlessly in his gilded and garlanded cage, like a dyspeptic merchant in his marble mansion. I always turn my head away when I pass; for the sight of the little captives goes through my heart like an arrow. The darling little creatures have such visible delight in freedom;

'In the joyous song they sing;
In the liquid air they cleave;
In the sunshine; in the shower;
In the nests they weave.'

I seldom see a bird engaged, without being reminded of Petion, a truly great man, the popular idol of Haiti, as Washington is of the United States.

While Petion administered the government of the island, some distinguished foreigner sent his little daughter a beautiful bird, in a very handsome cage. The child was delighted, and with great exultation exhibited the present to her father. 'It is indeed very beautiful, my daughter,' said he; 'but it makes my heart ache to look at it. I hope you will never show it to me again.'

With great astonishment, she inquired his reasons. He replied, 'When this island was called St. Domingo, we were all slaves. It makes me think of it to look at that bird; for he is a slave.'

The little girl's eyes filled with tears, and her lips quivered, as she exclaimed, 'Why, father! he has such a large, handsome cage; and as much as he ever can eat and drink.'

'And would you be a slave,' said he, 'if you could live in a great house, and be fed on frosted cake?'

After a moment's thought, the child began to say half reluctantly, 'Would he be happier, if I opened the door of his cage?' 'He would be free!' was the emphatic reply. Without another word, she took the cage to the open window, and a moment after, she saw her prisoner playing with the humming-birds among the honey-suckles.

One of the most remarkable cases of instinctive knowledge in birds was often related by my grand-father, who witnessed the fact with his own eyes. He was attracted to the door, one summer day, by a troubled twittering, indicating distress and terror. A bird, who had built her nest in a tree near the door, was flying back and forth with the almost speed, uttering wailing cries as she went. He was at first at a loss to account for her strange movements; but they were soon explained by the sight of a snake slowly winding up the tree.

Animal magnetism was then unheard of; and whoever had dared to mention it, would doubtless have been hung on Witch's Hill, without benefit of clergy. Nevertheless, marvellous and altogether unaccountable stories had been told of the snake's power to charm birds. The popular belief was that the serpent charmed the bird by looking steadily at it; and that such a sympathy was thereby established, that if the snake were struck, the bird felt the blow, and writhed under it.

These traditions excited my grandfather's curiosity to watch the progress of things; but being a humane man, he resolved to kill the snake before he had a chance to despoil the nest. The distressed mother meanwhile continued her rapid movements and troubled cries; and he soon discovered that she went and came continually, with something in her bill, from one particular tree—a white ash. The snake wound his way up; but the instant his head came near the nest, his folds relaxed, and he fell to the ground rigid, and apparently lifeless. My grandfather made sure of his death by cutting off his head, and then mounted the tree to examine into the mystery. The snug little nest was filled with eggs, and covered with leaves of the white ash!

The little bird knew, if my readers do not, that contact with the white ash is deadly to a snake. This is no idle superstition, but a veritable fact in natural history. The Indians are aware of it, and twist garlands of white ash leaves about their ankles, as a protection against rattlesnakes. Slaves often take the same precaution when they travel through swamps and forests, guided by the north star; or to the cabin of some poor white man, who teaches them to read and write by the light of pine splinters, and receives his pay in 'massa's' corn or tobacco.

I have never heard my explanation of the effect produced by the white ash; but I know that settlers in the wilderness like to have these trees round their log houses, being convinced that no snake will voluntarily come near them. When touched with the boughs, they are said to grow suddenly rigid, with strong convulsions; after a while they slowly recover, but seem sickly for some time.

The following well authenticated anecdote has something wonderfully human about it:

A parrot had been caught young, and trained by a Spanish lady, who sold it to an English sea-captain. For a time the bird seemed sad among the fogs of England, where birds and men all spoke to her in a foreign tongue. By degrees, however, she learned the language, forgot her Spanish phrases, and seemed to feel at home. Years passed on, and found Pretty Polly the pet of the captain's family. At last her brilliant feathers began to turn gray with age; she could take no food but soft pulp, and had not strength enough to mount her perch. But no one had the heart to kill the old favourite, she was entwined with so many pleasant household recollections. She had been some time in this feeble condition, when a Spanish gentleman called one day to see her master. It was the first time she had heard the language for many years. It probably brought back to memory the scenes of her youth in that beautiful region of vines and sunshine. She spread forth her wings with a wild scream of joy, rapidly ran over the Spanish phrases, which she had not altered for years, and fell down dead.

There are different theories on the subject of instinct. Some consider it a special revelation to each creature; others believe it is founded on traditions handed down among animals, from generation to generation, and is therefore a matter of education. My own observation, two years ago, tends to confirm the latter theory. Two barn-swallows came into our wood-shed in the spring time. Their busy, earnest twitterings led me at once to suspect that they were looking out a building spot; but as a carpenter's bench was under the window, and frequent hammering, sawing, and planing were going on, I had little hope they would choose a location under our roof. To my surprise, however, they soon began to build in the crotch of a beam, over the open door-way. I was delighted, and spent more time in watching them, than 'penny-wise' people would have approved. It was, in fact, a beautiful little drama of domestic love.

The father-bird scarcely ever left the side of the nest. There he was, all day long, twittering in tones that were most obviously the outpourings of love. Sometimes he would bring in a straw, or a hair, to be interwoven in the precious little fabric. One day my attention was arrested by a very unusual twittering, and I saw him circling round with a large downy feather in his bill. He bent over the unfinished nest, and offered it to his mate with the most graceful and loving air imaginable; and when she put up her mouth to take it, he poured forth such a gush of glad some sound! It seemed as if pride and affection had swelled his heart, till it was almost too big for his little bosom. The whole transaction was the prettiest piece of fond coquetry, on both sides, that it was ever my good luck to witness.

It was evident that the father-bird had formed correct opinions on 'the woman question'; for during the process of incubation he volunteered to perform his share of household duty. Three or four times a day would he, with coaxing twitterings, persuade his patient mate to fly abroad for food; and the moment she left the eggs, he would take the maternal station, and give a loud alarm whenever a cat or dog came about the premises. He certainly performed the office with far less ease and grace than she did; it was something in the style of an old bachelor tending a babe; but nevertheless it showed that his heart was kind, and his principles correct, concerning division of labour. When the young ones came forth, he pursued the same equalizing policy, and brought at least half the food for his greedy little family.

But when they became old enough to fly, the veriest misanthrope would have laughed to watch their manoeuvres! Such chirping and twittering! Such diving down from the nest, and flying up again! Such wheeling round in circles, talking to the young ones all the while! Such clinging to the sides of the shed with their sharp claws, to show the timid little fledglings that there was no need of falling!

For three days all this was carried on with increasing activity. It was obviously an infant flying school. But all their talking and fussing was of no avail. The little downy things looked down, and then looked up, and, alarmed at the infinity of space, sunk down into the nest again. At length the parents grew impatient, and summoned their neighbours. As I was picking up chips one day, I found my head encircled with a swarm of swallows. They flew up to the nest, and chatted away to the young ones; they clung to the walls, looking back to tell how the thing was done; they dived, and wheeled, and balanced, and floated, in a manner perfectly beautiful to behold.

The pupils were evidently much excited. They jumped up on the edge of the nest, and twittered, and shook their feathers, and waved their wings; and then hopped back again, saying, 'It's pretty sport, but we can't do it.'

Three times their neighbours came in and repeated their graceful lessons. The third time, two of the young birds gave a sudden plunge downward, and then fluttered and hopped, till they alighted on a small upright log. And oh, such praises as were warbled by the whole troop! The air was filled with their joy! Some were flying round, swift as a ray of light; others were perched on the hoo-handle, and the teeth of the rake; multitudes clung to the wall, after the fashion of their pretty kind; and two were swinging, in most graceful style, on a pendant hoop. Never, while memory lasts, shall I forget that swallow party! I have frolicked with blessed Nature much and often; but this, above all her gambols, spoke into my inmost heart, like the glad voices of little children. That beautiful family continued to be our playmates, until the falling leaves gave token of approaching winter. For some time, the little ones came home regularly to their nest at night. I was ever on the watch to welcome them, and count that none were missing. A sculptor might have taken a lesson in his art, from those little creatures perched so gracefully on the edge of their clay-built cradle, fast asleep, with heads hidden under their folded wings. Their familiarity was wonderful. If I hung my gown on a nail, I found a little swallow perched on the sleeve. If I took a nap in the afternoon, my waking eyes were greeted by a swallow on the bed-post; in the summer twilight, they flew about the sitting room in search of flies, and sometimes lighted on chairs and tables. I almost thought they knew how much I loved them. But at last they flew away to more genial skies, with a whole troop of relations and neighbours. It was a deep pain to me, that I should never know them from other swallows, and that they would have no recollection of me. We had lived so friendly together, that I wanted to meet them in another world, if I could not in this; and I wept, as a child weeps at its first grief.

There was somewhat, too, in their beautiful life of loving freedom which was a reproach to me. Why was not my life as happy and as graceful as theirs? Because they were innocent, confiding, and unconscious, they fulfilled all the laws of their being without obstruction.

'Inward, inward to thy heart,
Kindly Nature, take me;
Lovely, even as thou art,
Full of loving make me.
Thou knowest nought of dead cold forms,
Knowest nought of littleness;
Life's truth thy being warms,
Majesty and earnestness.'

The old Greeks observed a beautiful festival, called 'The Welcome of the Swallows.' When these social birds first returned in the spring-time, the children went about in procession, with music and garlands; receiving presents at every door, where they stopped to sing a welcome to the swallows, in that graceful old language, so melodious even in its ruins; that the listener feels as if the brilliant azure of Grecian skies, the breezy motion of their olive groves, and the gush of their silvery fountains, had all passed into a monument of liquid and harmonious sounds.

Letters from New York,

THE POET COWPER.

The mind of this admirable writer was marked with the genuine traits which distinguish a poetical from other minds. He is, it is true, not to be compared with the great masters of the art, whose lofty and creative imaginations place them in a sphere of their own, but he had a power of collecting the scenes and harmonies of nature into the focus of his own heart, and of embodying them there with light and grace. He had an intensity and delicacy of feeling which made him perceive what is most beautiful in the complicated character of humanity, and he had that intuitive sense of the mind's action, which enabled him to present to others the objects and sentiments which influence with the greatest strength. By those qualities of his intellect, by the tenderness of his heart, and the extreme susceptibility of his nature, he was possessed of all the qualities, with the exception of a powerful imagination, which form the character of a poet; and in being denied the stronger excitements of fancy, he seems to have been formed by Providence to produce the works he composed. He was endowed with all the powers which a poet could want who was to be the moralist of the world—the reprove, but not the satirist of men—the teacher of simple truths, which were to be rendered gracious without endangering their simplicity.

AMERICAN CHRISTIANS! LOOK HERE!

The following extract of a letter from D. L. Brayton, an American Baptist Missionary among the Karens, is from the Boston Christian Reflector. It appears the Karens are afraid to become Christians lest the Missionaries should carry them off into slavery! Besides slavery is as deadly in its influence on Religion as it is pernicious in Politics.—Tribune.

MERCURY, Oct. 27, 1845.

MESSRS. EDITORS: Will you or some of your valuable correspondents, tell me how to meet the following objection, which I have to meet wherever I go among the wild Karens? "If we become disciples, when you get a large number of us, you intend to entice us away and make slaves of us in your own country." This objection is often urged with as much seriousness and confidence as though they were actually acquainted with the system of American slavery. Did these ignorant, but slave-hating heathen, but know the slaveholding character of the American Churches would they not say to our faces, "Go back, thou hypocrite—Go back, and teach the heathen of your own country, and give them the Bible, before you come here to impose upon us." I am fully persuaded, that did they know it, this would in substance be the language of many a wild Karen.

Will not the Karens become, acquainted with the history of American slavery? I see not how it can possibly be avoided.

Some of their young men are learning our language; becoming acquainted with our books, papers, &c. And when they once begin to get the idea, they will not cease their importunities until they know its history. And when it is once known, it will spread like wild-fire among the people. Sometime since, I noticed in a public paper the following remark as coming from Brother Kinnid: "if the heathen were aware of the slaveholding character of our Churches, by whom the Missionaries are sent out, the usefulness of the Missionaries would be at an end." Now I should not be willing to go quite so far as this, and say that their usefulness would be at an end. But I most sincerely believe, that the strength of the Missionary's arm would be qually paralyzed.

I thought I felt interested for the slaves before I left my native land; but during the eight years since I left it and came to this heathen country, I have been witnessing the amount of men and money employed in behalf of the heathen of these provinces, and how small their number compared to the slaves of the United States of free and independent America. According to the Census of Government in 1840, the whole population of these provinces, including Malay—Chinese—Siamese and Teenghoos, (who never have any Missionary,) was 115,000, not one-tenth the number of oppressed heathen in that land of boasted freedom and Christianity. And what is the amount of means used in behalf of this population? There are on the ground at present thirteen Missionaries and their wives, and one single female. According to what statistics I have before me, the whole expense cannot be less than $20,000 a year, and I believe it must be considerably more than that. Don't understand me to convey the idea that we have a superabundance of labor and money. Not indeed. Almost every department of labor among us is suffering for want of reinforcement. In many instances we cannot employ assistants and have schools for want of money. Had we twice the amount of men and money, there would be an abundance of work to be done. But when I think of it, in connection with American slavery, and think of the slaveholder holding the Bible from his own people, and yet apparently anxious to give the same to the heathen, my head sickens, while it seems as though I had been dreaming over the subject of American slavery. Would that we might all awake, and wash our hands from this awful pollution!

D. L. BRAYTON.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, SIXTH MONTH 1, 1846.

BRITISH ABSTINENCE.—We briefly adverted in our first number to the extensive abstinence from the products of slave labor, which prevailed in Great Britain in the years 1791–1792, and which we doubted not, essentially promoted the abolition of the British slave-trade. We then suggested that we would take another opportunity for showing the fatal error which the abolitionists subsequently committed in leaving the simple ground of avoiding the use of those productions, and we now appear to redeem that pledge.

The hope we then expressed that we should ere long be furnished with an interesting account of the abstinence referred to, has not yet been realized. The circumstance, however, is related by Thomas Clarkson, in his history of the abolition of that trade; and, without any further information than this history contains, is highly interesting.

When in the year 1791, Wilberforce's motion for the abolition of the slave-trade was lost in the House of Commons, by an overwhelming majority, the friends of the cause soon directed their attention to the means which were still in their power. Two pamphlets appeared which inculcated abstinence from the productions of slave labour as a moral duty. They exhibited to view the undeniable truth, that if each individual would abstain from the products of West India slave labour, the inducement to continue the traffic in slaves would be withdrawn. This was represented as a peaceable and constitutional measure; and being obviously within the power of all, at least to a considerable extent, was now adopted by many of the opponents of slavery and the slave-trade.

The principal article then brought into the market, exclusively by the labour of slaves, was sugar; and the abstinence to which the abolitionists resorted, applied chiefly to it. Clarkson being about this time engaged in a visit to most parts of England and Wales, observes, "There was no town, through which I passed, in which was not some one individual who had left off the use of sugar. In the smaller towns there were from ten to fifty, by estimation, and in the larger, from two to five hundred, who had made this sacrifice to virtue. These were of all ranks and parties. Rich and poor, churchmen and dissenters, had adopted the measure. Even grocers had left off trading in the article, in some places. In gentlemen's families, where the master had set the example, the servants had often voluntarily followed it; and even children, who were capable of understanding the history of the sufferings of the Africans, excluded, with the most virtuous resolution, the sweets, to which they had been accustomed, from their lips. By the best computation I was able to make, from notes taken down in my journey, no fewer than three hundred thousand persons had abandoned the use of sugar."* Here was probably a demand for upwards of three million of pounds a year, cut off, by a relatively small part of the population of that island. This was unquestionably a good beginning, and if it had been followed up, would no doubt have produced important results, not only within the British dominions, but in all the countries where the productions of slave labour are brought into the market.

But the important error committed by abolitionists, seems to have been, that their attention was directed rather to the slave trade, than to slavery itself. Granville Sharpe, though he was a long time chairman of the society for the abolition of the slave trade, does not appear to have approved of their procedure in confining their efforts to the abolition of the trade, instead of attacking the great radical evil on which that traffick depended.† The object in view, unquestionably, was the eventual extinction of slavery, and that was the expected result of the abolition of the traffick. The assiduity with which the attack upon that odious system of piracy was conducted, demanded, our highest admiration; and the judgment adopted in 1787, to select the abolition of the traffick as the great object of their labour was founded upon such knowledge of the subject as they then possessed. But subsequent experience has sufficiently proved, that while a market remains where human beings can be sold, means will be found to supply it. And we may add, that while a market remains where the productions of extorted and uncompensated labour can be sold, there is reason to fear that such labour will be used to produce them. The impracticability of securing good treatment to the slaves in the islands, while the slave-trade remained, which the abolitionists foresaw and which furnished one of the motives for commencing with the trade,‡ was found to exist after, as well as before its legal abolition. Again, the slave-trade was assailed, not merely because of the abominable cruelty with which it was prosecuted, but because of the intrinsic injustice of the whole system of slavery. The cruelty of the measure, unquestionably, gave to the abolitionists a stronger hold on the feelings of the community than if a little humanity had been blended with the traffick, yet those who understood the subject, and judged upon Christian principles, must have been convinced that nothing less than the extinction of slavery, by the most direct and penceable means, could satisfy the demands of justice.

* Vol. II, p. 273; Phila. edition.

† Sharpe's Life of G. Sharp; p. 37.

‡ Hist. of Abolition, vol. I, p. 231.

There is little reason to doubt, that the mass of the English nation, at the time when this abstinence from sugar took place, were friendly to the abolition, both of slavery and the slave-trade. But men are roused to action by their feelings, rather than their judgment. The abominations of the traffick being placed in bold relief before the people, by the publication of the testimony elicited by the House of Commons, a feeling of abhorrence was excited, which displayed itself in a flood of petitions for the abolition of the trade, and the abstinence from the use of sugar, to which we have adverted. But that abstinence seemed to have been used rather as a means of arresting the traffick in slaves, than as the expression of a fixed and inflexible determination to withdraw from the support of slavery itself.

With the highest respect for the judgment, as well as the integrity, of those virtuous men who devoted so large a portion of their time and strength to the abolition of the Anglo-African trade, we must be permitted to suppose that a little more attention to the primary evil of slavery, and to the means by which it must be supported, would have indicated a clearer insight into the proper principles of action, and have produced more important results in regard to the slavery of our day.

As all the great, and most of the small portions of christendom have denounced the African slave-trade, and, to at least, have branded it as piracy, without attempting to draw a distinction between its usually murderous method of prosecution, and the most humane of which it is susceptible, these governments have virtually countenanced the whole system of African slavery. And in this they were, no doubt, behind the general mass of the people. Probably in 1792, no opposition would have been made by the community in general, on either side of the Atlantic, to any constitutional expression of aversion to slavery, which their governments could then utter. Slavery being a forced and unnatural state, the approbation of it is of artificial growth. No rational man, whose mind is not warped by habit or interest, believes it consistent with the design of our merciful Creator, that man should be held as the absolute property of man. But as habit and interest unquestionably reconcile many upright minds to an approval of slavery, so the same causes may, no doubt, reconcile many, who are equally upright, to the free and customary use of the products of slavery, although they conscientiously believe that the holding of slaves is clearly wrong.

It is needless to expatiate in this place, upon the argument, adduced in a preceding number of this paper,* that the whole system of slavery depends upon the demands for the products of slave labour. The proposition, that slaves would cease to be held, if the produce of unrequited toil could not find a market, is too clear for argument. If now we suppose that the advocates of the black man in 1792 had taken and steadily maintained the ground that abstinence as far as practicable from all the products of slave labour was a necessary part of the duty devolving on the opponents of slavery; and had kept the supply of the market by free labour prominently in the view, both of the people and the government, would not their proceedings have exhibited a more consistent whole than they now do?

It is a serious question, worthy of mature consideration, whether we can consistently profess a conscientious opposition to the holding of slaves, and, at the same time, have no scruple with regard to the traffick or consumption, on which the vitality of slavery depends. The system of slavery, like any other system, should be regarded as a whole. To get clear of it consistency seems to require that we should support none of its parts.

To return then to 1792, and suppose the abstinence from the slave grown products to have been kept steadily in view, what may we conjecture the result would have been?

The great staples of the British West Indies at that time were sugar, rum, coffee, and cotton; of which we find there were exported to Great Britain in 1787, five years before this time, 1,923,989 cwt. of sugar, 2,251,228 galls. of rum, 30,275 cwt. of coffee, and 9,287,514 lbs. of cotton.†

Of the sugar thus carried to Great Britain, a part was no doubt re-exported, but we have no data at hand to determine how much. This was unquestionably all produced by slave labour, and probably employed at least 120,000 slaves to cultivate it. Under the system pursued in the sugar islands, during the existence of slavery, it is well known that the slaves did not keep up their numbers by natural increase. The reduction of the demand for slave grown sugar must have operated, as far as it went, to diminish the exertions upon the slaves, or to create a demand for the same article through the instrumentality of free labour. The necessary effect, of keeping the idea of abstaining from the products of slave labour, prominently before the public, as a necessary part of the plan for the extinction of slavery, must have been to enhance the price of free and reduce that of slave sugar. The same voice of the nation which eventually impelled the government to abolish the traffick in slaves, would probably have prevented a duty from being levied upon the free grown sugars of the East, to favour the sale of the slave grown products of the West. From the facility with which the youthful mind embraces an obvious truth, when fairly presented, compared with the tendency observable in the old to adhere to the opinions and principles of their youth,* we may fairly presume that the rising generation might have been readily drawn to act upon the conviction that the substitution of free for slave produce is an essential element of every plan which is designed to extirpate the system of slavery. More than fifty years have passed since this abstinence from slave grown sugar occurred, during which time a new generation has arisen in Great Britain, of whom an overwhelming majority are unquestionably opposed to slaveholding. Had they grown up with the conviction that the only consistent course by which they could manifest their aversion to slavery, was to withhold their support from the markets of slave grown produce, it may be fairly questioned whether any article, known to be extorted from the drudgery of slaves, would, at this day, have found a market in the United Kingdom.

* See Address, on pages 6 and 7.
† Edward's West Indies, Vol. 1.

The effect and the necessity of time, to accomplish any important improvement in the habits and opinions of the community, are forcibly illustrated by the fact that nearly fifty years of persevering labour were required to clear the Society of Friends from the practice of trafficking in the persons of men. During that time a generation arose which had not grown old in the practice; and those who had, were generally removed by death. How slowly most improvements have advanced in the days of Methuselah!

But the article which has exercised the most powerful influence upon slavery, particularly in the United States, is cotton. The quantity imported into Great Britain from her West Indian possessions, in 1787, appears as above to have been a little over nine millions of pounds. The whole quantity imported in that year is stated at 22 millions, which in 1792 appears to have risen to 35 millions.* Of this a very small part was supplied by the United States, for the whole produce of the year is stated at three millions of pounds.† The invention of the cotton gin, which took place about the year 1793, gave a new impetus to the culture of cotton. By this gin, impelled by water, and attended by three persons, an amount of cotton was cleared of seed, which had previously employed three thousand pair of hands.‡ The cultivation of cotton, mostly by slave labour, advanced so rapidly that in 1800, the quantity raised in the United States, is given at 35 millions of pounds; of which 16 millions were sent to England; and the whole import of that country was then 56 millions. From that time to 1840 we find the quantity raised. The exports to Great Britain, and whole British imports as below.

	Crop of the U. States.	Export to G. Britain.	Whole British Import.
	lbs.	lbs.	lbs.
1810	85,000,000	36,000,000	132,500,000
1820	160,000,000	90,000,000	147,500,000
1830	350,000,000	210,000,000	250,750,000
1840	790,479,257	560,955,000§

A writer quoted in the Farmer's Encyclopedia estimates the quantity of cotton raised by one labourer at 1000 pounds,|| but we apprehend the statistics of the South require a higher estimate; we shall therefore assume 1500 lbs. as the produce of one slave. Now the 560,955,000 lbs. exported to Great Britain in 1840, would, on that estimate, require the labour of 373,970 slaves. The product of the four great cotton raising states, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana, is stated at 626,438,164 lbs. which we observe exceeds the exports to Great Britain a little less than 50 millions of pounds. Admitting the cotton which found its way to the market, to have been supplied by those four states at the rate of 1500 lbs. to a slave, this supply would have required the labour of all the slaves in those states, male and female, between the age of 24 and 55, and about 80,000 of those in earlier or later periods. Upon this supposition, the markets of Great Britain may be said

* It is a curious illustration of this tendency, that no Physician in Europe who had reached forty years of age, when Dr. Harvey announced his discovery of the circulation of the blood, ever adopted his theory; and that his practice was greatly diminished by the reproach occasioned by that signal discovery. Hume's Hist. Vol. 6, page 339.

† Report of Secretary of Treasury 1836, page 34.

‡ Ibid. page 7.

§ Farmer's Encyclopedia, Art. Gossypium.

|| This number is deduced from the number of bales, estimating the bale at 450 lbs.

¶ Rep. Secretary of Treasury, 1836.

to support the slavery of those four cotton growing states.

We are aware that these calculations are founded on very imperfect data; but accuracy in this case is of little importance. Our object is not to show exactly how much slavery is supported in the United States by the cotton market of England; but to present to our readers the unquestionable truth that a large amount of slavery is thus supported.

Now had the abstinence from slave products, which was begun in 1792, been kept prominently in view, we can hardly suppose that the English nation would have continued to draw their supplies of cotton, to so great an extent, from the labour of slaves. But we may further consider that the results of the principle which we advocate, would not have been confined to the abolitionists of Great Britain. The friends of the slave, on this side of the Atlantic, would unquestionably have joined their English coadjutors in discouraging the consumption of slave grown cotton, and in swelling the demand for that which would be procured from the labour of freemen. A demand must inevitably have produced a supply.

But the simple doctrine so obvious when announced, that slavery is supported by the market for its products, being too generally overlooked, the cultiva of cotton by servile hands, has grown with the growth of the Union, while the manufactures in the free states, as well as in Great Britain, though opposed in principle to slaveholding, have continued to support the system, by purchasing the slave grown cotton; and the people at large have supported the manufactures, by supplying a market for their fabrics. Thus the slave trader, the slaveholding planter, the shipping merchant, the manufacturer, and the consumer are connected by the chain of commerce. And must we not acknowledge that those who purchase and consume the fabrics, furnish the basis on which the whole system rests?

We may perhaps, at a future time, advert to the support afforded to southern slavery by the consumption of tobacco, rice, cotton and sugar in the free states, but having already extended our observations further than was expected when we began, we shall close the subject for the present.

WAR WITH MEXICO.—A proclamation issued by the President of the United States, under date of "the thirteenth of May," declares that, "by the act of the republic of Mexico, a state of war exists between that government and the United States." The first act of aggression was unquestionably on the part of our nation, whose "army of occupation" entered upon Mexican territory, whence it was warned to remove under the penalty of war being the result. The act of the republic of Mexico to which the President alludes followed this hostile demonstration. Such is the truthfulness of public documents! The American Congress has placed at the disposal of the Executive a large amount of men and treasure to carry war into the country of the enemy, or defend ourselves against its reaction; and the war spirit, reckless of cause or consequence, is rife through our land. Every where is heard "the drum's discordant sound," and every where observed the note of preparation for the coming conflict. It is not our purpose, however, to chronicle the movements and counter-movements of this war, the victory obtained, the defeat incurred, the treasure expended, the final triumph; only as bleeding humanity and trampled-down Christianity are concerned. "My kingdom," said Christ, "is not of this world: if my kingdom were of this world then would my servants fight." The battle of His warfare is not "with confused noise and garments rolled in blood," but it is one of pure strategy, contending "against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places." It is in this battle only that the Christian soldier can be enlisted.

When we refer, therefore, to the war with our neighbor of Mexico which has just been officially announced, though its coming has been long foreseen, we shall do it for the purpose of pointing out the true motive for which it was commenced, and removing, as far as we may, the true incentive to its continuance. Within the humble reach of our ability, this duty, we hope faithfully to perform.

This war, we proclaim, exists in the desire to add new territory to the already extended dominions of slavery, and to subject to the exclusive culture of slaves, soil which, under the existing institutions of Mexico, can only be cultivated by free labour. Slavery demands the market of the world, and she will have it, if the world will continue to buy at her shambles her blood-stained commodities, "asking no questions" concerning them, and caring not for the wrong and suffering producing them. Her dominions, with the recent addition of Texas, are large enough in all reason for her present and near-coming wants, but she prudently looks ahead to the period when the millions she at this time holds in thralldom shall be few to the immense multitude of her vassals which shall then bow at her footstool. Stealthily, through our government, she stretches forth her arm, and draws into her enclosure the surrounding nations whose personal freedom exists. Mexico is the object of to-day's enterprise, but she looks beyond her, to the occupation, in fitting time, of all of North America, south of the line of the Missouri compromise; and with the additions of some or all of the West India Islands. Prominently among these is the important island of Cuba, insecurely in the possession of the slave power, and therefore requiring the aid of our nation; and the not less important one of Hayti, occupied by free blacks working out the problem of free and self government, and therefore requiring our proscription and subjugation!

All this will she accomplish, unless a merciful providence shall overrulingly prevent, if the church, which is, or should be, the salt of the earth, shall have so irrecoverably lost its savour as that Christians shall continue to buy in the market where slavery offers her polluted wares, and by the sale of which, only, can she possibly exist. When the church shall have seriously resumed the consideration propounded to it by the Apostle James, "from whence come wars and fightings?" and shall comply with the duties issuing out of that consideration, then, and then only, may we conclude that the end of slavery draweth nigh!

AMERICAN MANUFACTURES.—We ever hail with high gratification any advances made by the people of these states in the arts and manufactures which are based on the productions of free labour, and carry in their result an increased amount of comfort and happiness to the whole people. With the theory of "the greatest good to the greatest number," when enforced at the expense of the lives, and happiness, and intellect, and virtue of the smaller number, we do not sympathize. Our patriotism is subordinate to the love of man and mankind; and ready are we to confess that we regard with no complacency the doctrine, "Our country—right or wrong," and view with no pleasure its seeming prosperity, when that prosperity has its roots deeply implanted in violence and wrong done to one sixth of our people. We feel no exultation, therefore, at noticing the great annual increase of the cotton manufactures of this country, so long as those manufactures are contingent for their supply of material on the labour of slaves, and have for their effect the perpetuation of the system of slavery. At the root of all prosperity founded in wrong there is cherished a worm which shall suddenly nip its verdure. Not less truly does the language apply to nations than to individuals—

"I have seen the wicked in great power, and spreading himself like a green bay-tree: yet he passed away, and lo, he was not: yea, I sought him, and he could not be found." Let us take the motion in time to avert this result.

We turn with undisguised pleasure to the growing and healthful prosperity of our country in the branches of its manufacture disconnected from slavery. Among these branches may be prominently noticed those which relate to iron and wool. The first embraces all forms into which that valuable metal is moulded, from the heavy and most cumbersome to the minute and most delicate: the latter, all the usual varieties of cloth into which the wool of the sheep is converted. We present below the notice of a gratifying extension of this branch of manufacture to the fabrication of the safe, light, and pleasant texture for female dresses, called mousseline de laine. This article has to some extent supplanted the use of cotton cloth. To those who have avoided this use on conscientious grounds, it has afforded an important relief. To all, if offered at a reduced price, which seems probable, it will be an acceptable substitute for the cotton muslin. The effect of this substitution in diminishing the demand for slave-produced cotton will readily be perceived. There is an admitted danger, however, of cotton being fraudulently blended with the wool; but the conscientious, as well as the prudent who seek an unimpeachable material for dresses, must look to it that they are not deceived. A little honest carefulness in this respect will be sufficient to detect any such fraud, and may prevent suffering to many an innocent child. The extract we subjoin is from the Boston "Emancipator," whose able editor is constantly looking out for advantages in favour of free labour:

"MUSLIN DE LAINE.—The fabric of fine muslin from sheep's wool, is a great advantage in favour of free labor, as it supersedes so much the use of cotton. Only a few years ago, it was deemed impossible to introduce the manufacture into this country, on account of the labour required; but Yankee ingenuity has so much simplified the process, and contrived to do so much of it by machinery, that it has been most successfully established at Andover and Southbridge, Massachusetts, and Hooksett and Manchester, New Hampshire. In a few weeks, the manufacture in those four towns will equal 244,000 yards per week, or eleven millions a year, equal to more than a million of dresses, in value more than two millions of dollars, and consuming at least a million pounds of wool. The Atlas, to which we are indebted for these facts, and which sees in them only a glory of the protective system, says they are supplied 'at a cost far less than they can now be imported.'

'Great pains are taken to secure the best materials to form the web of the cloth, and an article is produced that can hardly be distinguished from the highest priced foreign manufacture; in appearance and in durability it is quite as good, and in many instances it is afforded at a half or even a third of the price of the foreign article. Two years' more aid and protection from the tariff will have so firmly established this manufacture, that it will drive the foreign goods entirely from our market, by the substitution of a better as well as cheaper article.'

In two years, then, there will be no objection to the introduction of muslin de laine duty free, will there?

THE LATE DANIEL NEALE.—We felt in common with our anti-slavery friends the loss our community sustained in the removal of this valuable contributor in the cause of the oppressed. In none of the obituaries we have read of him has his worth been over-rated. On the contrary, they were characterized, as we thought, by that careful truthfulness which distinguished the individual to whom they related. To our minds, few persons united to so warm a heart a more tranquil judgment. In the midst of the most exciting scenes, he was not stoically, but considerately and firmly serene. No man's mind was better balanced to meet an emergency of good or evil. When right demanded he was unyielding in its support. His calm counsel and steady purpose were felt when he was present; when absent, they were sought. His exemplary industry afforded him the means of a large liberality. His house gave shelter to the slave, and hospitality to the slave's friend. This hospitality was not at the cost of the slave's toil. His benevolence was not bounded by caste or colour, but it embraced the whole poor, as well as the poorest of the poor. He is gone! Where is the receiver of his mantle?—His departure was on the 15th of the Fourth month last, in the 63d year of his age.

CHARLES T. TOWNE.—The sentence of six years imprisonment in the Baltimore Penitentiary pronounced against this friend of the oppressed, for assisting the escapes of those slaves, nearly five years of which sentence remained to be fulfilled, has been abrogated by a higher authority than man's; and his freed spirit, we trust, is now under the divine favour, in the fruition of that act of mercy which human laws pronounced to be criminal. He departed this life on the ninth ult., at 3 o'clock, P. M., leaving behind him, for the consolation of his weeping friends, the evident assurance that he had for his companion in prison THE PRISONER'S FRIEND.

"TO DO GOOD AND TO COMMENDATE FORGET NOT."
—We recognize the fulfilment of this injunction in the following letter from a Christian brother. "The wisdom that is from above," is "full of mercy and good fruits." The unsolicited and liberal contribution of our highly esteemed friend has been handed over to the Treasurer of the Association, and makes the capital which that institution now holds by gift, for the purchase of free cotton and conducting its manufacture, three hundred and seventy dollars. Besides this amount, three thousand five hundred dollars have been loaned without interest, for the same purpose. A much larger sum than the aggregate of these, is wanted, by gift or loan, for the further operations of the Association.

Peterboro, May 18, 1846.

ABRAHAM L. PRENDER.

My dear Friend.—I was greatly interested in the last number of the Non-Slaveholder.

What is needed is, that the Free Produce Association have a few hundred dollars a year for some half dozen years. With these few hundred dollars they can cover the difference between the prices of Free and Slave labor Cotton, so far as they can buy the former, and cover also the difference in the expense of manufacturing. I see that the manufacturer may require an extra price, if he keep the free cotton separate from his slave cotton. I shall be glad to help the Association from time to time. The Association will expend the accompanying draft in such manner as it sees fit.

Your friend,

GEORGE SMITH.

SLAVE COTTON PAPER.—We are frequently interrogated as to the propriety of using paper made of cotton rags, the product of slave labour. Our predilections are adverse to such use, if it can possibly be avoided. At the same time we are prepared to say that we perceive an important distinction between the using of rags offal, for the formation of which slavery does not exist, and the using of cotton cloth for the formation of which it does exist. Whatever the rule may be, it should obviously be one which would generally apply to the use of the offal remains, in a similar degree valueless, of any article procured by any act of violence.

POETRY.

The following lines, written by William Cowper more than half a century since, have lost nothing of their force by the lapse of time. Tom is as fresh a character as ever, and he well represents many an arguer of the present day.

PITY FOR POOR AFRICANS.

\ Videtur meliora proferre, Deteriora sequi.**

I own I am shock'd at the purchase of slaves,
And fear those who buy them and sell them are knaves;

What I hear of their hardships, their tortures, and groans,

Is almost enough to draw pity from stones.

I pity them greatly, but I must be mum,
For how could we do without sugar and rum?
Especially sugar, so needful we see;

What, give up our deserts, our coffee, and tea?

Besides, if we do, the French, Dutch, and Danes
Will heartily thank us; no doubt, for our pains;
If we do not buy the poor creatures, they will,
And tortures and groans will be multiplied still.

If foreigners likewise would give up the trade,
Much more in behalf of your wish might be said;
But, while they get riches by purchasing blacks,
Pray tell me why we may not also go snacks!

Your scruples and arguments bring to my mind
A story so pal, you may think it is coin'd,
On purpose to answer you, out of my mind;
But I can assure you I saw it in print.

A youngster at school, more sedate than the rest,
Had once his integrity put to the test;

His comrades had plotted an orchard to rob,
And asked him to go and assist in the job.

He was shock'd, sir, like you, and answer'd: 'Oh no!
What! rob our good neighbor! I pray you don't go!
Besides the man's poor, his orchard's his bread,
Then think of his children, for they must be fed.'

You speak very fine, and you look very grave,
But apples we want, and apples we'll have;

If you will go with us, you shall have a share,
If not, you shall have neither apple nor pear.

They spoke, and Tom ponder'd—'I see they will go:
Poor man! what a pity to injure him so!

Poor man! I would save him his fruit if I could,
But staying behind will do him no good.

If the matter depended alone upon me,

His apples might hang, till they drop from the tree;
But, since they will take them, I think I'll go too.
He will lose none by me, though I get a few."

His scruples thus silenced, Tom felt more at ease,
And went with his comrades the apples to seize;
He blam'd and protested, but join'd in the plan:
He shared in the plunder, but pitied the man.

FRIENDS FREE PRODUCE ASSOCIATION IN NEW YORK.—The annual meeting of this association took place on fourth day evening last, and was attended by a large number of Friends of both sexes. The meeting was a very satisfactory one, but we have not space to enter this month into the particulars. These will be furnished in our next number.

AGENTS.—In making out our list of Agents, where we have published names without permission, we have been guided in our selection by what we have observed of the interest taken in our Journal, and have given a preference to those who have sent us six or more subscribers. In a few instances we may have taken the wrong names from the list furnished, for want of knowing who was most concerned in procuring the subscribers. Such mistakes will be corrected when the subscriber taken in error, shall give us the proper name. Any omissions, we shall be glad to supply. We reckon among our friends, several who have not yet sent us any subscribers, and are daily in expectation of receiving their lists.

INTELLIGENCE.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT ABOLISHED IN MICHIGAN.—Michigan is the first State in the Union to abolish the punishment of death for murder. On the 2d ult., the bill to abolish Capital Punishment, passed the House by a vote in the ratio of three to two. It had already passed the Senate by a vote of three to one. We shall now have an opportunity of testing by actual experiment, whether the abolition of the gallows will make the crime of murder more frequent, as is alledged by the advocates of the death penalty.

HAVEN.—The slaveholders who wield the power of the American government, have, undoubtedly, some deep plot in hand concerning the island of St. Domingo. They covet the island, and it is a terrible eye-sore to them to see a black republic there. The friends of the African race are bound to keep a constant lookout. The following has appeared within a few days:

"It is stated by the Pensacola correspondent of the Picayune that the U. S. brig Porpoise, Lieut. Commanding Hunt, sailed on the 12th inst., having on board Lieut. Porter, charged with special duty, for St. Domingo. He says the Porpoise will visit most of the ports of the Island with a view of procuring ample information on all points affecting the interests of American citizens."—Emancipator.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE NON-SLAVERHOLDER

Is published on the first of each month, at one dollar per annum for one copy, or five dollars per annum for six copies in one order, payable in advance. Abraham L. Penrock, Samuel Rhoads, and George W. Taylor, are the Editors and Publishers; either of whom will receive subscriptions, payments, and communications. Letters and papers addressed to them, or endorsed Non-Slaverholder, directed to box 777, Philadelphia Post Office, will duly reach them.

LIST OF AGENTS.

Maine.

John D. Lang, North Berwick.
Stephen Jones, Brunswick.
Daniel Taber, Vassalborough.

New Hampshire.

Asa C. Tuttle, Dover.
Moses Sawyer, Weare.
Thos. Roberts, Farmington.

Vermont.

Henry Miles, Monkton.
Amos Battey, Starksboro'.

Massachusetts.

Wm. C. Taber, New Bedford.
Lydia Pope, Salem.
Wm. Hawkes, Lynn.
Wm. Henry Hobbs, South Dartmouth.
Richard Battey, Uxbridge.

Rhode Island.

Samuel Austin, Providence.
Thos. R. Hazard, Newport.

Connecticut.

Abraham Wamser, Sherman, P. O.
Howell Wettenhall, North Canaan.

New York.

Daniel Bond, 37 Market street, N. York.
Edward Marshall, Jr., 99 John st., N. Y.
Thomas Willis, Jericho, L. I.
Robert R. Parsons, Flushing, L. I.
Henry Titus, Jerusalem South L. I.
Richard Carpenter, Mamaroneck, West Chester co.
Wm. Shotwell, West Farms, West Chester co.
David Irish, Quaker Hill, Dutchess co.
Silas Cornell, Rochester, Monroe co.
J. J. Thomas, Macedon, Wayne co.
Joseph Bowne, Butternuts, Otsego co.
Benj. Ross, Snynua, Chenango co.
Wm. Keese, Keeseville, Essex co.
Benj. Bowman, Scottsville, Monroe co.
Merrit Force, Lowville, Lewis co.
Hartas Hedley, Millville, Orleans co.
Isaac G. Thorn, Washington, Dutchess co.

New Jersey.

Wm. J. Allison, Burlington.
Samuel Allison, Jr., Yardville, Mercer co.
Jonathan Freedland, Salem.
Benj. Parker, Shrewsbury.
Joel Wilson, Rahway.
Joseph Tatam, Woodbury.
Nathan B. Willis, Haddonfield.

Pennsylvania.

Enoch Lewis, New Garden, Chester co.
Wm. Kirkwood, Coopersville, Lancaster co.

S. C. Passmore, Jermersville, Chester co.
Moses Whitman, Penningtonville, Chester co.
George Spencer, Borsum, Montgomery co.
Wm. A. Thomas, Ballafra.
Thos. Mendenhall, Benton, P. O., Columbia co.
Joshua B. Sharpless, Downingtown.
S. Hambleton, Russellville, Chester co.

Delaware.

Samuel Hille, Wilmington.

Maryland.

Thos. Levering, Rising Sun, Cecil co.

Ohio.

Lemuel Jones, Mount Pleasant.
Caleb Hathaway, Milan, Erie co.
Wm. H. Ladd, Richmond, Jefferson co.
Penrose Hussey, Smithfield, Jefferson co.
Aaron L. Benedict, Bennington, Delaware co.
John Hunt, P. M., Martinsville, Clinton co.
Joseph Maddock, Sen., West Elkton, Preble co.
John Street, Jr., Salem, Columbiana co.
Benj. Malmesbury, Damascus, Columbiana co.
Asa Williams, West Liberty, Logan co.

Indiana.

Jeremiah Hadley, Jr., Mooresville, Morgan co.
James Haworth, Mooresville, Morgan co.
John Cox, Darlington, Montgomery co.
Joel Parker, P. M., New Garden, Wayne co.
Henry Bentley, Carthage, Rush co.
Richard Gordon, Spiceland, Henry co.
Seth Hushaw, Greensboro', Henry co.
Job Hadley, Springtown, Hendricks co.
Rowland T. Root, Richmond, Wayne co.
Harvey Thomas, Thorntown, Boone co.
Lael T. Perington, Westfield, Hamilton co.
Hudson Middleton, Crawfordsville.
Marshall Dixon, Winchester, Randolph co.
George Valentine, Blooming Grove, Franklin co.

Illinois.

Henry Harrison, York, Clark co.

Michigan.

Wm. Beal, Rollin, Lenawee co.
Stephen Bogue, Cassopolis, Cass co.
Edward Gorton, Ypsilanti.

Iowa.

Joseph D. Hoag, Mount Pleasant, Henry co.

Great Britain.

Charles Tylor, Stamford Hill, near London.

☞ New subscribers will please state what numbers they have received.

FREE LABOR ICE CREAM For sale by Joseph Fiskell, every day at 61 Fourth street Market, and 322 N. 5th above Green.

FREE LABOR COTTON GOODS—Bleached and brown 4-4 and 5-4 shirting and sheeting muslin, assorted colored cambrics, calicoes, and style fast colors, and glaziers in store; also manufacturing, provided to be finished shortly, cotton twilled pantaloons stuff, apron check and cotton diaper and plaid table cloth stuff, assorted widths, for, and manufactured from free cotton produced by the Free Produce Association of Friends, at Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. We have also in store India yellow and blue shillings, weavers plaid and striped, white grass cloth, fine grass cloth, table or cravats, and mill muslin. For sale by

THOMAS S. FIELD & CO.

Commission Merchants;

3th and 5th, 1425. No. 101 N. Front st. up stairs.

PRINTED AT
Merrihew & Thompson's Book and Job Office,
No. 7 Carter's Alley.

THE

NON-SLAVERHOLDER.

"Whoso gives the motive, makes his brother's sin his own."

VOL. I.]

PHILADELPHIA, SEVENTH MONTH, 1842.

[NO. 7.]

ASSOCIATED ACTION.

REPORT OF THE BOARD OF MANAGERS OF THE
FREE PRODUCE ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDS
OF NEW YORK YEARLY MEETING.

In presenting a report of the proceedings of this Association for the past year, the Board of Managers have to state that they have laboured under considerable disadvantage, arising from an apparent feeling of apathy in the minds of many Friends, respecting the promotion of the objects of the Association.

They have held six meetings; at one of which a committee was appointed to elicit information from Friends generally, as to whether there was a probability of articles, the product of free labour, being purchased by them, if such were procured and offered for sale. The result was that a large number of Friends would encourage such an undertaking, if the articles could be furnished at the same price as goods, the product of slave labour; a comparatively small number being willing to give a higher price should it be found necessary to charge it. Several letters have been received on the subject, which have been encouraging and satisfactory, and the Committee are of opinion that a large quantity of goods might be sold if the means necessary for establishing a free produce store could be obtained.

A committee was afterwards appointed to solicit donations, and loans without interest, for this object. This attempt has not yet resulted in a subscription at all adequate for the purpose proposed.

Information has been received from the kindred Association in Philadelphia, that a large amount of cotton can be obtained from different sections of our own country, of the best quality, and free from the labour of slaves, at a very trifling advance, if any, above the price of slave grown cotton. An establishment near Philadelphia is now manufacturing goods of free grown cotton, supplied by that Association.

It is evident that the larger the quantity of free labour goods, which may be manufactured and sold, the cheaper will be the rate at which they can be afforded; and it is apprehended that the reason of such goods having been, heretofore, held at a high price has been the smallness of the demand for them. Important information having been received as to the large quantity of free grown cotton that can be obtained, and the difficulties in the way of its manufacture having been in great measure removed, the managers hope that Friends from the country, as well as of this city, will now come forward and advance means sufficient to open a general free produce store upon a proper scale; whereby not only our citizens, but Friends and others from the country, may be supplied with goods undoubtedly free from the gain of oppression."

We also learn from the Association alluded to, that our friends in England have already manufactured a variety of cotton goods, and have sent samples to our friends in Philadelphia, who say, "From this quarter we may, therefore, hope to obtain a supply, which, added to the fabrics produced in our own country, may furnish a variety to meet our necessary demands, and facilitate the exclusion of the products of slave labour."

The Board of managers have printed one hundred and fifty copies of the Constitution, which have had a limited circulation.

Some Friends in Philadelphia, connected with the Free Produce Association, have commenced the publication of a monthly periodical called "The Non-Slaverholder," devoted chiefly to the advocacy of abstinence from the produce of slave labour. Much interesting information on the subject is contained in its columns, and it is thought to be well calculated to advance the cause. The Managers wish particularly to call attention to an article in the fourth number of that paper, entitled "The Slaver Pons." The minds of many have lately been introduced into much sympathy with the victims of the slave trade and slavery, by reading the accounts of that vessel. In contemplating the sufferings of these poor creatures—more than nine hundred in number—on board of this ship, and so stowed in the hold that the air, when the hatches were closed down, had to be breathed over once in thirty minutes, every feeling mind must be ready to exclaim, "would that I could do something to prevent these things! for this is but a small portion of the hundreds of thousands that are annually torn from, or murdered in Africa!" Let every one then bring the inquiry home, Do I, in any way, countenance, or contribute to the support of this horrible barbarity? Is it true that "He who gives the motive, makes his brother's sin his own?" Is there, or is there not, an intimate, though indirect connection, between those who cause the agonies of these poor Africans, and the purchasers of the luxuries which they are kidnapped to produce? As remarked in the article alluded to, "If the Pons had succeeded in landing her cargo of Africans on the shores of Brazil, their labour would soon have produced a cargo of sugar for our market." We condemn the slave-trade, as inhuman, whilst we encourage and support him by paying for those fruits which are cultivated with the life-blood of his victims! For we are informed, by good authority, that in the Island of Cuba it has been, for years, the practice of importing men chiefly from Africa. That they are worn out, and die in an average of ten years; and that their places are again filled up by fresh importations of their countrymen, who are required to drag out their term of ten years, and to die in the production of those articles which we consume!

This is said to be the most economical way of producing sugar in the Island of Cuba! And under this system we are told, by the authority of slaveholders themselves, that the greatest average production in this island, on the best conducted estates, is 5000 pounds per annum for each slave on the plantation. The general average of sugar for each slave on all the sugar estates in Cuba, cannot exceed 4000 pounds—and is most likely much less.*

* The average production of sugar in Louisiana in 1840, was 2,367 pounds to each slave, and the number of slaves employed in that cultivation was 50,670. The average production of cotton in that state was 1636 pounds, and the number of slaves 93,220.

The entire crop of sugar in Cuba in 1840 is stated by the Intendant of Havana at 321,636,000; to which must be added 58,895,024 pounds which is ascertained to have been sent into the United States under the guise of molasses, for the purpose of evading the duty. Thus the total production of sugar in Cuba, in 1840, may be stated at 380,531,024 pounds. The annual importation of slaves into Cuba, to keep up the cultivation of the island is said to be from 40 to 50,000. Taking the number at 40,000, we find that for each slave brought into the island, there appears to be 9513

Unimpeachable records of the slave trade show, that for every one hundred and twenty Africans that are landed, and become available to the planter on the coast of America, not less than two hundred and fifty-five have perished in the horrible details of that inhuman traffic. If then one slave thus represents more than three Africans, it appears, according to this proportion, that the average life of those who are required to cultivate the Island of Cuba, is represented by three years and two months! And these three years and two months,—at 4000 pounds per annum,—are again represented by about 12,000 pounds of sugar—the equivalent for the life of a man!

The average duration of human life is said to be about 33 years; and supposing the African would, in a civilized state, live to that period—(and of this there is no doubt)—we find that for the production of this 12,000 pounds of sugar, nearly thirty years of human life are sacrificed—being less than eighteen ounces of sugar for one day of human life! One of our celebrated countrymen remarked that he seldom looked upon a piece of sugar without fancying it covered with spots of human blood. And if we, when partaking of this luxury, could realize these truths, should we not be induced, in unutterable disgust, to eject it from the palate, as being saturated with the blood of our fellow man. Does not the purchaser and consumer of goods produced by the labour of slaves, furnish the incentive which keeps the whole system in action? And if so, is not every one responsible in proportion to the degree of support he may give to it? May these then who have had their attention called to the subject, use their best endeavors to keep their hands clean; that in the summing up of all things, it may be said of them, as of Mary of old, "she has done what she could"—remembering the language of scripture, "He who knoweth to do right and doeth it not, to him it is sin!"

The Board of Managers have had, throughout the course of the past year, deeply to regret that they have not been able to do more to promote this cause; and although they have at times felt somewhat discouraged, yet they are not without hope that the minds of Friends will be more generally turned to this subject; as they are well satisfied that abstinence from the use of articles produced by slaves, would be one great means of the ultimate and total abolition of slavery.

It may indeed be said that we are so intimately connected with slavery and oppression, in our various relations with those who uphold and support it, that it is impossible for us, whilst living in the civilized world, to be entirely free from contributing indirectly to its support. And, upon this view of the case, many are doubtless discouraged from making any attempt to free themselves from the connexion;—arguing "that to be consistent in abstinence from the indirect support of slavery is impossible, it therefore cannot be our duty to attempt it in part!" If after washing our hands, and thinking them clean, we were to examine them with the aid of a microscope, we should find evidence sufficient to convince us that they were not. Is then the fact that we cannot cleanse our hands entirely from the dust of the earth, a reason sufficient that we should not attempt to remove from them the filth that may be palpable to the naked eye? There is a Power, more searching than the microscope,—that lays bare the secrets of the heart, and manifests the hidden things of darkness;—in the light of whose revealing, we are enabled to perceive the least infraction of His law. It is this Power, we reverently believe, which renders us uneasy in the continuance and support of that gigantic system of oppression, which was commenced in iniquity, and is carried on in sin; and in relation to which some of us have heard, in language more powerful than words, "touch not, taste not, handle not the unclean thing."

In concluding their report the managers would call the attention of the members of the Association, and of Friends generally, to the Minute of the Meeting for Sufferings on the subject of slave labour. That Minute was fully approved by our late Yearly Meeting, (1845) not having a single dissenting voice; and was directed to be sent down to the subordinate meetings. It has been circulated far and near, in this land, and beyond the sea; and has been the occasion of praise and eulogy to our Yearly Meetings—which to be gratifying, needs only the consciousness of being merited. Without this consciousness the praise of others is humiliating in the extreme. The managers therefore feel it their duty to call attention to the position we now occupy. Shall we maintain the high ground which has elicited the approbation of all the friends of the oppressed? or, deserting that ground, are we prepared to hear the accents of praise turned into the voice of derision, as being, apparently, indisposed or unprepared to live up to the standard which we proclaim to others? Let it not be said of us, that we have begun to build, and are not able to finish. Difficulties there are to be met with;—but let us not abandon our principles because we meet with difficulties in the way of supporting them. The reward of success is sweetened by the remembrance of the difficulties through which we have passed to attain it. None can gainsay the justice of our cause. Why then should we desert it? Let us rather, as individuals, join heart and hand in support of those principles which, as a Yearly Meeting, we have proclaimed to the world.

To use the words of the Minute alluded to, "There is a force in united efforts, especially when enlisted in the cause of virtue, which, when discreetly and perseveringly conducted, can achieve wonders. It is true that, at the present time, the products of slavery are so intertwined with our various occupations and wants, that we scarcely can see how to disengage ourselves from them; yet, if our attention be singly fixed upon the pointing of Truth, in reference to this subject, we may reasonably trust that it will guide us rightly, and prepare our way before us. In ancient days, when the progress of a people, who were journeying by divine direction, was obstructed by a river that spread its breadth in their way, they were required to advance until the soles of their feet pressed the margin of the stream; and thus standing, the retreating waters gave way before them, and they passed over dry-shod. If, following this example, we proceed as far as we can, and there stand—willing to advance if a way can be discovered, all past experience unites in bearing testimony, in favour of the belief, that little by little, the difficulties will yield until the whole are surmounted."

Signed by direction and on behalf of the Board of Managers.

ROBERT B. PARSONS, Secretary.
New York, 5th mo. 27th, 1846.

COMMUNICATIONS.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

LETTER FROM THOMAS CLARKSON.

To the Managers of the Free Produce Association of Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

MY ESTEEMED FRIENDS,—Though I have been forbidden by my medical friends to have any thing more to do with public affairs, and though I have need of repose, after 61 years of work, during the little span of life which Providence may think fit yet to give me, I should be wanting in my duty to the poor sufferers on your side of the water, if I were not to attempt to second your humane and generous efforts, by trying to answer some of the questions put to me, on the subjects mentioned in your letter. I have no public documents at hand for your information, but must content myself with sending you the result of my memory, taking care that nothing comes to you from my hands but what may be relied upon as strictly true.

The pamphlet, which occasioned the general abstinence from sugar in England in 1791 and 1792, was written by a person of the name of Fox, whom I knew, but whose Christian name I do not recollect. It was written in such a clear and convincing manner, that it seemed impossible for any reader of common feeling, of common sense, and of common morality, to withstand it. The reader was carried away by a stream, as it were, which he found himself unable to resist. As far as I recollect, the drift of it was, to make the consumer equally guilty with the planter. The sensation created by the reading of this book made a deep impression, so that he, who read it, felt himself morally bound to communicate its contents to his friend; hence it became known throughout the island, and a flame was spread, such, I believe, as was never known in England on the subject. It became at length the general topic of conversation. The nobleman, as well as the plebeian, was affected by the work. I was travelling at this time all over the island, a tour of about 8000 miles, to try to pick up respectable evidence to be laid before the Lords and Commons, relative to the monstrous evils attached inherently to the slave trade, in order that they might form their judgment concerning them, with a view to their abolition. I had then an opportunity of seeing what was going on, with respect to this subject, in all parts of the kingdom. I visited scarcely a family in the course of my rounds, where the book was not known. I found it in the families of noblemen and gentlemen of the highest fortunes. I found that the flame had even, in some cases, reached their servants, who out of their little incomes sent four or five shillings by way of subscription to the London Committee for the abolition of the slave trade. In the course of my journey also, I saw the book lying in a great many of the inns and coffee houses. It would not be unfair if you were to ask me, how happened it, that if the people in England were so devoted to the abolition, that the House of Commons in 1791 threw out the bill for that purpose? I answer, because the majority consisted of planters and of those gentlemen in the House of Commons whom the shipping interest, the West India interest, and other powerful interests, privately canvassed, and prevailed upon to vote for them. I am sorry I have not Fox's book to send you; I fear a copy cannot now be procured.

With respect to the Cotton question, as in the former case, I have no documents at hand to refer to; but in 1840, my late friend, Joseph Pease, of Darlington, in the county of Durham, invited my co-operation to a plan which had been proposed, and which he had much at heart, to better the condition of the natives of British India. I answered that I would give him all my spare time, but this would not amount to much. The plan proposed was, that the East India Company should, instead of making the rent of the land dependent on its production, let it to the Ryots at a low fixed rate, on long leases; thus the cultivation of the land would be extended and improved, the condition of the people elevated, and many of the famines, which afflicted India so grievously, would be prevented. It was also proposed that several millions of acres should be appropriated to the cultivation of sugar and cotton for the European markets, on which only free men should be employed; and by which means, if proper skill and capital were engaged in the management, it was evident, that all the slave grown sugar and cotton of the western world might be driven out of the European markets by the superior quality and less price of that from India. The attention called to the subject induced the Directors of the East India Company to examine into the merits of the plan proposed, and they so far concurred in it, that they obtained from the United States a large supply of cotton seed, and, at the same time, secured the services of several practical cotton planters, to conduct a series of experiments upon certain farms in different parts of their territories. Some of these experiments have failed, but others have been realized both in the Bombay and the Madras Presidency, and I am informed that the latest information received from India, on which the utmost reliance may be placed, goes to prove that not only may good cotton be obtained in almost unlimited quantities, but may be purchased on the spot, at prices varying from one penny to one penny furling per pound. All that is required, is the application of capital and skill to aid the native cultivator to raise a quantity for export, equal to the demands of this country.

I have just heard that 250 bales of cotton have arrived at Liverpool from one of the company's experimental farms.

Now, my friends, if you were to ask me, what I think of the cotton cultivation of the East Indies, I should say, without any hesitation, that it is proceeding to a vast extent, and as much of the soil is suitable for it, and free labour is to be had at one penny or two pence a day, it can be sold in Europe, notwithstanding the greater distance, on far lower terms than what is produced in America, by the expensive mode of slave labour.

But one of the most delightful and encouraging circumstances connected with British India, is, that slavery is now legally abolished in every portion of it under the dominion of the British Crown; and there is now no fear of promoting slavery, by an increase of demand for the produce of that country. An obstacle is thus completely removed, which prevented many of the abolitionists of Great Britain, in their individual as well as their collective capacity, from pushing the matter forward in a manner which they now feel it their duty to do.

I may add to this, another pleasing circumstance, which is, that the East India Company can never be stopped in their cultivation for want of labourers; for it is a fact, that one hundred thousand can be had, and more, if wanted, after a reasonable notice.

I am, my esteemed friends,

Your friend,

THOMAS CLARKSON.

Playford Hall, near Ipswich, May 1, 1846.

To the Editors of the Non-Slaveholder.

In the year 1827 an address was delivered by Dr. Jones in the Hall of the Franklin Institute, Philadelphia, on the advantages to be derived from the employment of slaves in the manufacturing of cotton and other goods. Our friend Enoch Lewis published the following severe strictures upon it in his "African Observer." They were transferred to the columns of The Friend with remarks justly and highly commendatory; in which the writer says: "We may be assured, that so long as the people of the south derive wealth from the labour of their slaves they will be loath to sacrifice its indulgence to avoid remote dangers. We find, accordingly, that it is only in those parts where almost the only profitable management of a stock, is one at which generous minds revolt, that a real interest is taken in the emancipation of the blacks, the substitution of free labourers, and the deliverance of the whites from the thralldom in which, by a just retribution of Providence, a servile population must always hold its masters."

I think it important to keep these sentiments prominently in view at the present time, when even amongst Friends the doctrine is frequently asserted, that to cease contributing to the wealth which the people of the south derive from the labour of their slaves, would bring misery and starvation upon the latter.

"In calling (says Enoch Lewis) the attention of my readers to this address, I am far from desiring to intimate an opinion, which the author expressly deprecates, that he is an advocate of slavery, or willing to promote any measures which are calculated to perpetuate that harsh institution. It would be with the greatest reluctance that I should adopt such an opinion, and certainly could not justify to myself the attempt to cast such a stigma upon so respectable a character. I must, however, be allowed to suppose, that the tendency of the doctrines contained in some parts of the address, and those not the least prominent, is not in favour of the cause of emancipation. The establishment for which he so earnestly pleads, and in which, he asserts, the philanthropist and political economist must agree with equal pleasure, appears to me, if carried into effect, likely to rivet more firmly the fetters of slavery. The author has, indeed, advanced an opinion, that the formation of extensive manufactories, in which the operatives are slaves, or at least negroes, will improve the condition of the slaves, and pave the way to their ultimate emancipation. The manner in which these effects are to be produced, is not clearly stated; we have, therefore, ample room to suppose that a contrary result may arise.

"We are told, that, for a considerable period, the planters in many places, have found it extremely difficult to pay their current expenses, and to feed and clothe their negroes, from the annual produce of their lands; and thousands have removed to the more fertile regions in the western states, not with a view of accumulating wealth, but merely for the purpose of obtaining a ready and abundant supply for their negro families. Thousands more of our southern fellow citizens will be compelled to adopt the same expedient, unless some new resource be obtained. This is, in effect, an acknowledgement that the exhausted soil no longer supports the expense of slave cultivation; or, in other words, that the labour of the slaves will no longer support the masters and themselves, and that the slaveholding system requires for its support some new resource, or a richer soil. THIS TO THE PHILANTHROPIST AFFORDS A PLEASING, RATHER THAN A PAINFUL PROSPECT; not that the masters should be embarrassed, but that the value of the slaves should be small. The subject of regret is, that the new and fertile soils of the west should be subjected to the same depleting regimen, and slavery find an asylum in which to maintain a sombre existence for ages to come.

"Disinterested benevolence is lovely in theory, and not less so in practice, when it can be found; but the experience of mankind, I fear, will warrant the conclusion, that motives of interest point the course, and stimulate the exertions of a maject of our race. The Author of our existence has diffused into the nature of things, a principle by which moral evils tend to exhaust their own supplies. This principle is the vis-medicatrix of nature. In regard to slavery, it is particularly important. Slave cultivation, by exhausting the soil, diminishes the profits of labour, and thence the value of Slaves. When the labour of the slave will no longer afford a surplus beyond the expense of rearing and supporting him, the temptation to retain him in that unnatural state is removed, and his emancipation becomes a natural result. If this state of things can be avoided only by emigration, attachment to the land of their birth and aversion to encountering the hardships attendant on the formation of a new settlement will unquestionably prevent many from resorting to that expedient. Hence, under such circumstances, emancipation will be more frequent than when slave labour is profitable. In most of the British colonies, official returns have been made within a few years of the slave population, the number of manumissions, and the average value of slaves; and the number of manumissions appears, as might be expected, generally, if not always, greater where the price of slaves is least. Thus, in Barbadoes and Demarara, where the slave population is nearly the same, and the legal obstructions very similar, the number of manumissions effected in a given time is nearly in an inverse ratio to the price of slaves. In the former, where the average value of a slave was £28, the number of manumissions was 408. In the latter, where a slave was worth £86, the manumissions amounted to 142. In Barbadoes, where the slaves appear to have been worth about £90 each, we find 49 manumissions out of a population of 22,000; but in the Bahamas, where the average value of a slave, was £21 8s., the manumissions for the same time are stated at 176, out of a population of 9,500 slaves, or a ratio on equal numbers, of more than 8 to 1.

If, when by exhaustion of the soil, the value of slaves employed in the labour of the field has been nearly annihilated, the introduction of manufacturing should furnish new and profitable employment for this class of labourers; the necessary consequence would be, that their value must rise, and the temptation to augment their numbers, by importations or otherwise, must increase. Hence instead of a disposition on the part of the masters to prepare them for freedom, and to promote their emancipation, they would cling more closely to what they would consider their valuable property, and frown upon every attempt which might be made to enlighten the minds of this servile class. For it is generally well understood, that knowledge in a slave, beyond what is requisite for the performance of his allotted service, is dangerous to his master.

"The Doctor appears to suppose that when the condition of the master is prosperous, the comforts of the slave must be increased. This, however is not necessarily the case. When the slave is employed in the production of commodities intended for exportation, the exactions of the master will increase, as the value of the exports advances. With the improvement of the foreign market, the attention must be directed from cultivation for home consumption, and the support of slaves be rendered more dependent on foreign supplies. This is illustrated by the case of the Bahamas compared with Jamaica, Demarara and Barbadoes. In the first, where the soil is too much exhausted for the production of sugar, the slaves are generally well fed, and their numbers increase; in the other, where the staple productions are designed for exportation, the poor slaves are gradually wasting away from excess of toil or deficiency of food."

I will probably recur to this subject again, and adduce abundant evidence that where the labourer is free, every augmentation in the demand for the produce of his toil increases his comforts; where the labourer is a slave, it diminishes them; and that to relieve the slave, you must consume less sugar: the more sugar you eat, the harder he works, the sooner he dies.

During the period which has elapsed since the suggestion of Dr. Jones, manufactures have been undertaken in some of the Southern states. The result in most, we believe in all, of these cases, has proved that slaves cannot be profitably employed in them, except in those parts involving the lowest drudgery. The intelligence necessary to the government of a machine does not usually belong to the machine called a slave. It is true that solitary examples exist of slaves possessing great mechanical abilities developed under circumstances of particular favoritism; but the security of the slave system consists in keeping down the standard intellect of the slave to the level nearly of the tool he wields. Give the slaves generally a mental equality with the operatives in well conducted manufactories, and their condition would become to them increasingly and unbearably irksome. This feeling would lead them to various expedients for escaping from it; among them the exertion of a very natural power, which, under the new lights they would possess, and the new facilities these lights would afford them, would quickly lift them out of that condition,—the power of locomotion.

BENEFIT.

SELECTIONS.

ANTI-WAR MEETING IN GLASGOW, SCOTLAND.

A public meeting of the Glasgow Anti-War Society and of others friendly to peace principles, was held in Glasgow on the evening of the 23rd of 4th month last. An Address to the Merchants, Agriculturists, and Citizens of the United States of America, on the subject of war, was adopted and directed to be forwarded to America for extensive publication.

In moving the adoption of this address, George Thompson, after making a few preliminary remarks, said—

If you would come to a right conclusion on this subject, you must approach it with a childlike simplicity and humble teachableness. You must be willing to be led in the right way, though you should be compelled to abandon the notions of expediency and necessity which you have hitherto cherished; and then, I believe, you will be brought to see the beauty, the power, the sublimity, and the divinity of non-resistance. I am individually convinced that nothing short of this principle will satisfy the demands of that law of love, under which the follower of Christ is required to live. Embracing this principle, you will at once perceive the simplicity, the symmetry, the completeness, the perfection, and the moral omnipotence of the Gospel. You will find your feet upon a rock. The mist which education, prejudice, passion, custom, and priestcraft, have thrown around the actions and occupations of men, will be dispelled by the glorious beams of the Sun of Righteousness and Peace, and you will look with profound pity upon those who think that any of the righteous plans of man, or any of the holy purposes of God, can be fitly wrought out, or assisted by the weapons of violence, or by the shedding of blood—that blood which is the life of man—whose life is the sole property of his Maker. You will find too, that this principle of non-resistance not only guards the life of man as sacred, but enters into and controls the whole conduct and deportment of him who sincerely adopts it. He goes to a heavenly armory for all the weapons he employs in his efforts to pull down the strong holds of Satan—he lives in an atmosphere of love—he has forsaken the beggarly elements of the world—he has abandoned the defences of stone walls, and muskets, and swords; and, with weapons of heavenly temper, he seeks only to penetrate the hearts and understandings of his fellow-men, and to conquer them by reason, by persuasion, by argument, and by the force of truth and love. Such is the principle of non-resistance, which, though misrepresented and reviled, finds its source, I believe, in the spirit of the Gospel, and in the heart of the Redeemer.

If these things be true, how is it that armies and their diabolical deeds find admirers and defenders among the millions of this country who call themselves Christians? The answer is this:—The Church has corrupted her way upon the earth. The days are gone when the followers of Christ arrayed themselves in the spotless garments of innocence and peace—when a Christian was a man who would submit to crucifixion rather than deny his Master, by carrying a sword. The Church has harnessed herself for battle—the chariot of the Gospel has been yoked behind the flaming steeds of war—the milk white flag of peace has been exchanged for the bloody banners of destruction, intended to be waved over the bleeding, groaning, and mutilated bodies of hosts of men, hewed down and butchered to gratify the ambition of worldly-minded and wicked statesmen, who sit at home in silken society, and promote their schemes of aggrandisement and revenge, by sacrificing thousands of their fellow-creatures on the field of slaughter. Sir, I take all the honors, and all the guilt, and all the damnation of war, and lay them at the door of a fallen and practically apostate Church. The fell demon of destruction, to whom the cries of the dying are music, and whose nectar is blood, has found his most potent auxiliary to be the Church—the Church whose bishops consecrate banners, whose archbishop makes the God who sent his Son into the world to preach, that men should love their enemies, the God of Battles, and gives Him thanks, that he has assisted our troops to butcher thirty thousand of the human race—the Church whose chaplains lay their prayer-books upon the drum-head within sight of those who are to be massacred on the morrow, and pray, 'Give peace in our time, O Lord, because there is none other that fighteth for us, but only thou, O God!'—the Church whose abbey and cathedrals are filled, not with the statues of the saints and philanthropists who have blessed the world by the preaching of the Gospel, and their deeds of mercy and benevolence, but with profligate warriors, who, while their souls were steeped in the pollution of adultery, and every species of debauchery, were constantly reeking with the gore of their fellow-creatures, and having their horses' hoofs in the clotted blood of those whose souls, by their impious and infamous mandates, had been dismissed in the act of murder from the red field of slaughter to the bar of God;—the Church, too many of whose ministers care not whether their sons obtain, through simony, a living in the Establishment, or purchase a commission in the Army, and with it a license to be the butchers of their race.

So, if such things be done in the green tree, what will be done in the dry? If such be the state of the Church, can we wonder at the state of the world? If deacons, priests, rectors, vicars, prebends, deans, arch-deacons, and arch-bishops, convert the God of the Bible into a being, the very counterpart of that horrid deity whom the Hindoos worship as the goddess of blood—if they identify God with all the deception and drunkenness of the recruiting system—if they make him the commander in chief of an army, made up of graceless Englishmen—prodigal sons, who have broken the hearts of their parents—worthless husbands, who have forsaken their families, and licentious officers whose ordinary pastime, in many instances, is gauding and seduction—an army that never moves in India but it carries in its train half as many prostitutes as soldiers—an army, that is composed chiefly of those who either call upon Mahomet to help them, or upon Juggernaut and Hales, and the host of deities who are the personifications of sin, and whose rites are lust and murder—if, I say, the ministers of the religion of Christ in Britain can identify God with such an army, make him its leader, give him thanks for its butcheries, and ask him to reward its institutions, can we wonder that there is joy in hell, and that war continues to desolate, and scourge, and curse the world? Sir, is such a nation as ours warranted to expect that she will be made the instrument of converting the world? Does not Britain herself need to be converted from a religion of war to a religion of peace? Can her ministers have in them the mind that was in Christ, when they are found supporting a system that sends annually tens of thousands of victims to the bottomless pit?—a system that begins in sin—that annihilates the freedom and responsibility of man—that trains myriads of men to the profession of deliberate murder—that carries havoc and desolation into the fairest regions of the earth—that multiplies widows and orphans—that substitutes the command of a General for the law of God, and is, in fact, a standing proof of the practical atheism of those by whom it is supported?

Sir, as far as I am acquainted with our recent wars, I am prepared to say, that we have in all respects fallen short of the heathen, with whom we have been fighting, in regard to honor, good faith, and humanity. Take one or two examples: what was the Afghan war, but one, on our part, of senseless aggression—destitute altogether of excuse, even according to the maxims of those who uphold wars? We were threatened with no danger. The people against whom we marched our army were not enemies, but friends. It was not to redeem them from slavery—for they were as free, and more so, than we are in this country. The ruler we sought to depose was not a tyrant, but, on the contrary, ruled with the approbation and love of the people. The man we sought to place upon the throne, was a man who was hated by the people, and had been expelled thirty years before, in consequence of his despotic vices. Into this country we marched our army—passing our own natural frontier, and crossing deserts, rivers, and mountains—to invade it. We butchered the people—we blew up their fortresses—we enslaved their chiefs—we occupied their cities—we hurled their ruler from his throne—we set up an execrated and imbecile tyrant: and we lauded over the whole region its political agents, revenue collectors, and military officers, who carried on intrigues, ground the people to the dust by their exactions, and revelled in licentiousness among the women of the country. Remember, I am saying no more than I can prove by the most undeniable evidence. At last, the monarch whom we had set up was assassinated. The depraved conduct of some of our principal functionaries disgusted the people, and inflamed them with hatred and revenge. At this juncture, Akbar Khan, son of the popular ruler, Dost Mahomed, whom we had sent two thousand miles away into captivity and exile, gathered around him some of the chiefs of the country and their tribes, and it was resolved that an effort should be made to drive out the invaders. The season of the year favored the plans of the patriots. They seized a number of our countrymen and soldiers, and held them as hostages for the restoration of the banished prince. They forced our army to evacuate the capital, and you all know that many thousands of our soldiers and their followers perished amidst the snows of the Khyber Pass in the ill-fated retreat from Cabul. Well, what then came to pass? Forced to treat with the victorious Akbar Khan, we at length restored his father, and resolved to leave the country. The prisoners who had been taken by Akbar Khan were delivered up, and bore uniform and unhesitating testimony to the kindness, the respect and the scrupulously delicacy with which they had been treated during their captivity. What was our final act? The troops of Candahar and Jellalabad having formed a junction, and being on the point of leaving the country, determined to act upon the instructions of Lord Ellenborough, who had directed that some signal act of vengeance should be perpetrated ere Afghanistan was quitted forever. Bear in mind, that every prisoner had been delivered up, without the injury of a single hair of any one of their heads, and without the infliction of a single insult. How did we regard this treatment of our countrywomen and soldiers? Why, by setting to work like demons, and destroying the bazaar of Cabul, one of the finest places of the kind in Asia—by demolishing the grand mart in which the peaceful merchants of the country, who had done nothing to offend us, but furnish our supplies and negotiate our bills, had deposited their goods, and were wont to carry on their trade.

Now, sir, contrast the conduct of these barbarous Afghans, these followers of Mahomet, with the conduct of the civilized English, the professed followers of Jesus, and tell me which of the two most illustrated the spirit and morality of the Christian religion. Tell me, too, what you think of the return made for the safe delivery into our hands of every captive that had been taken by these Afghans. What is the consequence? We have turned tribes of men, who might have been retained as friends, into bitter enemies; and we have brought into contempt and detestation the name of Christianity, throughout a country where our peaceful influence and pure example might have scattered boundless blessings, and diffused the saving knowledge of the truth. Now, set over against the conduct of the British in Cabul, the conduct of the Chinese. We went to war with the Chinese solely in consequence of the refusal of the government of that empire to allow a pernicious and contraband trade in opium. During that war, the Europeans who had lived in the immediate vicinity of Canton had fled for safety to other places, under the protection of some friendly flag. On the conclusion of the peace between Great Britain and China, they returned, and found that, while we had been perpetrating the unspeakable horrors of Chusan, and blowing up towns and cities on the coast, the houses and property which these merchants had left to the mercy of the Chinese had been sacredly guarded, and that they were again in possession of what they had left behind them.

A work has recently been published, relating to the Punjab. It is from the pen of the present political agent in that country, Major Lawrence. That officer records a conversation which he once had with a Mahomedan, who had been for nearly thirty years the principal minister of Runjeet Singh. It was on the subject of religion, and in the course of it, the aged Mahomedan expressed his surprise that the English should live without any appearance of a belief in God. Major Lawrence assured him that the English did believe in God—that they had a religion—and that he would ascertain such to be a fact, if he sent to Loodiana and consulted the missionary there, who would also produce the book in which the English believed. The Sikh minister then apologized for his error, and said he recollected one Englishman who had deeply impressed him with a conviction of his goodness and his piety. Major Lawrence inquired who the Englishman was, upon which Azizudeen said his name was Ferguson, and he would relate under what circumstances he had become convinced of his piety: Mr. Ferguson, while on business at Lahore, was attacked by some fanatical Sikhs, called Akalees, and wounded: upon which Runjeet Singh directed Azizudeen to wait upon the English gentleman, and express his sorrow for what had happened, and his determination to punish the offenders. "I fully expected," said the Mahomedan, "to find him smeared with blood, and anxious for revenge. Instead of this, I found him on his couch, covered with a clean sheet, with a pale but sweetly forgiving countenance reading a book. On seeing me he said, 'Ah! my friend, you find me wounded and weak, but still very happy; I am deriving rich consolation from this holy volume.' I gave him the message of Runjeet Singh, and told him that his assailants would be punished; upon which he said, that he had forgiven them, and he hoped Runjeet Singh would also pardon their offence. Oh! he was a good man! The sheets around him were white, but not so spotless as his gentle heart. The memory of Mr. Ferguson is sweet. He was a good man." See, in the simple story, the mighty influence of the example of one man, redeeming the nation to which he belonged from condemnation, as without religion, and leaving an impression upon a casual beholder, which the lapse of years had been unable to efface. Would, there were more Fergusons in India: then, should we not have to send the inquirer to the missionary station, to ascertain the fact of our really having a religion, a Bible, and a God.

Sir, amidst the dreadful occurrences which have recently taken place on the banks of the Sutlej, there has been one of most pleasing description. We are told, that an English soldier, who had been severely wounded, was left for dead on the field of battle. In this state he lay helpless and bleeding, with a fractured limb, unable to move. He was dying of thirst, but could obtain no water. In these circumstances, he was found by a man who was looking among the slain for some friend whom he had lost. This man no sooner found that there was life still remaining in our countryman, than he went to the river and brought water to refresh him. He then bound up his shattered limb, and then took him on his back, to carry him to the British camp, which was seven miles distant across a plain of deep and heavy sand. Having carried him for more than three miles, he had to lay down his burden in order that he might rest. While they were thus halting, a party of British soldiers came up, and seeing one of their countrymen thus circumstanced, offered to place him on a litter, and send him in. The wounded man, however, replied, 'No, I will again mount the back of my good Samaritan, who shall finish the kind work he has begun, and deliver me up to the commander-in-chief.' The stranger, therefore, again took up his load, and kindly deposited the soldier safely in the British camp. Now, sir, who was the man to whom our countryman was indebted for his deliverance and his life? He was a Sikh! He was one of those with whom we had been at war—thirty thousand of whose countrymen we had slain—some of them most brutally; for, not content with defeating the Sikhs, and driving thousands of them into the river, we fired grape and musket shot among them while they were struggling with the torrent; and we have the testimony of Lord Gough, the commander-in-chief, that, in the whole course of his experience, he never beheld so terrific a sight, as that presented during the time when volleys of destructive shot were being poured upon the helpless multitude, who were trying to reach the opposite bank of the river. Now, let me ask, who initiated our blessed Saviour in the midst of these bloody transactions? Was it not the humane Sikh, who carried our wounded countryman safely into camp?

Sir, I have recently attended two meetings at the India House, called for the purpose of returning thanks to the army of the Sutlej, and on these occasions I have felt it to be my duty to enter my protest against the profanity and blasphemy of coupling the name of the holy and ever blessed God with the victory we have obtained. I have also been recently at Reading, delivering lectures, and I have felt happy in the opportunity afforded me of identifying myself with those who petitioned Parliament to withhold their thanks from men who had been engaged in the horrid work of wholesale destruction. If I am not wearying you I will say a word upon the Oregon question. We have heard many rumors of war with the United States, and there are some, both in this country and on the other side of the water, who would not scruple to plunge the two nations into a sanguinary conflict. The majorities in both countries are, I believe, in favour of present, continued, and perpetual peace. Oh, it would indeed be a horrid spectacle to see nations like Great Britain and America at war with each other!—to see men who have sprung from the same stock, who claim the same ancestry, who speak the same language, who profess the same religion, and have been engaged in common efforts to enlighten and save the world, employed in cutting each others' throats! May God save us from beholding so fearful a scene as this! We who are assembled here to-night have it in our power to do something to avert this threatened calamity. I have been called upon by the Committee to move, that a friendly address from this meeting be sent to our brethren on the other side of the water, assuring them of our earnest desire to dwell at peace with them, and to draw still closer the bonds of friendship and good will that bind us together. I perceive that this measure has your entire approbation. I believe that your feelings are the feelings of the people of Great Britain generally. I have attended many meetings since the fears of a rupture with the United States first became prevalent, and I have been delighted to find, that at all these, the people of our country have been unanimously and enthusiastically in favor of peace.

But I must conclude. Let us from this day forth labor to disabuse the minds of those around us on the subject of war. Let us strip it of its false glory, and exhibit it in its native deformity and guilt, as a system of murder and blood. Let us arm ourselves from the words of God with arguments to meet those who, on the subject of war as well as slavery, condemn the thing in the abstract, but plead for it in the concrete. Let us examine and weigh the arguments of my friend Wright, and if we find he has taken a sound view of the subject, as in my conscience and understanding I believe he has, let us support him in his holy mission of preaching against the systems that are deluging the earth with blood, and peopling the regions of woe with the victims offered to this modern Moloch. Let us not mock God by praying for peace, while we are practically diffusing the doctrines of murder; but be individually such, as mankind will be universally, when nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. I now move that a memorial to the people of the United States be adopted, and forwarded to the friends of peace in America, for publication throughout the country. My friend, Mr. Reid, will lay that memorial before you, and my friend, William Smeal, who has been so long known for his unceasing exertions in the cause of human freedom and universal peace, will second its adoption. May God in his goodness grant that this humble effort may prove in some degree successful in behalf of the friends of peace in the two countries together, and may the time never come that there will be any other strife between us than the holy emulation of each other in love and good works—each laboring to excel the other in efforts to scatter the blessings of peace, and freedom, and pure Christianity, over the face of the whole earth!

Mr. Robert Reid then read and moved the adoption of a memorial addressed to the people of America, calling upon them to join with the people of this country in preserving peace.

The memorial was seconded by Mr. William Smeal, and unanimously adopted.

THE 'NON-SLAVEHOLDER.'

PHILADELPHIA, SEVENTH MONTH 1, 1846.

FIRST ANNUAL MEETING OF THE FREE PRODUCE ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDS OF NEW YORK YEARLY MEETING.—This meeting was held during the week of the late Yearly Meeting in New York. Near the close of the afternoon sitting on Fourth day, notice was given by one of the clerks in both the men's and women's meeting, that a meeting of Friends' Free Produce Association would be held in the meeting house that evening. The weather was very unfavourable, but a large number of Friends attended, and a lively interest was manifested in carrying out in their daily practice the principle of abstinence from slave products, so clearly set forth in the minute issued by the Yearly Meeting last year to its subordinate meetings. The Board of Managers made a report which was directed to be circulated in all the families of the Yearly Meeting, and published in the Non-Slaveholder. We accordingly give it place in our present number.

The Managers propose to open a general Free Produce Store in the city of New York, and a circular was prepared soliciting donations and loans to accomplish that object. We trust that Friends throughout the Yearly Meeting will be disposed to contribute according to their means, and thus open a channel through which a supply of free labour products may be readily obtained.

In the Yearly Meeting the subject of using the produce of slave labour obtained serious consideration; many Friends expressed their strong conviction that our testimony against slavery requires us to decline the trading in and using such produce, and the concern of the Yearly Meeting as set forth in its minute last year, and exhibited in the practice of many of its members, was conveyed in a clear and unequivocal manner in several of the epistles addressed to other Yearly Meetings.

We earnestly desire that this important subject may deeply engage the serious attention of the Society at large, and that all may bear in mind the solemn truth, that a mere acknowledgment of a second principle or a mere profession of bearing a testimony against slavery, will only add to our condemnation and injure the cause of righteousness, unless we endeavour to live in conformity with it.

THOMAS CLARKSON.—The lover of this distinguished pioneer in the cause of the abolition of slavery, which we offer to our readers in the present number, is in reply to some enquiries addressed to him by the Managers of the Free Produce Association of Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, and is published at their request. The letter indicates not only unabated interest in a cause to which sixty-one years of his life have been assiduously devoted, but also a degree of intellectual vigour which persons at the advanced age of eighty-seven years rarely exhibit; and which, considering his physical exhaustion, induced by a life of extreme toil of mind and body, is truly surprising.

"In a full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in his season," our friend stands ready to be gathered home whenever it shall please the good husbandman so to take him. This letter, as a communication preceding it suggests, may be his "last tribute of love to the poor and needy." Whether such shall be the case or not, this contribution from his treasury of love ought to be a high incentive to us to fill up our measure of duty in the same cause, and to pursue, as an important means for its accomplishment, a thorough and perpetual abstinence from the productions of the iniquitous system whose overthrow we seek.

"TAKING A BOAT."—Four seamen of the whaling ship Caravan, of Fall River, were recently tried in the United States District Court in New York, on two indictments; one for endeavouring to make a revolt, and the other for larceny. The men, it appears, took a whale boat belonging to the ship, while she lay at Rio, and escaped to another port, taking sundry necessary articles from the ship. They complained of not being well treated. The jury considered that the motive was escape, and not larceny, and they were acquitted on both indictments.

If seamen, with no motive but escape from oppression, may lawfully take a boat and smugly necessary articles to effect their purpose, may not a slave do the same?

OREGON TREATY.—The controversy which has long existed between the governments of Great Britain and the United States, relative to the Oregon boundary, and has also, at times, excited strong apprehensions of a resort to the ancient and barbarous "trial by battle," is happily settled. A treaty with Great Britain, on the basis of the 49th degree of latitude, concluded by President Polk, was ratified on the 18th of last month by the Senate of the United States, the vote being, it is said, 41 to 14.

THE LATE WILLIAM ALLEN.—The London Friend of last month contains a notice of "The Life of William Allen, with selections from his correspondence," the first volume of which is published, to be followed by a second and third. The editor of the Friend furnishes a few extracts from which we select the following:

"Before he was eighteen, the mind of William Allen was awoken to the iniquity of the slave-trade, and on the 22d of 2d month, 1789, we find this entry in his journal.

"When I reflect on the tyranny and oppression exercised by my countrymen towards the poor Africans; and the many thousands yearly murdered in the disgraceful slave-trade, I can but be a zealous opposer of slavery; and, indeed, I have been so for a long time, as far as lay in my power—yet one step further may be taken by me, which is wanting to complete my testimony in this respect, and which, if universally adopted, would inevitably put a stop to this enormous evil, and that is, DISMISSING THOSE COMMODITIES PRODUCED BY THE LABOUR OF SLAVES. And as sugar is, undoubtedly, one of the chief, I resolve, through divine assistance, to persevere in the disuse of it until the slave-trade shall be abolished."

William Allen steadfastly adhered to this resolution for upwards of forty-three years, until the bill passed for the abolition of slavery in the British possessions, when abstinence from the use of West India sugar was no longer needful.

CRUELTY TO SLAVES.—We revert to this topic for the purpose of adding some views to those we expressed in our fifth number. We objected to the frequent exhibition of cases of outrage practised upon slaves on the ground that such frequency of representation would be probably adverse to the object proposed by it. The mental impression which a statement of cruelty at first makes is unquestionably great in favour of humanity; but unless it conduces the mind to some conclusion in advance of the position it previously occupied, or confirms it in the prosecution of some present good undertaking, it tends, as do stimulants, unfollowed by the desired effect on the physical system, to exhaust, rather than strengthen the moral energy. Man was designed to act the part of a rational being—to perceive truth and pursue it. His sensibilities were given him in subordination to that end, but not that he should be the creature of mere impulse. The final effect of bringing these sensibilities into frequent excitement, without a result issuing in some mental determination, is to annihilate them. Nature does not allow of the useless exercise of any emotion which she gives to man. This is a thousand ways shown in surrounding life. The difference between the feelings of one who, for the first time, witnesses a case of surgery, and the practised master of that science, is one of the numerous evidences of this fact. If then the presentation of a case of cruelty does not stimulate the heart to some action, the apprehension may be well entertained that its converse effect, that of hardening its feelings, will necessarily ensue.

In the degree that we perceive slavery to be wrong, do we feel a connection with it to be wrong also; and the more prone we are to indulge in that connection, the more desirous are we of giving to slavery as lenient an aspect as possible. This desire leads us to consider cases of cruelty to slaves as sporadic, rather than as an essential part of the institution of slavery, and even to regard them as exaggerations and fabrications of the humane. Here is an additional reason for concluding that we more permanently subserve the cause of humanity when we prove that cruelty indispensably belongs to the system of holding men as slaves, than when we show its existence in particular cases, and thence infer that it may exist, under like influences, in numerous other cases. There is also economy of time in the process. The mathematician who perceives in the figure before him the relation which the several lines of that figure bear to each other, needs no measurement of the lines themselves to satisfy his own mind, or prove to that of any scientific person, that the proposition he is demonstrating is a true one. He may find it useful, however, to make those measurements for the purpose of satisfying others of the truth of his deductions, who are strangers to the science. Thus it is of slavery: cases of practised cruelty are not requisite to the proof that slavery, as an institution, is of necessity cruel.

The highest evidence which needs be adduced that slavery is thus cruel, is the fact that the condition of the slave is wholly an unnatural one, and must be sustained by force. Whatever cruelty is necessary to the exertion of this force is inseparable from the institution. The master knows that the slave is deprived of his rights as a human being, and ought to recover them; and the slave, however stultified he may be in his moral conceptions, has, at least, a glimmering perception of these facts also. To restrain in the slave the outbreaking of this perception, the terror of punishment for any disobedience to the master's will must be constantly presented to his mind. There is cruelty in the infliction of this apprehension, whether the whip be upraised or not,—whether the instrument of torture be applied or merely threatened. But as the creation of this terror is an indispensable part of the slave system, and as the use of the whip and other appliances of torture involves neither master nor driver in any legal accountability for violated humanity, who can doubt the frequent, and capricious, and very copious exertion of those corrective and preventive agencies? To these inflictions in fact or expectancy is often added the reality or dread of distant separation, the husband from his wife, the wife from her husband, the parents from their children. In the threatening of this punishment there is a cruelty approaching that of its consummation.

If we want other demonstration than is afforded by the above suggestions that slavery is cruel in its inflictions, we have it in the abundant testimony of slaveholders themselves. None is of higher authority than Thomas Jefferson, whose language is quoted by our correspondent Logan, at page 36. His views of slavery may be considered as deduced alike from the facts surrounding him and the philosophy of the case.

The time was, when in many of our schools the rod was wielded by the teacher with an almost irresponsible authority. Who that remembers that by-gone epoch, and was especially the pupil in a school where the dynasty of the rod prevailed, does not recollect the tyranny and crushing oppression of it? What boy in such a school does not look back with feelings of horror to the scenes of passion and violence on the part of the teacher enacted against himself or some poor school-mate, dull of memory or apprehension, innocent of intended wrong, or whose wrong, if purposely committed, was exaggerated by the distempered vision of the flagellator? In these cases there was on the part of the scholar an equality, or, probably, a superiority of social condition, which imposed a restraining influence on the pedagogue's mind and arm: but what, under such circumstances, would have been the treatment of a poor, defenceless, friendless slave? The same training—successive inflictions of punishment, each infliction increasing the appetite for administering it—which made the teacher a tyrant, makes the slaveholder one, but in a degree as much greater, as his power is greater, and as his interest is greater in sustaining that power.

It is not merely for the maintenance of the authority of the master over the slave that cruelty is exerted against the latter, but it exists for other purposes. On the slave is often wreaked the vengeance due to others, if due to any. A slave whose person was numerously marked by deeply indented scars, several of whose bones had been broken, and whose treatment had been obviously one of great cruelty, once told us that he was often the butt of his "master's" anger when some one offended "master" in the street. Characteristic of this passion for punishing the slave, though probably said in satire of slavery, was the declaration of John Randolph when some speech or proceedings in Congress offended him, "Now I will go home and flog Juba!"

The recital of some of the evils of Slavery has to be avoided in mixed companies on account of their intrinsic grossness. They ought not to be the less known. Such is what follows.

We were once told by a friend from the South, well informed on the subject, that a frequent source of domestic infelicity in southern families arose out of the connection which masters chose to establish between themselves and favorite slaves, and which, besides violating the conjugal relation, brought the slaves and their mistresses into constant collision. We give below an incident illustrative of this fact, and resulting in the legal infliction of death upon a female slave for raising her hand against her mistress! Much more aggrieved was this mistress, by the act which the law did not hold to be criminal, than by that for which it imposed the sentence of death; and infinitely more was the aggression of her own husband for whose infidelity the law had no terrors, and concerning which she had to be silent, than was any wrong done to her by the wretched slave.

While the article will itself show that cruelty to slaves is not an accidental but a legal appurtepart of the slave system, it will show also that "the tender mercies of the wicked" are ever "cruel."

From the Essex Transcript.

The Slave Pauline.—Many of our readers have probably seen a paragraph stating that a young girl was recently hanged at New Orleans, for the crime of striking and abusing her mistress. The religious Press of the North has not, so far as we are aware, made any comments upon this execution. It is too busy in pulling the mote out of the eye of the heathen, to notice the beam in our Christianity at home. Yet this case, viewed in all its aspects, is an atrocity, which has, God be thanked, no parallel in heathen lands. It is a hideous offshoot of American Republicanism and American Christianity.

It seems that Pauline, a young and beautiful girl—arrested the admiration of her master, and being, to use the words of the law, his "chattel personal to all intents and purposes whatsoever," became the victim of his lust. So wretched is the condition of the slave woman, that even the brutal and heartless regard of her master is looked upon as the highest exaltation of which her lot is susceptible. The slave girl, in this instance, evidently so regarded it; and, as a natural consequence, in her new condition triumphed over and insulted her mistress—in other words, repaid in some degree the scorn and abuse with which her mistress had made her painfully familiar.

The laws of the Christian State of Louisiana inflict the punishment of death, upon the slave who lifts his or her hand against a white person. Pauline was accused of beating her mistress, tried and found guilty, and condemned to die. But it was discovered on the trial that she was in a condition to become a mother; and her execution was delayed until the birth of her child. She was returned to her prison cell. There for many weary months, uncheered by the voice of kindness, alone, hopeless, desolate, she waited for the advent of the new and quickening life within her, which was to be the signal of her own miserable death. And the bells there called mass and prayer-meeting, and Methodists sang, and Baptists immersed, and Presbyterians sprinkled,—and young mothers smiled through tears upon their newborn children; and maidens and matrons of that great city sat in their cool verandas and talked of love and household joys, and domestic happiness,—while all that dreary time, the poor slave-girl lay on the scanty straw of her dungeon, waiting with what agony the dear and pitying God of the white and black only knows, for the birth of the child of her adulterous violator. Horrible!—Was ever what George Sand justly termed "the great martyrdom of maternity"—that fearful trial which love alone converts into joy unspeakable—endured under such conditions! What was her substitute for the kind voices and gentle soothing of affection! The harsh grating of her prison-lock—the mocking and taunts of unfeeling and brutal keepers! What with the poor Pauline took the place of the hopes and joyful anticipations which support and solace the white mother, and make her couch of torture happy with sweet dreams?—the prospect of seeing the child of her sorrow, of feeling its lips upon her bosom, of hearing its feeble cry—alone, unvisited of its father; and then in a few days, just when the mother's affections are strongest, and the first smile of her infant compensates for the pangs of the past,—the scaffold and the hangman! Think of that last terrible scene—the tearing of the infant from her arms, the death-march to the gallows, the rope around her delicate neck, and her long and dreadful struggles (for attenuated and worn by physical sufferings and mental sorrow, her slight frame had not sufficient weight left to produce the dislocation of her neck, on the falling of the drop,) swinging there alive for nearly half an hour,—a spectacle for fiends, in the shape of humanity. Mothers of New England! such are the fruits of slavery. Oh, in the name of the blessed God, teach your children to hate it and to pity its victims.

Petty politicians and empty-headed Congress debaters are vastly concerned lest "the honor of the country" should be compromised in the matter of the Oregon boundary. Fools!—one such horrible atrocity as this murder of Pauline, "compromises" us too deeply to warrant any further display of their patriotism. It would "compromise" Paradise itself. An intelligent and philanthropic European gentleman who was in New Orleans at the time of the execution, in a letter to a friend in this vicinity, after detailing the circumstances of the revolting affair, exclaims, "God of goodness! God of justice! there must be a Future State to redress the wrongs of this. I am almost tempted to say, there must be a future state, or no God!"

BRITISH FREE LABOR COTTON MANUFACTURES.—Specimens have been received in this country of calicoes and muslins manufactured at Manchester, England, from cotton produced by free labour. They excel in fineness of texture, and equal in beauty of finish, any free goods yet manufactured in this country. This is the first public effort in England to make a distinction between Free and Slave grown cotton. We trust it is the opening of a new era, in the history of which will be written the downfall of slavery.

POETRY.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

LITTLE LUCY'S DREAM.

For Evil is wrought by want of thought,
As well as want of heart. THOMAS HUNT.

I.

Little Lucy all the day
Smiling at her work or play,
Singing to herself—the while Sitting on the foot-worn stile,
Stooping to caress a flower
Bent beneath the summer shower,
Playing with one baby brother,
Wreathing in her arms another,
Sewing by her mother's side
All her labor to divide,
Feeding puss, and petting Tray—
Thus glides swiftly every day.

II.

Little Lucy knew no sorrow;
Bright to her was every morrow;
Not a shadow lingered near
Her blue eyes so deep and clear;
Not a sigh her bosom stirred;
Left her lips no mournful word;
Pain and suffering knew she not;
Wealth nor want was in their cot;
But kind nature beauty lent,
And with sunshine beamed content.

III.

Little Lucy sat last night
Pensive in the moon's pale light,
With her eyes bent on her mother,
Hands clasped tightly in each other,
Listening with lips apart
Stories of a broken heart
That groped through its darkened way,
Hoping for no brighter day,
Looking back with shudder on Chains and whips above it swung—
Looking forward parched with fear
That would yield no soothing tear.

IV.

Little Lucy said no word,
But her heart was strangely stirred;
Silently she crept to bed;
Heavily laid down her head,
And to Him, who every where
Is and loves, poured out her prayer,
Until on her soul there fell
Quiet with its holy spell,
And sweet sleep closed that young eye
That with tear-drops scarce was dry—
Ah, but in the sleeper's thought
How day's work will o'er be wrought!

V.

Little Lucy dreamed a dream,
That almost a truth did seem:
Far away 'mid bonny showers
Of bright birds and golden flowers,
On the greenward, she reclined,
Fanned by summer's fragrant wind;
O'er her bent a leafy bower;
Forest trees around her tower;
Murmuring waters by her stole;
Summer sunshine bathed the whole;
But beyond this leafy screen
Parched and heated was the scene.

VI.

Little Lucy cast her eye
O'er the plain enquiringly;
Where the sun had baked the soil,
Men and women bent to toil;
Groups of children, hoe in hand,
Wander slowly o'er the sand;
And no shout of childish glee
Wakens Lucy's sympathy;
But a gloom is in each eye
Which she can too well descry.
Waiting not to think again
Tripped she o'er the sun-burnt plain.

VII.

Lucy soon amid the band
Gave to one her little hand,
On another dark-browed brow
Pityingly she placed it now,
And with laughter sweet and low
Prayed them in the woods to go.
Does your mother bid you stay
Toiling here the live-long day?
Ah, how weary are your feet,
And how cool the shade and sweet!
Come, I know that you may go!
But the children answered—no!

VIII.

Little Lucy scarce knew why
Tears were flowing from her eye—
Tell me why you may not stop?
Massa must get in his crop;
Day by day through heat and cold
Toil we all for massa's gold;
Bales of cotton for his store
Bring us not one comfort more;
While he rolls in silk and lawns
We scarce shield our dusky forms;
All our labor robes the free,
And we toil—in slavery.

IX.

Little Lucy's eyes were down,
Resting on her cotton gown.
Said the children, you can play
While we're toiling all the day;

That you may be neatly dressed
Oh how deeply we're oppressed,—
Fearing but the driver's crack,
Stinging on the toil-worn back,
All the good within grown dim,
Even our prayers denied to Him,
Young in years yet worn and old—
Oh send massa no more gold.

X.
Little Lucy bent her head;
Bitter were the tears she shed;
The full burden of their woe
O'er her spirit seemed to flow,
So unconscious had she been
Her mite added to the sin;
And in that lone solemn time
With her heart rent by the crime—Sleeping—waking—praying—weeping—
Pitying—loving—scarcely sleeping—
She craved faith and will and light—
To uphold the bondman's right.

[The revolution of nearly seventy nine years may have made "dim" the eye, and "his natural force abated" of the much respected correspondent whose poetry we give below; but it has in no respect impaired his mental vision or moral energy. His perceptions of the truth are as clear and strong as ever, and his heart as warm in their advocacy. All hail to a good green old age!—and welcome the reminiscence of an instructive fable which belongs to the literature of a by-gone day!—Evertons.]

For the Non-Slaveholder.

THE CLOAK.

When very young, I used to look
In Dilworth's ancient spelling book;
And there I got, 'tis my belief,
My first idea of a thief—
Where two vile sharpers chanced to stop
Within an honest butcher's shop;
One stole a joint from off the hook,
And hid it 'neath his comrade's cloak—
The one that stole it had not got,
And he who had it stole it not.
The butcher did not understand
This cunning, dexterous slight of hand;
But thought, although he did not see't,
Between the two they had the meat.

Thieves now pursue a bolder plan,
One steals a free and living man;
Another buys him, cloaked by laws
Which sanction the unrighteous cause;
And then begins the sanguine battle—
To tame him to a passive chattel.
The buyer wields the sounding lash,
Deep cutting in the living flesh;
His streaming blood improves the soil,
And profit adds to unpaid toil.

Next we step in, and act a bolder
Part in the wrong, as prime upholders.
We buy, we wear, we eat the food
Tinged with the suffering negro's blood.
We clear our hands of woes untold
Within the slave-ship's dismal hold;
Lament the thousands dying there
By suffocation, in despair;
And all the deep unending woes
Inflicted till life's hopeless close.
The torturing whip we never crack
Upon the raw and naked back;
Or through the mangled flesh and fat
Tail foremost drag the sharp nailed cat;
When fainting with excess of pain,
Ne'er scourge him to his toil again;
With heated iron, in desperate hand,
The youthful female cheek ne'er brand.
We oft have plead the negro's cause
And sharply spoke 'gainst sanguine laws.

This is our cloak, 'tis broad and long,
Yet fails to hide the glaring wrong;
Being used so much, 'tis worn so thin,
Through its bare threads peeps out the sin.
We buy and sell, we eat and wear
The blood-stained produce of despair.
We own or hold no slaves, 'tis true,
But motive give to those who do.
If we would all refuse to buy,
Then slavery peacefully would die;
This simple, quiet, moral plan,
Would change the chattel to a man;
From his galled neck would fall the yoke,
And from our shoulders drop the cloak,
Which, from the old to present time,
Was worn, is worn to cover crime.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER

Is published on the first of each month, at one dollar per annum for one copy, or five dollars per annum for six copies in one order, payable in advance. Abraham L. Pennock, Samuel Rhoads, and George W. Taylor, are the Editors and Publishers; either of whom will receive subscriptions, payments, and communications. Letters and papers addressed to them, or endorsed Non-Slaveholder, directed to box 777, Philadelphia Post Office, will duly reach them.

By decision of the Post-Master General, the Non-Slaveholder is subject to new paper postage only.

FREE LARGE COTTON GOODS.—Bleached and brown 4-4 and 5-4 stitching and sheeting, muslins, assorted colored cambrics, reftines, and ginghams, neat style, best colors, cotton twilled poplinos, silks, open check, cotton flannel and plaid table cloth, stuff, assorted widths, manufactured from free cotton, produced by the Free Produce Association of Friends, of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. We have also in store India yellow and blue muslins, seersuckers, plaid and striped, white grass cloth, blue grass cloth, bedticks or cravats, and small muslin. For sale by THOMAS S. FIELD & CO. Commission Merchants, 5th mo. 30th, 1846. No. 25 N. Front st. up stairs.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

"Whoso gives the motive, makes his brother's sin his own."

VOL. I.]

PHILADELPHIA, EIGHTH MONTH, 1846.

[NO. 8.]

COMMUNICATIONS.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

RESIST NOT EVIL.

There are three passages of scripture which afford an interesting and instructive comment on each other. The first passage contains the words of our Lord spoken in his sermon on the mount: "But I say unto you that ye resist not evil." The second passage is written by James, chap. 4: 7, "Resist the devil, and he will flee from you." To the young student of the scriptures here is an apparent contradiction; and it becomes a query in his mind what kind of resistance may be proper when resistance is forbidden. The third passage answers this query: Romans 12: 21 "Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good." What! says the young student, shall I do good to the devil? Yes, certainly. The devil cannot contend with the weapons of this warfare; he is at once vanquished and flees from this kind of resistance; but he is mighty and skillful when we use against him his own weapons—he loves the combat, and though he may retreat and give us some hopes of success, it is only an ambuscade—the prelude to his victory.

P. H.

Milan, (O.) 3d mo. 31, 1846.

To the Editors of the Non-Slaveholder.

—, N. C., 3d mo. 29th, 1846.

As regards the situation of matters pertaining to Slavery, I can offer nothing flattering. Many slaveholders are not ignorant of the evils of the system, both in a political and moral point of view. Yet they think it cannot be got rid of, and therefore calmly partake of its fruits: hushing their consciences with the belief that they can do no better. These are the avowed sentiments of those who admit that it is wrong, but I presume the secret motive of all, is self interest. The Methodists in this section are becoming somewhat awakened on the subject. Two prominent members have left the church on account of their permitting slaveholding, and at a certain meeting house some ten miles from here, they have forbidden a slaveholder to preach. I am told however, that they cannot hinder it unless the whole Conference are in favour of the measure. And who can tell the horrors of the system? There is a woman living here who was once a slave. She has a great many brothers and sisters, many of whom are yet in bondage. Her husband was also a slave, but succeeded in buying himself, and afterwards her. Two weeks ago her youngest brother, W—, was here to see her for the last time. Some of the heirs of the estate to which he belongs live in Tennessee, and came on after him and eleven others, and this morning, when I was at meeting, I saw them pass along the road—truly a desolate looking company. W— has a free wife and two children, of whom he has taken a final leave I suppose to day. Moreover it is known to have been the desire of their old mistress, that W— should take care of his mother (who is still living) to the end of her days. But he is torn from her forever. Truly the condition of the slave is worse than the brute. He can look to no human tribunal for relief. The court which is held beyond the valley of the shadow of death, is the only one in which he need hope for justice. If he goes to the law for help in his despairing situation here he finds every door closed. Every statute is against him. It is true the law of this state now declares the killing of a negro to be murder, but it makes such provisions that, if a man whip his slave to death, he has only to swear that he died under moderate correction, or that he refused to submit to authority, and he is justified; and again the murderer walks the earth unharmed! Other acts of atrocity, which if committed against those to whom God has given "a form of fairer, whiter clay," would be visited by the death of the offender, or other heavy expiation, may be perpetrated with impunity on the negro, who can neither resist nor testify. "Oh," say I, in the language of Alvan Stewart, "sum of all human villainies, let the curse of God rest upon it, let every wind be charged with its destruction, every rising sun be its destroyer, the rolling seasons its executioner."

Moreover, if I should cause such a piece as I have here written, to be read and published to the slaves, or circulate it amongst them, the laws of my state would condemn me to be whipped on the bare back, and for a second offence death would be the penalty. Nay, if I were caught teaching a slave the alphabet, I should be subject to a heavy fine. It is thus they civilize them, thus they christianize them, by keeping them in the depths of ignorance lest they learn their rights.

Oh Liberty! fly from America—thou hast no foothold here. Fly to a land where thy name may be pronounced by lips less hypocritical, and where the shouts of freedom may not be drowned by the clinkings of the captive's chains. I fear, my friends, you will think me excited and enthusiastic, but it really seems to me as great an inconsistency, to talk about the United States being "a free country," or, "a land of liberty," as it would be to write "Love your enemies" including characters on every cannon, musket, pistol, sword, and carbine ever used in war!

To the Editors of the Non Slaveholder.

Under the name of Friends are to be found those who differ widely one from the other upon the subject of slavery, the nature of it, and the evils produced by it; and also essentially differ in view on the subject of its abolishment; as to the proper means to be pursued, and the time when it ought to be effected as a matter of justice and right.

Some view slavery to be the robbing of the enslaved by fraud and force of all the various and high gifts that a beneficent Creator hath bestowed upon man, life excepted, thus embracing a commission of crime—that in the aggregate, only stands second to the taking of life itself, and that the nature of the crime is the same in all times and places, only differing in degree and suffering according to circumstances; that the enslaved has at all times and under all circumstances the same valid claim to his liberty derived from the highest authority, which necessarily imposes a valid obligation on him who has invaded this heaven-born right to cease his aggression without delay, and that consequently the continuance of slavery is the continued practising upon the same principle upon which slaveholding was instituted, and evidently is a crime of the same nature.

Others again view slavery to be a less evil, and that its removal should be approached with caution, if at all—that the slave's liberation ought to be a subordinate and secondary concern, determined by expediency—that is, subordinate to the national compact; subordinate to all the relations and institutions embraced in this compact; subordinate to the peace and unity of the religious associations; subordinate to the interests of the master, who has paid his money for the slave; subordinate to the mercantile and manufacturing interests; subordinate to the privilege of trafficking in, and consuming slave labour products, lastly, subordinate to the circumstance of the slave's degradation and ignorance; and this last being deemed of itself an all-sufficient obstacle to the slave's being restored to his liberty, under existing circumstances, and the removal of this disability viewed as a work of a more delicate nature, than the abolishment of slavery itself. So that all the interests that come in for a prominent claim against abolition now, come in with the addition of the master's safety, with equal force, against the removal of the existing barrier to a preparation for liberty. He who is possessed of these latter views cannot be expected to be found labouring, except to keep others quiet who may feel constrained to "open the mouth for the dumb."

Now, how shall we account for this great disparity of views? Surely it comes not without a cause—and what is this cause? Is it the influence of self-interest, is it prejudice, is it pride, is it ignorance, is it tradition, is it custom, or is it all these combined?

What two persons, under our name, of common understanding, could they be entirely freed from these disabilities to forming an impartial judgment in the case, would not be prepared to unite in desire and practical labour to "undo the heavy burden, and let the oppressed go free?"

I am aware that there are many who are candid and well meaning, that are aiming to live an upright life—who are uninformed upon the subject of slavery and any mode of labour that should be pursued for its extinction—and view slavery to be an evil beyond the reach of their individual influence—have not clearly seen the intimate relation sustained between the master and the consumer of slave labour products in perpetuating the system of slavery—have not seen that the planter makes use of the products of his slave's labour under no other but the same ignominious title by which he holds possession of the person he styles his slave—have not been made acquainted how easily people in this part of the country may withdraw their share of that kind of aid upon which the system of slavery is absolutely dependant for its existence—have not seen that what they do by the hand of another they do themselves.

D. I.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

ARE SLAVES UNFIT FOR FREEDOM?

The assertion is so often repeated, that slaves are unfit for freedom, that the sentiment has, like many other hacknied sayings which are incapable of being proved, received from many a tacit admission into their catalogue of postulates, as though no proof were necessary. So in reference to the danger of immediate emancipation, the assumption is made, by those opposed to the freedom of the blacks, that, as a matter of course, as soon as they shall gain their liberty, those poor people will set about doing all the injury they can to their white neighbours.

It is certainly very unreasonable, to say the least, that such uncharitable sentiments should be taken up, upon mere conjectural grounds, even against evidence, to the great injury and injustice of this deeply injured portion of mankind. The assertions of those dangers may safely be challenged to bring forward their proofs to sustain such sweeping charges, impugning the character, both moral and religious, of the whole slave population, numbering among them a large body of professors of Christianity, according to the testimony of Southerners. The fact is, there is no foundation for these declarations, but the reverse is true as well as reasonable. It is no uncommon thing for those who are implicated in sustaining any great social or national evil, to magnify the difficulties standing in the way of getting rid of it.

"The evil of yesterday's growth, may be extirpated to-day, and the vigour of society may heal the wound; but that which is the growth of ages, may require ages to remove. The Parliament of Great Britain, with all its philanthropic zeal, guided by the wisdom and eloquence of such statesmen as Chatham, Fox, Burke, Pitt, Canning and Brougham, has never yet seriously agitated this question, in regard to the West India possessions." So wrote a learned professor of one of our Southern Colleges in 1832. It is unnecessary to refer our readers to what has taken place in the British West India possessions within the fraction of an "age" since this vaunted sentiment and taunt of the "Parliament of Great Britain with all its philanthropic zeal," &c., were promulgated. Suffice it to say, that at this moment, not only are all the inhabitants of the British West Indies free, but the shackles of slavery have fallen from every individual throughout the extended dominions of Great Britain. And what have we heard of the unfitness of those formerly in bondage for the enjoyment of freedom; or, what evil deeds have we to accuse them of, as resulting from their emancipation? None of those gloomy anticipations of Professor Dew and others like-minded, have been realized. But notwithstanding the extreme ignorance and degradation of the great body of West India slaves, they have maintained a peaceable demeanor, and are rapidly increasing in respectability, in knowledge, and in whatever ennobles and elevates our species. Just so, we may rationally infer, would be the consequences flowing from our rendering similar justice to the slaves of the United States. It is difficult to conceive that they could have any motive for pursuing a contrary course.

W—n.

SELECTIONS.

THE EPISTLE FROM THE YEARLY MEETING, Held in London, by adjournments, from the 20th of Fifth Month, to the 30th of the same, inclusive, 1846; to the Quarterly and Monthly Meetings of Friends in Great Britain, Ireland, and elsewhere.

DEAR FRIENDS.—Through the goodness of the Lord, we have again been permitted to come together. He has been pleased to grant us renewed evidence of his fatherly care, whereby our hearts have been made contrite before Him. Under the sense of this, his unmerited kindness, we offer you the salutation of our love, desiring that we may all be united in the faith, the hope, and the fellowship of the Gospel.

The unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace is precious. This unity is in Christ: he is the ever-living head. He knoweth all the members of his body, under whatever denomination they may be found amongst men; and as their whole trust is in Him, he careth for them, preserveth them, and leadeth them safely along. It is in the knowledge of Him as the one Lord ruling in the soul, that the true brotherhood of his family is experienced.

Beloved Friends, it is our concern at the present time, that the unity which is in Christ may more and more prevail throughout our religious Society, in whatever part of the earth its members are found, whether in smaller or larger companies. It is a precious truth to us in our fallen condition, "that God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them." Christ, who knew no sin, who was a propitiatory offering for our sins and for the sins of all mankind, who enlighteneth every man that cometh into the world, and who is ever present with his people, as their teacher to instruct them, their counsellor to direct them, their shepherd to feed them, their bishop to oversee them, and their prophet to open divine mysteries to them,* was the foundation of our forefathers; and this foundation is ours. It was to this experimental knowledge of Christ that our early predecessors were engaged to gather all men, that they might really know their bodies to be prepared, sanctified, and made fit temples for him to dwell in. By one Spirit they were baptized into one body; and, rooted and grounded in love, they were, through the help of their Lord, united one to another in upholding an open and decided testimony to the Gospel in its primitive purity.

But we have, we trust we may say, a godly jealousy, that, although continuing to profess our ancient doctrine, we are not practically influenced by it as we ought to be. True faith in Christ leads into lowliness and into a continual watchfulness unto prayer. And we believe, that in this condition, we shall feel the accordance of those testimonies which distinguish us as a people, with the mind of Christ, and with the declarations of his evangelists and apostles. As each member of the church is thus brought under the divine power, he will be engaged to serve the Lord and his people, according to the measure of grace and faith bestowed upon him. They who have but one talent will not hide it in the earth, neither will they meddle with things too high for them; and they who have been entrusted with larger gifts, will use them, not as lords over God's heritage, but as the servants of Christ, labouring abundantly for the edification of the body in love.

Dear Friends, may we be kept in the fear of the Lord, out of the spirit of contention and of judging; but let every one of us judge this, that we put not a stumbling block or an occasion to fall in a brother's way. And whilst it is at all times the duty of the members of the church, faithfully to maintain the truth, and whilst some of them may rightly feel themselves called upon openly to oppose error, we believe that there is hardly anything more inimical to the growth of vital religion, than indulgence in the spirit of religious controversy. Satan triumphs when he can make the name of Jesus a word of strife and debate among the professed followers of their Lord. If he, our soul's enemy, can but introduce men into his spirit, he cares little how true may be their words. Let us, therefore, each of us mind our own calling by keeping our eye single to the Lord; and then shall we know that "the fruit of the Spirit" will, in the sight of others, be "in all goodness, righteousness and truth," and to ourselves, joy and peace.

* Journal of Geo. Fox, 17th Ed. Vol. I. p. 115.

If the minds of all our dear friends were sufficiently alive to the duty which we owe to God, we should not continue to hear, as we do, of exceptions to the attendance of our meetings appointed to be held in the course of the week, for the worship of God. We desire at this time, to encourage those more especially who are much exposed to the spirit of the world, to be uniform in their endeavours to leave its many cares, and not only occasionally, but regularly to attend these meetings. We believe that those, who, under a weight of outward engagements, have pressed through them to meet with their friends, have often been rewarded for so doing by a renewal of spiritual strength. At the same time we affectionately desire that there may be a care to avoid, in coming to meeting, that hurry by which the mind is in danger of being disqualified for the performance of true worship, and for partaking of that meat which endureth unto everlasting life, which is often mercifully granted, on such occasions, to the waiting soul. We would in much love apply this watchword also to the attendance of our Quarterly and Monthly Meetings for discipline. They are a provision which we believe has been remarkably blessed in our religious Society; but the benefit may be greatly lessened when the mind is not detached from worldly cares, and when the faculties are not offered to the service of the Lord, in the fulfilment of the duties which these meetings bring with them.

An earthly mind shows itself in various forms. At this day it is especially obvious in many of the lawful pursuits of trade and commerce, but it is by no means excluded from those of agriculture. The enemy of man's peace knows how to suit his baits to the various circumstances of human life. Markets and fairs may be lawfully frequented for the purchase and sale of produce, but they have their peculiar snares: and he who is seeking to live as a consistent Christian will in attending them, endeavour, as far as practicable, to avoid all those places of resort, and that association, which endanger the maintenance of either pureness, temperance, or integrity. And with regard to other modes of acquiring a livelihood, we feel concerned, amid the multiplied variety of these pursuits in the present day, to caution our dear Friends, how they enter into engagements which may subject them, by close and frequent intercourse, to the influence and example of individuals or bodies of men, whose minds are not under the regulating influence of the truth: lest thereby a worldly standard should be substituted for that true tenderness of conscience, which would not only preserve from injustice in dealing, but would lead us in all things, to do unto others as we would that they should do unto us.

Nor is the leavening influence to which we have alluded, confined to occupations which are entered upon with a view to gain or personal advantage. It is not less insinuating or injurious in its effects on those who engage in affairs of a public, and especially of a political nature. We would affectionately recommend our dear friends to beware of entering into the spirit of party politics, and when they may think it right to exercise any political franchise which they may possess, to be on their guard that it be done in a temper and manner befitting the consistent Christian.

We have been at this time introduced into much concern with reference to the well-known testimony of our Religious Society against the attendance of places of diversion. Earnest have been our desires, that Friends everywhere, and particularly those in younger life, may seriously reflect on the injury, and in many instances, the moral ruin which pursuits of this description bring with them. And it is our conviction, that in proportion as the mind is renewed by Divine grace, all these vain amusements will be felt to be inconsistent with the restraints of the Gospel, and incompatible with that quietness and peace of mind which are the portion of the watchful Christian. Our attention has also been turned to the increased exposure of our young Friends to the temptations of music; which we believe to be, both in its acquisition and in its practice, unfavourable to the health of the soul. Serious is the waste of time to those who give themselves up to it: and what account can they render of those precious hours, which might otherwise have been devoted to the glory of God and the good of their neighbour. It does not, however, merely involve the absorption of time; it not unfrequently leads into unprofitable, and even pernicious association, and, in some instances, to a general indulgence in the vain amusements of the world.

We have, in usual course, received accounts of the sufferings of our members in Great Britain and Ireland in support of our testimony against all ecclesiastical claims, and the freedom of Gospel ministry. The amount thus reported, including the costs and charges of distrait, is about nine thousand three hundred pounds.

Epistles have been received and read in this Meeting from our dear friends in Ireland, and from those of the several Yearly Meetings of Friends in North America, and we afresh feel the comfort and the value of this epistolary intercourse.

We continue to deplore the wide-spread evils of the Slave-trade and of Slavery. They have for many years deeply interested the feelings of our religious Society; and we hear, with sorrow of heart, that they still prevail to a most affecting extent. We, therefore, again press it upon our beloved friends everywhere, to yield their minds to sympathy with the enslaved, and to a deep concern for the enormities of the traffic in the persons of men, whether on the coast of Africa or elsewhere.

Since we last met, much solicitude has been felt with reference to the threatened hostilities between this country and the United States of America. We cherish the fervent hope that so dreadful a calamity will, through the over-ruling mercy of the Almighty, be averted. Our testimony against all wars and fightings is truly a christian testimony. We retrace in the belief, that a correct appreciation of the peaceable principles of the Gospel of Christ is spreading in our own and in other lands. We hail, as a symptom of this enlightened view, many instances of later years, in which disputes between nations have been settled by arbitration, and not by a recourse to the anti-christian practice of war. May a sense of the wisdom and true policy of arbitration increase, until it shall become the ultimate rule for the determination of such differences. And O! that all nations that take upon them the name of Christ, may be brought, by the light of his Spirit, to see that in having recourse to arms to settle disputes, and in gratifying the lust of conquest and power, they give occasion for his holy name to be blasphemed by Mahometans and Pagans.

And now, dear Brethren and Sisters, everywhere, we desire with reverence of soul, and with thankfulness to our Heavenly Father, to acknowledge that he has heard our prayer, and not turned away his mercy from us. His love has been shed abroad amongst us from one time to another, in which love we have enjoyed some sense of the blessed fellowship of the Spirit. May every one of us henceforward live unto Christ, and walk in love, as he also hath loved us, and hath given himself for us, an offering, and a sacrifice to God for a sweet smelling savour.

Signed, in and on behalf of the Meeting, by

GEORGE STACY,
Clerk of the Meeting this year.

ANTI-SLAVERY.

An anonymous and unknown correspondent severely reproves us for publishing an account of the proceedings of the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society, and threatens to withdraw his name as a subscriber, if such things are to appear in future. We are sorry to have been the cause of such feelings to any one, but cannot help thinking that our correspondent will feel differently, when he has thought more carefully upon the subject. Under the head of general intelligence we notice such items of news, as we suppose may interest our readers. If a remarkable murder is committed, if there should be among us an insurrection, or an attempt to assassinate Gov. Briggs, we should give notice of it, and our subscriber probably would find no fault with us. Why, then, should the Anti-Slavery Society be singled out, as a subject about which no intelligence should be given? Are their proceedings so much worse than the crime of Albert J. Turrell, that they cannot even be named in a brief abstract without wounding the moral sensibilities of religious men? If the Anti-Slavery movement is a trifling matter, such a notice as we have given can do no harm. If it be one of the great movements of the times, agitating this country from one extreme to the other, as no other subject does, and every year becoming more serious, we cannot wink it out of sight. Our silence will only cause its voice to be heard more loudly. It must engage the attention of the sober, thinking men of the community. It is well that they should watch its progress; that they should see the extravagant excesses into which it is bursting out; and strive not to stop it, — else it will overwhelm and crush them; — but to guide it, to bring to bear upon it the influence of wise thoughts and a Christian zeal.

It is idle to say, that it is a subject which does not concern us. It meets us at every turn. It is the great question of the age, throughout the whole civilized world. It is not the exclusive property of a few fanatical anti-slavery leaders in Massachusetts. It is engaging the attention of Christians and philanthropists everywhere, at the North and at the South, — in Great Britain, France, Germany, Russia, and even the Bey of Tunis has abolished Slavery throughout his dominions as inconsistent with his ideas of right. The doom of Slavery is sealed; and it must soon take its place with piracy and the Slave-Trade, both of which were once honorable employments. It must go down. The religion, the morals, the intelligence, the enterprise, and the selfish interests of the age, are conspiring against it. The only question is as to the time and the means. Shall it be left entirely in the hands of fanatics — the two extremes at the North and the South? Or shall the ablest and wisest men of the nation give to it their profoundest thought, and devise the most peaceful and effective means for its entire removal?

The subject is altogether too solemn for levity or passion. Three millions of human beings, kept in bondage by a nation of Christians, whose great law of religious duty towards man is, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself,' — by a nation of freemen, whose first article of political rights is, that all men are born free and equal, — are an object, the thought of which may call forth tears of sorrow and penitence, may make us tremble lest the righteous judgment of heaven should fall upon us, and lead us to give up all our powers of thought and action to devise and carry out the means for its removal. But we cannot regard it with petulance or levity. Nor can we throw it aside as having nothing to do with us. When our ships are lying idle at the wharves, when we are spending three millions of dollars a week, to say nothing of the waste of life and morals, — when more than twenty-five thousand men are called out from the free States to shed their blood in an infamous war brought upon us by the influence and for the extension of Slavery, it is an insult to our intelligence, to tell us that we have nothing to do with the subject. We cannot escape it. It meets us at every turn. It is the controlling power in our political movements. It makes our laws, appoints our officers, and without our consent declares war. It is dividing and tearing in pieces our churches. It is threatening civil disorganization and disunion. All this it is now doing; and it will not do to close our eyes against it. The question is one that we must meet, calmly, deliberately, with our best thoughts and our most fervent prayers. In this way, by devising the most effectual means of removing a deep seated, and otherwise fatal disease, — in this way, and in this alone, shall we prove ourselves the true conservatives of the public peace. — Boston Christian Register.

EX-PRESIDENT JEFFERSON AND THE COOPER'S SHOP.

The following was related, many years since, by one of the parties, who was a very respectable citizen of Montgomery county, Pa., since deceased:

During the presidential term of Thomas Jefferson, two young men from Pennsylvania took a lease from him of his merchant mill at Monticello, one of the stipulations of which was that the landlord should erect for their use, within a given period, a cooper's shop. The time for a meeting of Congress soon arriving, the President had to repair to Washington to attend to his official duties, where he remained a long time absorbed in national concerns, and the building of the cooper's shop was entirely forgotten by him. Not so with his tenants, whose daily wants constantly reminded them of the provisions contained in the lease, and finally they determined to erect it themselves, and charge the cost of it to their landlord. On the return of the President to his mansion, the parties met to settle a long account current, which had been running during his absence. The items were gone over and scrutinized one by one, and all were found satisfactory but the charge of building the cooper's shop, to which he objected, alleging that he could have erected it with his own workmen. Several attempts were made to effect a settlement, but they always failed when they came to the cooper's shop. The young men became warm and zealous in the affair; and the parties, instead of getting nearer together, found themselves at every interview wider apart.

In this state of affairs, the father of the young men, who was a mild, affable, conciliating gentleman, possessing some knowledge of the world and its ways, arrived on a visit to his sons, who informed him of their difficulty with their landlord. He requested them to leave it to him, observing that he thought he could effect an amicable settlement in the case. This course was accordingly acceded to, and in due time he waited on the President with the account. It was scanned and agreed to, except the charge for building the shop, which, he said, with some firmness, he should not allow for reasons stated. His opponent, observing his apparent decision on the subject, very gravely remarked: 'Well, friend Jefferson, it has always been my practice through life, to yield rather than to contend.' Immediately on this remark being made, the president's chin fell on his breast for an instant, when raising his head in an erect position, he observed in a very emphatic manner, 'a very good principle, Mr. Shoemaker, and I can carry it as far as you can; let the account for the cooper's shop be allowed.' Thus ended the difficulty, and the parties continued their friendly regard for each other till death separated them. And the cultivation of a similar disposition, 'to follow peace with all men,' would terminate thousands of difficulties, add much to the happiness of individuals, and tend to promote the general harmony and order of society. — Christian Non-Resistance, from Farmer's Cabinet.

ABSTRACT OF THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE BELFAST SOCIETY FOR THE PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO ANIMALS SINCE ITS FORMATION IN 1836.

As ten years have elapsed since the Society was formed, the Committee think it a fitting period to take a brief retrospective view of their operations, and thus show how the Divine blessing has accompanied their humble labours. The first effort that was conceived necessary, on the formation of the Society, in March 1836, was to endeavor to get the English Act of Parliament, 5 and 6 Wm. IV., cap. 59, extended to Ireland. After twice petitioning Parliament, corresponding with the Government and with several members of the Legislature, and obtaining petitions from other towns, in favor of the object, a Bill was at last introduced, by the Irish Secretary, Lord Morpeth, M. P., which finally became a law, July 15, 1837, being 1st Vict., cap. LXVI. This point gained gave great encouragement to the Committee.

The sufferings of horses standing with loaded carts next called their attention; and, by application to the Police authorities, a notice on the subject was printed, and, on the re-modelling of the bye-laws, a fine of Five Shillings was ordered for that offence. The Committee subsequently published a handbill on this subject, of which they have circulated many thousands, in the hope of gaining the moral influence of the community.

A few months after the Society commenced their operations, and previous to the Act above referred to being extended to Ireland, a bear was baited in a yard near the Newmarket, and all the exertions of the Society were then totally unavailing to oppose any check to that cruelty, which was greatly lamented at the time, both by the authorities, the Committee, and the humane public. This offence has never been repeated in this town.

In order to bring the law against Cruelty into practical operation, 1839-40 the Society commenced a plan of paying a reward of Five Shillings for each case to such Day Constables as might obtain a conviction for cruelty to the lower creation. The consequence was, that several persons were convicted and fined, for using horses with galled shoulders, and other species of cruelty. This mode of proceeding was found too expensive, as in one month £7 were paid as rewards.

The interest in favour of the humane treatment of animals having greatly increased, the Society, in 1841 resolved on making an extra appeal to the public, which proved most successful; and, in September of that year, they were enabled to adopt the plan of the Parent Society — of having a paid Constable, who, although under the general superintendence of the Police authorities, is left entirely to the direction of the Committee as to his duties. His regular written instructions were submitted to, and approved of, by the Magistrates, and he systematically visits the whole town once a week, and attends the whole of the markets on Tuesdays and Wednesdays. Much cruelty is thus checked, and thousands of the Society's documents are distributed to those in charge of cattle. Through the friendly assistance of the authorities, he is regularly supplied with the uniform of the Day Constables.

In 1840 the Committee were most anxious that the horses employed in town should have a supply of water, in the want of which these useful animals suffer most severely, more particularly in summer. Several unsuccessful applications were made to the authorities, but the supposed expense and other difficulties entirely frustrated, for a time, the wishes of the Committee.

In 1843 the Society most unexpectedly received two donations, of £5 each, for the express purpose of assisting in the erection of water-troughs for horses in Belfast. The Committee renewed their application to the Police authorities for permission to erect a water-trough, as an experiment, at the expense of the Society, which was granted. The Water Commissioners, co-operated in the most friendly manner; laid an additional main-pipe, at their own expense, from the south corner of Donegal-quay to the head of Limekiln-dock, the spot selected for the trough, and granted the supply of water gratuitously.

This trough has now been in use two years, and is found to be extremely useful.

Since 1844, large open boxes, at the expense of the Society, continue to be used in Smithfield, regularly on market days, for the reception of young calves. Before this plan was adopted, these young and helpless animals were literally trampled underneath the feet of both men and cattle.

The Society circulated the printed information respecting the improved harness and saddle invented by Mr. Bencroft, of Barnstable, and recommended by the Parent Society, as these inventions have a direct tendency to lessen the sufferings of that useful and noble animal, the horse. For the same reason, they have used their influence in recommending the improved patent axle of Rowan & Sons.

On two occasions the Society were enabled to grant silver medals, and four prizes in books, for Essays by the young in the schools of Ulster, on the Humane treatment of Animals; and they endeavour to introduce publications of a suitable nature into all the Sunday-schools in town; they have particularly called the attention of the Commissioners of National Education, in Dublin, to the subject.

On one occasion, regarding a case of cockfighting, in which the parties appealed against the sentence at the Police Court to the Quarter Sessions, the Society employed Counsel; the sentence was reversed in favour of the offenders; on which, the cause was carried by the Society before the Court of Queen's Bench, Dublin, and finally the original sentence against the offenders was confirmed.

The Committee have met 69 times during the 10 years.

The Society feel thankful that their efforts have been owned by a superintending Providence; and, although much remains to be done, they have been enabled to commence the good work in calling the attention of the public mind to the rights of the lower creation; and, since the formation of the Society, they are glad to notice that, in general, horses of a better description are in use in the jaunting-cars for hire at the different stands in Belfast.

In conclusion, the Committee beg to add the following summary of facts:—

- 12 Petitions have been presented to Parliament.
- 3 Memorials to the Lord Lieutenant.
- 15 Memorials to the local authorities and public bodies in Belfast.
- 20 Sermons on the sin of Cruelty to Animals have been preached in Ulster, of which 12 were in Belfast, at the request of the Society; 2 in Newtonards, 1 in Downpatrick, 1 in Saintfield, 1 in Lisburn, 1 in Connor, 1 in Ballymoney, and 1 in Larne.
- Prizes—viz., 2 silver medals, and 4 prizes in books, granted for Essays on the humane treatment of the lower creation.
- 1 Water-trough erected in Limekiln-dock.
- 200 Cards reprinted from the London copy, recommending kindness to post-horses hired for gentlemen's carriages.
- 9000 Bills have been printed, recommending the use of rests for loaded carts.
- 8000 Extracts from the Act of Parliament 5 and 6 Wm. IV, cap. 59 (against cruelty.)
- 3000 Copies of a tract, written by the Rev. Isaiah Steen, one of the Honorary Secretaries.
- About 3000 Tracts, purchased from the Parent Society, and about 12 copies, annually, of their Report, for circulation among the friends of the cause in this country.

329 Convictions in Belfast (to Dec. 31, 1845) for Cruelty to Animals.

Previous to the formation of this Society, in 1836, there were only two other auxiliaries to the Parent institution in London—the Bath and Somerset, and the Leeds Societies; since which, we are happy to state that the following have been instituted, and are all advancing the cause in their different localities:—

- In 1838, Plymouth, Devonport, and Stonehouse Society;
- " 1839, the Scottish Society at Edinburgh;
- " 1840, Norfolk and Norwich Society;
- " — Liverpool Society;
- " — Dublin Society;
- " 1842, Bristol and Clifton Society;
- " — Exeter Society;
- " 1843, Gloucester Society;
- " — Bury St. Edmund's Society.

So that, now, there are twelve auxiliaries, thus proving a considerable advance in public opinion at home; and it is hoped that, ere long, every large town in the Empire will follow these examples. The cause is likewise gaining in foreign countries.

FRENCH EMANCIPATION.

Emancipation, immediate et complete, des Esclaves. Appel aux Abolitionistes. Par G. DE FELICE. Paris: Delaty, 1846. Immediate and complete Emancipation, &c. By G. DE FELICE. Paris, 1846.

Here is a book worthy of the great subject of which it treats, and of the reputation of its distinguished author. Masterly in conception, in argument, and appeal, it cannot fail to make a profound impression on its readers. It is just such a production as the times require, and most fervently do we hope that its circulation will be as great as its merits. The temporising Abolitionists of France, to whom it is specially addressed, cannot, we think, resist the force of its principles, the array of its facts, or the suavity of its spirit. Converted to immediate abolition, they will, we trust, lay aside all their schemes for meliorating the condition of the slaves, with a view to their ultimate emancipation, and devote themselves with conscientious earnestness and zeal to the great work before them. But in order that consistency may be given to their efforts, and that success may attend their well-directed labours, they must organize on the principle of immediate and entire emancipation. It is not enough to admit the doctrine; it must be practically applied. Hitherto the friends of the slaves in France—and, we rejoice to say, there are many such—have been divided on the question of immediate emancipation. Each has had some scheme of his own for hastening the downfall of slavery; but the schemes of each and all have been successively rejected, and the Government, taking advantage of this state of things, first delayed the settlement of the question, and when public opinion would no longer endure its procrastination, concocted a measure which can never be worked out, and which must end in failure. In the meantime the poor slaves will have to endure all the horrors of their dreadful condition, aggravated by the feelings of their masters, who have been exasperated by the interference with their authority, contemplated by the act of July the 18th, 1845, and the ordinances which have been recently issued for giving it effect. The attitude assumed by these masters is one of hostility. They have determined to render every measure which curbs their power a dead letter. Our advice then is, deal with these men boldly, cut the ground of controversy from under their feet, deprive them at once of the right of property in their fellow-men, and adopt the principles which Professor de Felice recommends with so much eloquence and force. Among Frenchmen we have no doubt there will be, generally, a hearty response to his urgent appeals; and will they not find an echo in the Chamber of Deputies? The Count de Gasparin, the Marquis de Tracey, and M. Ledra Rollin, representing as they do different political sentiments, can render immense service to the cause of human freedom, by combination on the principle of immediate and entire emancipation. Let them do this, and this great question, which involves the liberty of two hundred and fifty thousand slaves, and, so long as it shall remain unsettled, the honour of France, will receive a speedy and satisfactory solution. To M. de Felice we offer our warmest thanks for this well-timed and admirable production, and respectfully tender to him our cordial greetings on the courage he has displayed in grappling with the prejudices, the false principles, and the false reasonings of the pro-slavery party, and the success with which he has disposed of the hesitations and timid policy of the friends of the anti-slavery cause. We intend hereafter to give some specimens of this valuable contribution to anti-slavery literature.—A. S. Reporter

PROGRESS OF ABOLITION.

From the Annual Report of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery for 1846.

The anti-slavery cause, though far from having accomplished its great work, the universal ex-tion of slavery and the slave-trade, has nevertheless been so signally successful in its past labours, as to leave no doubt, under the divine blessing, of its final and complete triumph.

To the State of Vermont, in the United States, belongs the honour of having first abolished slavery, by its constitution, in 1777. Vermont was followed in the work of abolition by Pennsylvania and Massachusetts, in 1780; by Connecticut and Rhode Island, in 1781; New York, in 1799; and New Jersey, in 1804. In all those states, with the exception of Vermont, slavery was gradually extinguished, and in one of them, New Jersey, a few hundred slaves still remain in bondage.

Mexico, on the anniversary of its freedom from the dominion of Spain in 1829, issued a decree by which all its slaves were declared free, as "an act of national justice and beneficence."

The first of the South American Republics which abolished slavery was Buenos Ayres, in 1816; Columbia and Chili followed in 1821, Bolivia in 1826, Peru, Guatemala, and Monte Video in 1828, and Uruguay in 1843. With the exception of Uruguay, slavery still lingers in these Republics, but it is in progress of gradual extinction, and it may be affirmed, that if the laws be faithfully executed, it will soon completely disappear.

In Haiti, formerly St. Domingo, slavery was abolished by the French Commissioner, in 1793; but an attempt was made by Buonaparte to re-establish it in 1802, which was defeated, and since the declaration of its independence in 1804, it has been in the possession of its freedom.

Great Britain did not follow the example thus set her until the year 1833, when the imperial parliament abolished slavery throughout the whole of her colonies in the West India, South America, southern Africa, and the Indian Ocean, or, to speak more strictly, substituted for it a system of apprenticeship, which was finally terminated in 1838, amidst the rejoicings of the emancipated slaves, and the congratulations of their exulting friends. In 1843, the Supreme Council of British India abolished slavery throughout the vast territories subject to its control; and during the same year, liberty was proclaimed at Malacca, Singapore, Penang, province Wellesley, and Seinde. To this may be added that, in 1843, the imperial parliament, terminated the system of slavery, which prevailed at its settlement on the gold coast, Western Africa. In 1844, the Governor in Council at Hong Kong abolished slavery; and, finally, at the close of the same year, the Queen issued an order in council which destroyed the last vestige of slavery in Ceylon. Nor do the more civilized nations stand alone in this great work. The Bay of Tunis finally consummated the work of abolition, which he began in 1843, at the commencement of the present year; and this, to use his own words, he has done "for the glory of mankind, and to distinguish them from the brute creation."

Such is a brief view of the triumphs of freedom over slavery during the last seventy years.

In reference to the African slave-trade the following facts will be found interesting. The first Power which abolished that dreadful traffic, was Denmark. This she did in 1792, and was followed by the United States and Great Britain in 1807, by Sweden in 1813, by the Netherlands in 1814, by France in 1815, by Spain in 1820, by Buenos Ayres in 1825, by Colombia in 1825, by Mexico in 1826, by Brazil in 1829, by Sardinia in 1834, by Portugal in 1836, by the Haïse-Towns, Tuscany, Bolivia, and Peru in 1837, by Naples in 1838, by Haiti, Venezuela, Chili, and Uruguay in 1839, by Texas in 1840, and by Austria, Prussia, and Russia in 1841.

With all these powers Great Britain has treaties or conventions, more or less perfect, for the suppression of the African slave-trade; and with the exception of Portugal, Spain, and Brazil, especially the two latter, it may be said to have ceased, though the flags of many of them are still prostituted by the slave-traders to cover the nefarious traffic.

By many of these countries the African slave-trade has been declared piracy, and by all of them, with the exception of Brazil, a highly penal offence. But none have gone so far as Great Britain in her efforts to destroy it. Her laws not only prohibit her subjects from aiding and abetting the slave-trade, but from the purchase and sale of slaves in foreign slaveholding countries, under any pretence whatsoever. This enactment was intended, among other things, to prevent the investment of British capital in slaves for the purpose of working plantations and mines.

In referring to the treaties of Great Britain with foreign states for the suppression of the slave-trade, the committee would not be understood to approve them, as a means of overcoming that gigantic evil, but as indicating, that its defence as a legitimate mode of supplying their respective colonies and dependencies with labour, has been abandoned; and as showing that it is generally regarded with the abhorrence which its criminal character so richly merits.

[Further portions of this valuable Report will appear in the next number of the Non-Slaveholder.]

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, EIGHTH MONTH 1, 1845.

LONDON EPISTLE.—The Epistle from the late Yearly Meeting of Friends held in London contains so much salutary advice, that we thought our readers generally would be glad to have the opportunity of perusing it. We have accordingly inserted it in our present number.

CHRISTIAN NON-RESISTANCE.—A book under this title, written by Adin Ballou, of Hopkinton, Massachusetts, has been recently published by James Miller McKim, No. 31 North Fifth street, Philadelphia. It forms a duodecimo volume of 240 pages, at the price of 37½ cents. The author rests his argument for Christian non-resistance, primarily, upon the doctrines of the New Testament, and is careful to distinguish the non-resistance he advocates from that which is merely philosophical, sentimental, or necessitous, though he satisfactorily shows it to be in perfect accordance with the laws of nature, considered in all their developments. He derives the term Non-Resistance from our Saviour's injunction "Resist not evil." Matt. 5:39. This direction, in his view, requires us to abstain from all personal injuries, either as a means of retaliation, self-defence, or suppression of wrong, whilst it leaves us in the unimpaired right, and under the unimpaired obligation of offering the utmost moral resistance in our power to every manifestation of evil among mankind. He does not consider non-resistance as identical with absolute passivity, but cautiously admits of an unobtrusive physical force in cases where it would really benefit the party to whom it is applied. He carries out the doctrine of non-resistance to the extent of inhibiting our voluntary connection with any political compact, civil or military league, covenant or constitution which requires, authorizes, provides for, or tolerates war, blood-shed, capital punishment, or any kind of absolute injury, offensive or defensive. He believes, however, that Governments may be constituted upon just and non-resistant principles, with unquestionable safety to the communities they represent, and will be thus constituted whenever the mass of the people, the exponents of whose intelligence governments are, shall really embrace Christian principles. Till then, he defers the right of Christian non-resistance to participate in them. About one-third of his book is occupied with special and highly interesting illustrations of the efficacy of non-resistance, as a defence against wrong, taken from real life. We select one of these cases for our present number, and may offer others to our readers at a future time.

We have read this work with deep interest, and concur with its obviously benevolent and intelligent author in most of his statements and conclusions. In some respects, however, they transcend our views; chiefly in his doctrine of non-participancy in civil government. We can readily perceive that he who votes for a slaveholder or warrior, or for the friends of slavery and war, as much ratifies the principles in which those wrongs exist, and as much involves himself in a responsibility for all acts done by his agents in those relations, as does the buyer and user of the products of those wrongs endorse the principles, and become accountable for their practical enactment: but we are not prepared to assert that it is inconsistent with a pure christian morality to seek the elevation into political office of men imbued with Christian principles and competent to their exemplification, nor of such men to accept office, whose influence and votes would sometimes procure the adoption of proper measures and sometimes prevent the adoption of improper ones, and whose whole career would always reflect upon the nation the light of those principles.

Our difference of views does not preclude us from commending this book to the attention of our friends, and of all inquirers into the peaceful Truth. They will find in it the Christian doctrine of non-resistance ably explained and defended, and the objections to it, and evasions of it, as ably examined and exposed. We think the lover of Truth will rise from the perusal, delighted and improved; and however he may reserve his approbation from some of the extreme points taken by the author, he will not regard them as intrusive, but as being well entitled to his further serious consideration.

DUTY OF ABSTINENCE AND APOLOGIES FOR ITS NON-OBSERVANCE.—That slavery is a wrong practised on the slave—having for its object to rob him of the productions of his labour; that this wrong depends for its existence on the demand for those productions, and that the persons who make the demand occasion and sustain the wrong, are facts too apparent to admit of denial. The doctrine founded upon them is equally clear, that to give this occasion for the continuance of slavery is as criminal as is any other participancy in any moral wrong. We venture the assertion that if selfishness were banished from the bosoms of professing Christians, no doctrine would be more quickly received, acknowledged and acted upon than the above. As it is, no doctrine is more earnestly resisted by persons who ought to eschew all connection with wrong, and who aim to do so in relation to all other wrongs than that which gives strength and sustenance to slavery.

These views are expressed in the spirit of charity not less than of candour. We offer them in no feeling of censure towards those who occupy the same position which we held, in common with them, but a few years since. We have had our own experience in the matter, and speak from that experience—condemning our past participation in the wrong just as severely as we condemn the present participation of others. We know the facility with which we seized upon any plea, however frail, for avoiding the cross which abstinence would variously impose on our interests and enjoyments.

We were led to these reflections by a letter from a correspondent in Ohio. The writer advises us of a prevalent apology in his vicinity for the use of slave-produce, contained in the following propositions, to which he requests our answer.

1. That the persons who sell to the slaveholder the productions of free labour, do as much sustain slavery and are as much guilty of its support, as are those who buy of him the productions of extorted and unremunerated toil.

2. That those who object on principle to the use of the products of slavery, and do not object to sell their goods to slaveholders, have inconsistent views, and that such inconsistency of the avowed champions of the doctrine of abstinence must be taken as evidence that the doctrine is itself unsound.

In making our reply we do not stop to inquire how many advocates of this doctrine do actually sell their honestly procured goods to slaveholders, or to disprove that two wrongs—if there be a wrong in selling to the slaveholder as well as in buying of him—can ever make one right: but we proceed to show the fallacy of the propositions by stating them in more general terms, in which position it will more readily appear; reminding the reader that the slave has by natural right a property in the product of his toil, which follows it wherever it goes, and none in the free goods sold to the slaveholder, or in the money—the artificial equivalent—which the slaveholder pays for them.

By the first proposition, if any person who has for sale in an open market honestly acquired goods shall incidentally sell them to another person guilty of robbery, he as much sustains robbery, and is as guilty of supporting it, as the person who buys the goods which were the subjects of the felony!

By the second proposition, if the person objecting to the use of goods taken by any process of robbery shall sell his honestly acquired goods as above, his act is to be regarded as evidence that the doctrine against the buying of goods feloniously taken is unsound!

The axiom in morals, without which this world would be a chaos of fraud, that "the receiver is as bad as the thief," includes the buyer of the goods which were feloniously taken, but not the individual who sells his honestly procured goods—even to a robber. We do not mean to imply that in the latter case no offence can be committed, but we deny the parallelism and equality of the cases. There are doubtless many circumstances under which he who sells to another his justly procured goods becomes the aider and abettor of crime; and he obviously is so, when he knowingly furnishes any facilities for the perpetration of the great wrongs which belong to slavery and the slave-trade. The honest abstinent will be always on his watch against all occasions of doing this.

When the sentiment was expressed to the late William Allen that, with respect to supplying slaveholders from the stores, it was not the business of the managers of the Sierra Leone Company, to inquire what the things were wanted for, he observes—"I maintained, that admitting it was not their business, yet, when a man comes and says, I want a supply of articles for the purpose of buying slaves, or where we have every reason to believe that things are wanted for that purpose, they cannot be supplied without a degree of participation in the guilt. I stated my own case, in which a merchant, with whom I had done considerable business, sent me a large sea-chest to refit. I suspected from the nature of it, that it was destined for the slave-trade, and, on inquiry at the merchant's counting-house, found that it was so. I then told him that I could not, consistently with my feelings and principles, derive profit from, or at all aid or assist in such a business. They of course sent for the chest, and I lost their custom. T. F. Foster quite agreed with me, as did Thomas Harrison."

"On a subsequent occasion of a somewhat similar character," say the editors of his "Life and Correspondence," "William Allen pursued the same consistent course. The Emperor Alexander urged him to undertake the supply of drugs for the Russian armies—an offer which he gratefully but firmly refused, and the Obituary of the Royal Society, after stating this circumstance, adds,—'To his honour be it spoken, he resisted a temptation, the value of which it would be difficult to estimate. At the end of a long life he could say, that he had never compromised his public usefulness for private interests.'"

THE SLAVE PAULINE.—The London "Pictorial Times" of June 6th, 1846, introduces, with the remarks which we copy below, the article published in our last number, relative to the slave Pauline, and also accompanies it with a picture representing the officers of the law, armed with clubs and whips, in the very act of tearing her new born babe from her bosom, preparatory to her own execution!

"Slavery in America."—When the Americans were talking loudly about going to war with England for the Oregon, the journalists on the other side of the Atlantic were, of course, divided upon the question. There were war articles and peace articles, the one appealing to the passions and vanities of the mob, and the other addressing the better judgment of the people, and exhorting them to pause before joining in the outcry of blood, waste, and misery. Fortunately for both nations and for humanity, the latter section have, for the present at all events, got the best of the argument, and we are to have it seems a fire of protocols instead of broadsides of cannon shot. The American writers who supported the cause of peace availed themselves most ably of the many powerful arguments to be found in support of a peaceful policy; they appealed to the Christian feelings of the religious—to the economic interest of the trader—to the fears of the timid, and to the good judgment of the generous and reasonable. But they forgot to lay full stress on the reason why the United States should avoid war as they would avoid destruction. It would seem as though those who live in that country were so familiar with this reason, that the very familiarity closes their eyes to its potency; as if near neighborhood to the danger had robbed it of its terrors, and made that seem harmless which sooner or later threatens to overwhelm the 'model republic' of the New World in intestine struggle, bloodshed, and misery. Should the United States ever be involved in a general war, she has undoubtedly, within herself, the elements of certain defeat. This weakness for war—this plague-spot on her body-politic—this disgrace to her name and lineage—this scandal upon her religion, is SLAVERY.

Republicans deal in flesh and blood—republicans forge chains for the slave—republicans, so free and generous, declare it death to teach a negro to read—republicans so brave, dare not trust with a book a black man whom they affect to despise.

This is, indeed, a melancholy spectacle, and it is one that strengthens the argument of those who pronounce the heart of man to be originally and irreclaimably vicious. With a rich country—a vigorous population—a public literature, and a thrilling future before them, the citizens of the United States have yet the cowardice to encourage slavery. There is too strong a suspicion that, for Slavery's sake, Texas was annexed; and now, for Slavery's sake, slave-owners would coerce Mexico—a land which, if worse governed and less fortunate in native energy than its northern neighbors, has yet had the national courage and the natural humanity to abolish slavery.

How frightfully the system of Slavery works in the United States, let the following narrative tell. It requires no commentary. It is a tragedy of Sin and Crime and Cruelty, as deep as ever ink was called upon to chronicle, or soul of man to grieve for. This one case is surely enough to make every American who has a heart cry aloud for the extinction of a system which gives birth to such iniquities—enough to make every face in the whole Union crimson with the blush of shame and sorrowful indignation.

Much more in sorrow than in anger are such cases read and spoken of, and commented upon, in England. It required a long and arduous struggle to repeal the slave laws in our own dominions, and the tardy act of justice is too recent to allow us to forget that, under the sanction of British law, the negro was the property of his purchasers. But England has done justice—though she paid dearly for it—and Englishmen of all degrees, classes and conditions are anxious to see their brethren across the Atlantic wipe the stain from their country. Where there is English blood it should work against the tyranny of slavery; where there is English courage, it should scorn the cowardice of slavery; where the English tongue is spoken, it should denounce the injustice of slavery.

FREE COTTON GOODS.—We have received letters from various quarters, desiring information relative to the progress of the Free Produce Association in manufacturing goods. One of the Manufacturing Committee has furnished us with the following list of articles, which are now ready for sale, and can be furnished wholesale and retail, at nearly the same price, and in some cases at the same price as slave cotton goods. Orders should be directed to Thos. S. Field & Co., 36 north Front street, Philadelphia.

4-4 and 5-4 shirting and sheeting muslins, brown and bleached.

Assorted colored Cambrics.

Calicoes and Ginghams, neat styles and fast colors.

Diaper and plaid table cloth stuff—assorted widths.

White and coloured Canton Flannels.

Long and half hose of superior quality.

Knitting cotton.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY.—Nearly eight pages of the London Anti-Slavery Reporter are occupied with an abstract of the Annual Report of this Society for 1846. We have room in our present number for that part only which shows the progress of the extinction of slavery and the slave-trade. It is interesting in itself, and will be valuable for future reference, especially on account of its dates.

PREVENTING CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.—We are indebted to a valued correspondent in Belfast, Ireland, for a copy of the tenth annual report of "The Belfast Society for the prevention of cruelty to animals," and we regret that our limits will not permit us to insert it. We find, however, in the appendix an "Abstract of the Society's proceedings since its formation in 1836," which we give to our readers, and cannot but desire that similar means may be adopted in the large cities of this country, to accomplish the same benevolent purposes.

The act 5 and 6 William IV. cap. 59, imposes fine and imprisonment in various cases of cruelty to animals, but the Belfast Society has always acted on the principle that "prevention is better than cure," and has only resorted to the infliction of penalties when milder means would be likely to be ineffectual. Amongst the means in operation are these: 1. The circulation of suitable tracts, gratuitously or by cheap sale, particularly among persons entrusted with cattle, such as drovers, coachmen, carters, &c. 2. The introduction into schools of books calculated to humanize the minds of youth. 3. Frequent appeals to the public through the pulpit and the press, and by every mode tending to awaken more general attention to this important and interesting subject. 4. The employment of inspectors in the markets and streets. 5. The prosecution of persons guilty of any flagrant cruelty, and giving publicity to the same.

The parent society in London, was instituted in 1824, and appears from its last annual report to be successfully engaged in prosecuting its benevolent objects. The constables of the Society visit other cities, and the total number of convictions obtained during the last year for cruelty, including those in the metropolis, was 230. Some idea may be formed of the extent of their operations from the fact that the contributions for the year amounted to about seven thousand dollars.

One pleasing feature in the efforts of these Societies is, the erection of water troughs at carriage stands and other public places. The constable of the Belfast Society attended at a water trough for one hour each day, during forty-six different days, varying the hour, and ascertained that the greatest number of horses that used it during any one hour was 53, and the least 15, and the average of the whole was 27 per hour.

BRITISH MINISTRY.—Late arrivals from England bring us information of an important change in this department of the British Government. On a question being taken in Parliament upon a measure introduced by Sir Robert Peel, and which he and his coadjutors deemed to be necessary to the preservation of order in Ireland, they were left in a considerable minority: their resignation was the consequence; and an administration under Lord John Russell, representing in that respect the views of the successful party, or rather combination of parties, has followed.

With the name of Sir Robert Peel is associated those great events of the age—the repeal of the British Corn Laws and the introduction into British policy of a system having for its ultimate purpose the abolition of all restrictions on a free commerce in free goods. He retires from office with an amount of personal popularity which, probably, no other minister has ever taken with him in leaving this distinguished station, especially when, in carrying out his schemes of national policy, he has had to cross as well the path of friends as foes. The enthusiastic reception which his retiring speech in Parliament received, even from his opponents, is evidence of this. His policy in favour of Free Trade and in opposition to all monopolies in behalf of agriculture, trade, or commerce, will be probably followed by his successor, with the fatal difference to bleeding humanity that no distinction will be maintained between the productions of free labour and those of an opposite character—a distinction which formed an important element in the late Premier's theory of free trade. We deplore then the event which has brought into power an individual prominently opposed to that distinction, though not selected, we hope, on account of this difference

POETRY.

"MOVING BEFORE THE BODY."

There is a pure inspeaking voice and competent to teach,

Whose counsels if thou wisely heed, thy inmost need will reach!

There is a light—observe it well—no ignominious ray—

Mistake it not—it came from Heaven and shews thy heavenward way!

And yet when light beside is given, and Duty's course is clear,

And Selfishness alone creates what obstacles appear,
By seeking miracles to teach what was already known,

Or waiting for her light, were want of Faith's obedience shown

'Twere weak, presumptuous, vain, to seek a special revelation

To shew what stands in bold relief and courts thy observation.

Oh bring not thou in disrepute the doctrines we revere,

By pleading them for selfish sloth—mere pretexts insincere!

There's deference due to those who long have walked in Wisdom's ways,

Whose feet are beautiful in those Courts, whose entrance gates are praise;

But if on man too much thou lean,—pierced by the broken reed—

The Lord may take away thy staff in thy extremest need.

With reverence view the Church and own, with a we its holy Head,

Its counsels never yet have erred, when He those counsels led!

Wholesome and binding its decrees forth in His power when given;

What thus is bound or loosed on Earth, is bound or loosed in Heaven.

But take not for the Church's voice their dictum whose example

Was money changers of old time or vendors in the Temple;—

Nor with the mystic body that associate mass confound,

Who, on a catalogue enrolled, by common rules are bound.

The Body owned by Christ the Head, in Him alive remaineth—

A Church composed of names enrolled, some halt and blind retaineth.

Isaiah, lii. 1.

of sentiment. The abolitionists of England, we are glad to be advised, will make a powerful rally, and, we trust, a great moral impression on the British nation, in favour of the distinctive policy, should the attempt be made to open the ports of Great Britain to the admission of Brazilian and Cuban sugars upon the same terms as those produced by free labour. They perceive truly that the opening of the trade with Brazil and Cuba will be to open new flood-gates of blood to already greatly bleeding Africa, by the large increase it will give to the market for the products of slave cultivation, and thus to the importation from Africa of the cultivators necessary to that hateful market.

We give below an extract from a circular recently addressed to members of Parliament, on the subject of the sugar question, and in anticipation of its being introduced to the consideration of the present Parliament.

"The question then arises, shall this great country which has relieved itself from the guilt of continuing the slave-trade, which has emancipated millions of slaves in its distant dependencies, so legislate now, as to stultify its own most glorious acts, and build up a system of atrocious wrong and cruelty in other countries, which it would not tolerate in its own? The Committee trust they value the interests of legitimate commerce as highly as the most ardent of its advocates; but, in their judgment, it would cease to be legitimate were it carried on at the sacrifice of human liberty and human happiness. The Committee would rejoice in the financial prosperity of the country, but they never could be parties to any measure which would connect that prosperity with the uncompensated toil of slaves; and they have too much confidence in the humane feeling and Christian principle of their fellow-countrymen, to believe that they would ever willingly consent to advance their personal interests at the expense of the freedom of their fellow-men. They hate slavery. They love liberty. They laboured long, and, at length, successfully, to establish the rights of humanity in every part of the British empire; and now their mission is in the use of all honourable means, to extend their principles, and diffuse their spirit throughout the world. To you, sir, as one of their representatives, is now presented the alternative of sustaining a system which brutalizes and destroys human nature, which robs innocent men, women, and children of their most precious rights, which degrades them to the condition of things, and derides and defies the authority of Heaven—or of crippling, where you cannot absolutely annihilate, its power."

And if supinely thou should'st lie at earthly Temples' porches,
It may be thou wilt miss the voice which speaketh to the churches.

Accountability to God must ever be direct—
It is not through the medium of society or sect.

Summon up the ghost of Luther with Melancthon at his side!

The Vaudois and the Waldenses for Truth who testified!

And Fox—from the blind teachers of the blind who nobly turned—

From the true and living witness the way of Life who learned—

And Woolman, who in gentleness pursued the narrow way,

Nor for the fellowship of man, nor for the church
could stay,

Who bore the bondman's burden upon his prayerful heart,

Till in his exercise of soul the Church at length bore part;—

Ask these if Truth would dictate that you close your eyes on light,

Till a great unwieldy body can perceive the true and right!

Beware the enthusiast's ultra zeal! unbidden haste beware!

In overweening confidence may lie thy fatal snare.
But let not bonds of steel keep back thy spirit from its goal,

Restrain thy feet from Duty's path and manacle thy soul!

Reposing on thy Church's breast, forget not those who dwell

In Slavery's shades, and look to thee their tale of woe to tell!

By word and deed continuous plead the outraged
bondman's cause

Nor implicate thyself in wrong for profit or applause.

Bind to thy heart the principles of thy most holy faith!

Swerve not from them in Fortune's beam or Persecution's wrath!

Bring all thy actions to the test of duty and of right—

Let all thy stoppings, day by day, be taken in the light,

But fail not when thy course is clear advancing steps to make,

Because a body too supine unreal rest may take.

Had Luther waited for the Pope and all his Priests to own

The truths which burned within his breast, where then were Luther's crown?

He who would act a faithful part the path of some must cross:

Had Woolman waited for the church, the church had suffered loss!

But moving in the light of Truth the enlightening influence spread,—

The sluggish body followed on, where faithful ones had led.

They waited for the opening-way—but when the way was clear,

They pressed right onward steadily in meek yet bold career.

Brave pioneers, like Joshua and old Jephthah's son, Exploring realms of principle, to them by Faith made known.

And, walking blameless in those paths they ventered to explore,

Abundant fruit like Eschol's grapes back to the camp they bore:

Press on thy individual course of duty and of love,
With conscience pure—after, before, or with the body move!

Act not from whim, caprice,—but well persuaded in thy mind—

Nor harbor one ungenerous thought toward those who wait behind.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

LIFE OF WILLIAM ALLEN.—The subscriber, having received from London the first volume of this most valuable and delightful biography, proposes to reprint it as soon as he obtains a sufficient number of subscribers. As there will be no other edition, it is desirable that those who wish to have the life of this noble Philanthropist send in their names immediately. There will be three volumes for the low price of four dollars, about half the price of the English edition. Any one forwarding twenty dollars for five copies, will be entitled to one gratis.
HENRY LONGSTRETH,
Bookseller and Publisher, 347 Market street, Philadel.

FREE LABOR STORE.—The subscriber having purchased the stock and fixtures of the store at the N. W. corner of Fifth and Cherry streets, of Lydia White, would respectfully inform his friends and those who prefer using the produce of free labor, that he will continue the business as heretofore, and hopes by attention thereto, to merit and receive a continuance of the patronage bestowed on the former occupant.
JOEL FISHER

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER

Is published on the first of each month, at one dollar per annum for one copy, or five dollars per annum
for six copies in one order, payable in advance.
Abraham L. Pernock, Samuel Rhoads, and George W. Taylor, are the Editors and Publishers; either of whom will receive subscriptions, payments, and communications. Letters and papers addressed to them, or endorsed Non-Slaveholder, directed to box 777,
Philadelphia Post Office, will duly reach them.

By decision of the Post Master General, the Non-Slave-holder is subject to newspaper postage only.

PRINTED AT

Merrihew & Thompson's Book and Job Office,
No. 7 Carter's Alley.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

"Whoso gives the slave, makes his brother's sin his own."

VOL. I.]

PHILADELPHIA, FIFTH MONTH, 1846.

[NO. 9.]

COMMUNICATION.

To the Editors of the Non-Slaveholder.

SARASVY, 7th mo. 18th, 1846.

After hearing, and seriously and candidly considering, all the opposing arguments, I am fully convinced of the duty of refraining from articles the produce of slave labour. We are frequently told that slave produce has become so general and so mixed and complicated, that it cannot be analysed, and that in some things, at least, it is impossible to get entirely clear of the productions of slavery; and from these premises the conclusion is drawn that because we cannot do everything we may do nothing. The fallacy of this mode of arguing is readily admitted when applied to our testimony against using the prize goods of war. No consistent Friend tells us that if these goods became so general in the market as to render it impossible totally to avoid their use, we would be excused from exercising a religious care to abstain from purchasing or using them in cases where they could be distinguished from other goods.

Our Society, in its connection with slavery, did not with one great step get from slavery to freedom.
The first step it took was a very short one—"to buy no slaves," still keeping what they had—and the Society had to ascend by many steps before freedom was granted to its slaves. The same may be said of the action of Society, respecting spirituous liquors. But I need produce no more examples to prove the weakness of the argument, for they may be found in every business and in every duty.

For a considerable time past I have been in-doed to fear that a falling back or apathy has prevailed in our Society, in latter years, respecting slavery. A comparison of our present state with the lively sentiments and feelings of active members, forty or fifty years ago, I think warrants this conclusion. A relative of mine, recently deceased, told me a few days before he died, that when he was young, he lived a short time with James Jackson, a worthy and active Friend of Hockessin, who mentioned to his family in the hearing of my relative, that he had come to a fixed conviction of mind not to wear blue stockings any longer, and wished the disease of indigo in the family, because the poor down-trodden slave had to toil to produce it. About that time such a feeling prevailed that the blue stocking was nearly excluded from Society, although the colour had been general. Another friend informed me that a noted family of Marlborough, having exchanged the blue for walnut brown, not only in stockings, but other clothing, some person, unfriendly to the change, gave to the walnut brown the name of Bernard Blue!

"To stir up the pure mind by way of remembrance," is as much a duty now as it was in the days of the Apostle Peter; and this, I trust, is my object in writing. The Apostle Paul says, "The love of money is the root of all evil," and I think it may be applied to slavery as correctly as to most other evils. If the Apostle, then, be correct, to abolish slavery we have only to separate or keep away its root, that from which it has its constant supply for existence or life. Separate the root from the great trunk and branches, and the upas, whose shade spreads far and wide, impoverishing many fair and fertile States, and poisoning the happiness of millions of mankind, will fall—must fall. Surely every one who wishes this great evil to exist no longer, is in duty bound to examine carefully where the money comes from, on which the very existence of the system depends.

The traders to Africa for slaves must have money to induce them to become pirates, and carry on all the treachery, violence, and murder connected with the business; they must have money to pay the cost of vessels and seamen employed in the nefarious traffic. If nothing could be got for the slaves when brought to America—if no purchasers, no money, could be obtained for them, would the pirate go immediately back to Africa for another cargo, with no prospect of selling those he already had? No man in his senses would continue such a losing business. The traffic with all its concomitants, would at once cease.

Like a tree that had lost its roots, it must die—it must fall. So with slavery itself; the slaveholder could not keep the system from sinking without his supply of money. Where does this money come from? ought to be a serious question with every one who is sincerely opposed to slavery. If the slaveholder could get no money for the produce of his slave's labour—and if there were no purchasers or consumers, there would be no market, no sale, no money—would he, against his interest, uphold the system or attempt to sustain the poisonous, overgrown tree without its roots? No, it would fall—it must fall.

Where, then, does the money come from, that produces and upholds the whole system of slavery from first to last? I answer, from the consumers of the productions of slavery; and each one who purchases such goods, contributes his part to sustain the evil, and must be accountable for the guilt, if conscious of what he does.

To illustrate the subject over again:—Suppose a slaveholder had purchased a cargo of slaves and made them plant a district with tobacco, and after the process of preparing it was completed, it was taken to market and offered for sale, and no one would buy it, because no one would use it—the community having simultaneously agreed to expel the poisonous weed and give no more of their money for the ill-gotten luxury—then there would be no sale, no money for it, and the tobacco might lie and rot. Would the slaveholder set about planting his district over again with tobacco? No, the business must cease. From which it may be clearly deduced, that if every other article of slave produce, as well as tobacco, found no purchaser, there would be no cargoes of slaves for sale—no slavery.

You are at liberty to publish whatever of the foregoing you may think proper, with my name attached.

WM. KIRKWOOD.

SELECTIONS.

PROTEST AGAINST THE PROPOSED INTRODUCTION OF SLAVE-GROWN SUGARS INTO THE BRITISH MARKETS.

A crisis has arisen in the history of the anti-slavery cause of so grave a nature as to require the instant attention, and the prompt and vigorous action of every friend of liberty and humanity throughout the United Kingdom.

It is understood that the first great measure which the new Government intend to submit to the consideration of Parliament will have for its object the introduction of slave-grown sugars into the British markets. The grounds on which this step is attempted to be justified, are those of political expediency and commercial advantage. It is intended thereby to augment the quantity of sugar for home consumption, to increase the revenue from the duties leviable thereon, and to complete the series of free-trade measures which have already received the sanction of the Legislature and of the Crown.

These grounds would be perfectly legitimate, did not the plan contemplated by Government injuriously affect the rights of millions of mankind; and involve the violation of those high moral considerations which should always influence the conduct of Governments and Legislatures, as well as that of individuals.

That the measure proposed by Government will have the effect of strengthening the system of slavery, of stimulating the slave-trade, and of adding to the horrors of both, admits of no doubt with most, if not all, who have maturely studied the question. And it is because, in the deliberate judgment of the undersigned, that the proposed measure would lead to these dreadful results, that they enter their solemn protest against it; and call most urgently on the friends of the anti-slavery cause, in every part of the country, to follow their example.

First:—With respect to slavery.—It is assumed by those who advocate the proposed measure for the equalization of the duties on foreign sugars, without regard to origin or country, that from 70,000 to 80,000 tons of slave-grown sugars will be annually required to meet the increased demand in the British markets. These sugars will come principally from the Spanish West India colonies and Brazil, where, it is notorious, slavery assumes its most degrading and terrific forms. Of the slaves employed in the cultivation of sugar in Cuba, one-tenth perish annually, and the whole are killed off in ten years. In Brazil the mortality on the sugar estates is admitted to be five per cent. per annum, in some cases more, which would destroy the population in twenty years. Now this takes place under the present demand for sugar. But with the increased demand contemplated by the new arrangement of the sugar duties, that murderous mortality will be fearfully increased, or new slaves must be imported to meet the exigency. At present neither the Brazilian nor the Cuban planters possess more labourers than they require. They have no unemployed slaves, no hands in want of work, no superabundance of population. On the contrary, all hands are now worked to excess. It follows, therefore, that the very same people who are this murdered by wholesale to make the quantity of sugar now exported from Cuba and Brazil will have to make more—that is to say, they must be forced by the lack to a new excess of labour, at which they will be more wretched while they live, and under which they will more rapidly die. Where the labourer is free, every augmentation in the demand for the produce of his toil increases his means of subsistence and comfort; where the labourer is a slave it certainly diminishes them, and destroys him.

That slavery will be strengthened must be obvious from the fact that additional capital will be directly employed in sustaining it, and thereby rendering it more profitable than it is at present. A great mercantile House at the Havana whose authority is quoted in the last slave-trade papers, states that whilst “they had no expectation of the price of sugar being improved, except by having the English market open to the produce of the island,” they were convinced that “if this could be effected—even at a rate of 50 per cent. above the duty on English colonial sugar, still they could obtain for their produce double the amount they can obtain at present.” If such be the fact, who can reflect on the consequences without a shudder?

Secondly:—With respect to the slave trade.—No one can believe for a moment that the Brazilian and Cuban planters will let their stock of slaves diminish. To fill up the gaps created by the vast mortality which is incessantly going on among them, they have recourse to the African slave-trade. By this horrid means they recruit and increase their gangs; and, beyond all doubt, this traffic will be pursued with greater desperation and atrocity in proportion to the growing urgency of the demand and the eagerness of planters to purchase. At present, the enormous profits derived from the contraband slave-trade present an irresistible stimulus to the traffickers in men; but it will receive an additional and enormous stimulus should the proposed measure take effect. Under existing circumstances the slave-trade cannot be put down; under the additional incentive, it must be not only perpetuated, but increased. If more sugar is to be made in Cuba and Brazil, there must be more hands to make it; and these hands must be fetched by slavers from desolated and bleeding Africa. On the supposition that these countries will supply 50,000 tons of the assumed quantity of sugar, 50,000 new slaves at least must be obtained to prepare it for exportation; and to meet the wastes of mortality that will be occasioned by the severity of the system under which they are placed, a large additional number of Africans must be imported, to join that host of human beings who are every year torn from their native homes by the slave-traders, and compelled to surrender up their liberty to the tyrant task masters of Brazil and Cuba.

The proposed measures will, in the opinion of the undersigned, as certainly, and almost as directly increase the slave-trade, as if this country had given a premium for every kidnapped negro forced on board the slavers, and carried from Africa through the unutterable horrors of the middle passage, to interminable bondage.

It is unnecessary to dwell on the accumulated horrors of slavery and the slave-trade. They are too well known, and too sorely lamented by the friends of humanity to need specification. Yet it should be remembered that the slave populations of the Spanish colonies and Brazil, are innocent men, women, and children, who have been despoiled of their most precious rights, and subjected to the most atrocious discipline, to satiate, if it were possible, the spirit of Mammon. It should be recollected also that the murderous system of slavery prevalent in Cuba and Brazil, is preceded by one still more terrible in Africa and during the middle passage. It may be asserted that for every African slave landed in these countries, two perish in the original capture, and during the subsequent stages of the infernal traffic. And, further, it should be borne in mind that the greater portion of the slaves in Cuba and Brazil are entitled to freedom by virtue of the treaties of those countries with Great Britain, and are only debarred from the enjoyment of liberty by the disgraceful violation of solemn compact. But instead of demanding their liberty, a splendid bribe is about to be offered in order that commercial intercourse may be facilitated with people whose crimes against humanity merit the execration of all men, and cry aloud for the vengeance of Heaven.

But besides the increased sacrifice of human life, and the augmentation of crime and suffering which will, undoubtedly, be the fruits of this measure, the undersigned contemplate, with the deepest sorrow, its destructive effects upon all that is done, and is doing, for the civilization of Africa. The noble efforts which have been made, and are making, for the introduction of Christianity into that continent, will be paralyzed by the increased impetus given to the slave-trade. The enlightenment of men, and the spread of the gospel, cannot co-exist where the crimes of the slave-trade are perpetrated and fostered.

It is the chief glory of this country, that in the exercise of a high and noble policy, it has, through its legislature, declared the slave-trade to be piracy and felony, and the system of slavery to be inherently and essentially unjust. It has, moreover, sanctioned a vast outlay of the national treasure in the attempt to suppress the former, and for the abolition of the latter. To promote, then, their extension in foreign countries, either directly or indirectly, or to countenance such enormous crimes, or to seek to increase the revenue from sources so polluted, will be flagrantly inconsistent with its own solemn decisions embodied in acts of Parliament.

In 1840, a measure similar in principle to that under review was proposed to Parliament. Then the Government gave it a decided negative. The President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Labouchere,) said:—"No one could entertain a doubt, (in the event of the motion being carried,) that the great mass of foreign sugar imported into this country would be from the Brazils. In Brazils no sugar was produced, except by slave-labour. He felt it to be a painful duty to oppose the motion, but the question he had to ask himself was this, whether he would consent to give such a stimulus to slave-labour in the Brazils as would be produced by throwing open the market of this country to the reception of their sugar. He was not able to make up his mind, that this was a course which he ought to recommend to the house. He did not believe that it would be agreeable to their constituents, WHEN THEY UNDERSTOOD THE FACTS OF THE CASE." He would not be a party to a measure which, he added "would inundate the British market with sugar the produce of slave-labour." The introduction of slave-grown sugar, opposed by such reasons, was at that time successfully resisted by those who now propose to introduce it.

In seeking the exclusion of slave-grown sugars from the British market, the friends of the anti-slavery cause design to uphold no monopoly, to strengthen no class interests, to promote no sordid or selfish views, much less any party purpose; but their aim is to lessen the sum of human misery and degradation, and to advance the sacred cause of freedom throughout the world.

Thomas Clarkson,	Benjamin Seebohm,
Stephen Lushington,	Alfred Harris,
Edward N. Buxton,	John Crofts,
George Stephen,	Thomas Beaumont,
Samuel Guney,	Richard Peck,
George Stacey,	William Cross,
George W. Alexander,	Thomas Catchpool,
Joseph Cooper,	Samuel Carr,
John H. Hinton,	James Houghton,
John Scoble,	Henry Russell,

Jabez Huntington, D. D.,
Robert Montro,
Henry Steiry,
James Carile, D. D.,
Edmund Pace,
Jacob Post,
Gurney Barclay,
Samuel Gunney, jr.,
Samuel Sturge,
Lewis F. Bellot,
Josiah Forster,
Robert Forster,
Samuel Fox,
William Ball,
Joseph Sturge,
Richard T. Cadbury,
John Dunlop,
Edward Crickshank,
B. K. Greville,
Robert Jowitt,
Thomas Seales,
W. E. Forster,
Joseph J. Gunney,
William Forster,
Joseph Geldart,
Frederick Mackie,
Charles Horsnall,
William L. Crewdson,
Isaac Brailwaite,
Joseph Ferguson,
G. H. Head,
Joseph T. Price,
Samuel Bowly,
E. O. Tregelles,
John Budge,
R. Wardlaw, D. D.,
William Smeal,
John Murray,
W. T. Blair,
James Bartholomew, M. A.,
John Allen,
Edward P. Smith,

Samuel Capper,
Joseph Eaton,
Matthew Forster,
James Finlay,
William Beaumont,
George Richardson,
Henry Richardson,
Joseph Ogilvie,
F. A. Calder,
Maxn. Sanders,
Jas. Stanfield,
T. Cunningham,
Anthony Wigham,
David Macallan,
Alexr. Jesup,
Philip Thompson,
Henry Taylor,
John Beaumont,
John Brown,
Edward Palk,
Joseph Clark,
A. Mordaunt,
George Laishley,
James Clark,
John Rice,
F. Russell, A. M.,
James Thomas Davies,
William Sims,
C. S. Fanshawe, M. A.,
Joseph Hingstone,
Richard Luney, A. M.,
John Nicholson,
Wm. Spencer,
J. H. Johnston,
John Dymond,
William Lee,
Edward Hemming,
Thomas Hartley,
John Candler,
Edward Brewin,
John Woodwork,
Robert Alsop,

H. S. Rice.

SUGAR DUTIES.

The following letter is a reply to one from G. R. Porter, of the Board of Trade, which appeared in the Times of the 24th inst. [July.]—A. S. Reporter
To George R. Porter.

DEAR FRIEND,—I observe in the Times of yesterday a letter from thyself, addressed to me, in reference to a protest against the proposed measure of the present Government for the admission of the slave-grown sugars of Cuba and Brazil into the British market; and to which, in conjunction with a number of the friends of the anti-slavery cause, my name was attached. My regret that I am opposed in opinion to one with whom I so cordially unite on many great public questions, is lessened by the conviction that it will not disturb the cordiality of feeling which has long subsisted between us.

Though I do not admit the accuracy of thy conclusions with regard to the facts and reasoning on the protest, I will not now advert to them; as it is far more important, at the present moment, that the attention of the public should be confined to the question of the justice and sound policy of excluding slave-grown produce, than to the consistency or inconsistency of any of its advocates. And it is to this point I propose to confine my few remarks.

I affirm, to the fullest extent, the principles of free trade in all legitimate commerce; but it is universally admitted that stolen property cannot come under this description, and that both individuals and nations who recognize Christian equity as the basis of their conduct, must refuse to participate in the guilt of the thief by receiving or using the stolen property. Now, the great point at issue, as a question of principle, probably turns upon whether it can be proved that the known produce of slave-labour ought to be treated as stolen property. To come to a just conclusion upon this subject, it is necessary briefly to advert to the system by which tropical slave cultivation is carried on. The victims of this system it is well known, are innocent human beings, who have been torn from their native land in violation of every law, human and divine, or are the descendants of those who have been so torn, and that they are compelled to uncompensated toil by brutal coercion. If the victims of this system were English men and women, and especially if they were the wives, the sons, the daughters, the brothers, the sisters of our legislators, who had been kidnapped, and, after enduring the horrors of the middle passage, were toiling and bleeding on the sugar estates of Cuba and Brazil, we should not only have a unanimous vote in Parliament against taking into the consumption of England the produce of their labour, but vengeance would probably be taken not less fearful than that formerly inflicted upon Algiers, for holding a few Europeans in slavery. Now, those who affirm that Christian brotherhood is not confined to clime or colour, contend that a similar rule of action should be applied to the African race, as though the sufferers were our own countrymen or our own kindred.

The advocates of this position are told of the inconsistency of keeping out slave-grown sugar, while slave-grown cotton, coffee, &c., are admitted; they fully admit and lament this inconsistency, and were it in their power, would prevent it, but all they can at present do, is to exert themselves to support those who would check the extension of the appalling consequences resulting from the use of slave-grown produce, and they are sorry to see honest and enlightened men, with the awful facts before their eyes, of a free trade in cotton in the space of fifty years adding about 2,000,000 to the slave population of the United States, and fostering a great and most revolting internal slave-trade, and yet supporting a similar course with regard to sugar. The abolitionists, as a body, are not only no parties to the sanction of colonial monopoly, but many of them signed a protest against the grant of $20,000,000 to the slaveholders in 1833 from the national resources, as unjust to the people of this country, and also as giving a sanction to the unrighteous principle, that man could hold property in his fellow-man.

It has been asked if we would now stop the imports of American cotton and throw millions of our fellow-countrymen out of employment; but the question now before the public is, whether, with the fearful consequence of the trade in slave cotton before us, they are prepared to take the national guilt of pursuing the same course with respect to sugar.

It is assumed by a part of the public press, that the voice of the industrious unrepresented portion of the people of England is in favour of the admission of the slave-grown produce. From some knowledge of them, I can, with great confidence, express quite a different opinion, as far as the facts have been fairly brought before them. This has not as yet been generally done; but at a recent public meeting at Birmingham, which was numerously attended, the following resolutions were passed without a dissentient voice:—

"That this meeting, considering that to open the British markets to the importations of the sugar of Cuba and Brazil would strengthen and extend the atrocious system of slavery which prevails in those countries; aggravate, to a fearful degree, the sufferings of their slaves; and greatly stimulate the slave-trade; feel it to be their duty to offer every measure that would have that effect their most strenuous opposition."

"That nevertheless they feel it to be equally their duty to recommend to Parliament the propriety and necessity of opening the ports to the reception of sugars the bona fide produce of free labour, whether from the British colonies and territories abroad or from foreign countries on equal duties, so that they may come into full competition with each other, and advance the cause of human freedom throughout the world."

It is an unjust imputation upon our labouring population to suppose that they have not sufficient sympathy with those who are in misery and suffering to make them willing to submit to any reasonable sacrifice rather than be supplied with articles watered with the tears and stained with the blood of the slave. The sacrifice, however, is not necessary, for I need scarcely say that a slave-population are the least consumers of manufactures; and that if a small portion of the money spent in the fruitless and impolitic, and, as many hold, unchristian attempt to put down the slave-trade by armed cruisers, had been directed to the encouragement of the products of free labour in Africa, and if a fraction of the treasure which has been spent in the destruction of human life in India were applied in doing justice to her population, and encouraging the cultivation of her soil, and in the improvement of her means of communication, and if we placed the slaveholder, as he ought to be, on the same footing as the slave-trader in a moral and commercial point of view, by refusing to take the fruits of his guilty traffic, the day is not far distant when all the world would be cheaply supplied with the products of free labour, and slavery would sink for ever from its own inherent weight.

It is from a conviction, on deliberate consideration of the subject, that the principles of free trade are so trampled under foot by slavery, that the known consumption of its productions is a violation of the law of "doing unto others as we would that others should do unto us," and that our government, by the course they are adopting, are offering a bribe to the receiver of the stolen man at the same time that they send armed cruisers to treat those who steal him as a pirate; and that as the immediate effect of the admission of the sugars of Brazil and Cuba for consumption into Great Britain will be an enormous increase to the extent and horrors of the slave-trade and slavery, some of us have felt bound, uninfluenced by party or personal considerations, to use every legitimate means to oppose the proposed measure. We shall thus have the consolation of reflecting that if it be carried—which we fervently hope may not be the case—the crimes and miseries which result from it were evils we could not avert.

I am, with unabated esteem and respect,

Josiah Sturge.

London, 7th month 25th 1846

REDUCTION OF THE SUGAR DUTIES.

The blow has been struck. The House of Commons has decided, by a large majority, that the blood-stained sugars of Brazil and Cuba shall be admitted into the British markets. Had this great question been discussed on its merits, and in view of those appalling facts with which it is associated, we feel persuaded that the decision of the House would have been the reverse of that which we have occasion to lament. But it was not so decided. The interests of party have been allowed to predominate over the interests of humanity; and by a political manoeuvre, disgraceful alike to those who counselled, and to those who submitted to it, the resolutions of the Government have been carried. The slave-masters and slave-traders of Brazil have won a triumph in the British Legislature which will fill their hearts with joy, whilst the poor Africans who toil on their plantations, or suffer the extremity of human anguish in the holds of their slave-ships, will send fresh cries of woe to Heaven for the new miseries which will be inflicted on them, to meet, what are called, the necessities of commerce, and to add another half million of pounds sterling to Her Majesty's exchequer! Surely, it was enough that our commerce with foreign nations was already polluted with the guilt of slavery, without adding this new ingredient to deepen and blacken its character. We ought, in all conscience, to have made a stand here; and then earnestly and zealously have sought the means of supplying our markets with the free productions of free countries. And who, with a competent knowledge of the subject, would have denied the practicability of this being done?

By some, the proposed measure is designated as one of free trade. We utterly deny this. Let the principles of free trade be applied to it, and it will not bear the test. Free trade, as we understand it, is freedom of commerce with all nations, without restrictions or imposts, in all things honest and honourable. But the principle of this measure not only imposes duties varying from three-halfpence to twopence farthing per pound on sugar, but sanctions the principle of dealing in articles which bear the imprint, too legible to be mistaken, that these are the produce of SLAVERY AND FELONY. Yes, we affirm that the sugars of Cuba and Brazil are stolen goods—stolen under circumstances the most atrocious and revolting; and, however much it may be attempted to be softened down, every bale of cotton, every bag of coffee, every hogshead of tobacco, and every box of sugar imported from slave countries, is the produce of rapine and murder most foul and heart-rending.

Let any one who doubts this, examine the evidence which the system of slavery everywhere presents. Let them but cast their eyes over the statements drawn from recent official documents contained in the present number of the Reporter, and deny it if they can.

By others, it is affirmed, that the effect of the proposed measure will be the reverse of that which we contemplate. They gravely tell us that the letting in of the slave-produced sugars of Brazil and Cuba will annihilate both the slave-trade and slavery; that, so far from extending and stimulating these infamous crimes, it will so increase and stimulate the production of free industry, as to render the former unprofitable, and the triumph of the latter inevitable. They go upon the assumption that free labour is, under all circumstances, cheaper than slave-labour; and, on this assumption, for which they have no proofs, they support the policy recommended by the Government. We hold that free labour is cheaper than slave-labour, the conditions being equal; but beyond that, no abolitionist of any name has ever gone. That warm friends of the anti-slavery cause have adopted the view to which we have referred, sincerely and conscientiously, we have no doubt. Their views and ours are now to be tested, or, at least, when the duties on British colonial and foreign slave produce are fully equalized, will be tested; and the result will prove whether the freedom, civilization, and happiness of the African race is secured by the new measure; or whether that unhappy race is still doomed to be the victims of European and American avarice. In the meantime we would remind our friends, that every relaxation of duties on slave-produce has hitherto been followed by an increased demand for it, and a consequent increase in slavery and the slave-trade. The United States is a pregnant example of this fact. In 1790, the exports of cotton wool were 189,316 lbs., and the slave population, 657,582; in 1845, the exports exceeded 500,000,000 lbs., and the slaves had reached the fearful amount of 2,500,000. In 1790, it was seriously believed that the period of general emancipation was near—that slavery was not only criminal, but unprofitable; whilst, in 1845, it is clung to by the southern statesmen as a cherished institution, the chief corner-stone of the American republic, and a great source of wealth and power to them and their adherents. So far are they from feeling the force of the arguments adduced against slavery, that they scorn them, and laugh at the doctrine of moral suasion, whilst you make the system profitable to them. They pocket your gold, and with that are enabled to perpetuate the huge iniquity, and to extend its dominion over the newly-acquired province of Texas.

By others, it is stated, that our fiscal policy in relation to slave-grown sugars has not abolished slavery, nor suppressed the slave-trade; and that, such being the case, it were wiser and better to let Cuban and Brazilian sugars enter into the general consumption of the country than to continue their exclusion. We admit the fact, but cannot adopt the conclusion. Had our fiscal policy been one which should have embraced the entire exclusion of slave-produce, there can be little doubt that slavery would long since have tottered to its fall; but such has not been our policy. Nevertheless it is unquestionably true that the exclusion of slave-grown sugars has tended very greatly to weaken the system of slavery, by reducing its profits, and has so embarrassed the operations of Cuban and Brazilian commerce, that the parties interested therein, were willing to come to terms for the complete cessation of the slave-trade, and for the gradual, if not immediate, abolition of slavery itself. Mr. Consul Cowper, in a despatch addressed to Lord Aberdeen, four years ago, says, "In this sugar-growing province (Pernambuco), the policy of Her Majesty's Government is a matter of the utmost interest amongst the proprietors. I have taken considerable pains to inform myself of their feelings upon the subject, and I find all the most intelligent anticipating that Her Majesty's government are awaiting the negotiations for the renewal of the treaty, and will then demand from Brazil, as quid pro quo for the admission of her sugar, the specified mention of some time for the emancipation of her slaves. The proprietors not only seem prepared for, but satisfied with such an arrangement. I have mentioned this with the view of informing your lordship of the popular impressions on this deeply interesting subject." Last year Mr. Consul Newcomen, in a despatch to Lord Aberdeen, writes as follows:—"The subjecting of free-labour sugar to an unequal competition with that produced by slaves, is to be deprecated on many grounds. I have already stated, that the admission of Brazilian sugar to the English market at a low rate of duty, in the actual state of things, would indubitably give an impetus to the slave-trade." And he adds, "I know many of the best informed Brazilians entertain the opinion expressed on a late occasion in no very private manner, that the Imperial Government must, sooner or later, not only concede to England all she requires towards the full and effectual suppression of the slave-trade, but must also bind herself down to the final abolition of slavery throughout the empire at a future period; and that it would be much more politic to do so now, when she may hope for corresponding concessions from Great Britain, than to wait till driven by necessity into granting what she had refused to the dictates of humanity." The concessions have now been made without the quid pro quo; and the slave-masters and slave-trifflers of Cuba and Brazil will exult over the defeated exertions and hopes of British philanthropy, and add new bitterness to the sorrows of their oppressed slaves by telling them that, henceforth they are to be lacerated by the whip, and toil under the yoke, in order to produce sugar for the humane legislators and Christian people of Great Britain.—A. S. Reporter.

THE BRITISH WEST INDIES.

From the Annual Report of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, for 1846.

The duties which the committee have had to discharge towards the emancipated classes in the British West Indies, during the last year, have been highly important. They have been grieved to observe a decided tendency on the part of the principal colonial legislatures, to increase the stringency of the laws, and so to alter and modify them, as not only to bring the labouring population more and more under the power of the governing class, but to ensure the administration of the laws to themselves. To this the committee add, that a system of oppressive taxation has been resorted to, the proceeds of which are applied to the most exceptionable purposes. It would occupy too large a space in the report to specify the various laws which either have been enacted, or attempted to be enacted, of an objectionable character. The committee would remark, however, that they are intended to affect the relations between masters and servants, in the matter of contracts for labour, vagabondage and police; the constitution of inferior, civil and criminal courts, which are to be presided over by planter magistrates, with power to inflict heavy punishments for light offences, and from whose decision there is no appeal; the creation of appeal courts on the other hand, from the decisions of the stipendiary magistrates, whose removal from the important and independent position they occupy, is most earnestly desired; tariff ordinances and laws, by which the food, clothing, and various other articles in common use among the labourers are heavily taxed, whilst those required by their masters are subjected to comparatively light duties; and last ordinances for the purpose of raising large sums of money in this country, to be repaid, both principal and interest, out of the colonial taxes, which loans are to be applied to the introduction of large numbers of immigrants for the ostensible purpose of adding to the labouring population, but whose real object is to reduce the price of labour; and thus to inflict a double wrong on the more helpless and misrepresented portions of the population.

The facts connected with these various points have been laid before government, and not the committee trust, without producing some effect, though they wait to see when the papers shall be laid before Parliament, relating to them, to what extent the government have yielded to this species of legislation.

The committee cannot leave this part of their subject without expressing their satisfaction that a vigorous attempt is being made by the inhabitants of British Guiana and Trinidad to secure for themselves the benefits of a representative legislature. They heartily wish them success, and counsel them to persevere in their efforts until they shall have obtained it.

THE NON-SLAVERHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, NINTH MONTH 1. 1846.

WILLIAM ALLEN—The first volume of the life of this remarkable man is before us; presented through the medium of his diary and private correspondence, in such a form, as to awaken feelings very nearly resembling those of a personal interest in a living friend. We welcome it to our table as we would an honored guest, of whom we had heard something, but wished to know more: and we rise from its perusal with the words of the Queen of Sheba, "the half was not told me."

Whatever may be said of the practice of publishing to the world the diaries of individuals, who mark their own spiritual progress, and who would otherwise be unknown; of throwing off, as it were, the veil which conceals from mortal eye the soul's wrestlings before God; yet where a man has occupied a position in which he has exerted an influence upon the world at large, in religion, in morals, in science, or in letters, such an exposure is only its due. It is good to become acquainted with those whom we reverence, in their temptations and weaknesses. We can form a juster estimate of their strength, if we know something of what they have resisted and overcome. In the present instance, the instruction we have derived from the contemplation of William Allen's religious and moral elevation, has been greatly deepened, as we have counted the steps by which he reached it; and we are grateful to his surviving relatives and friends, who have generously surrendered, for a common good, what they might not unreasonably have kept as exclusively their own.

The character of this eminent Christian is one of interest and delight, from whatever point we review it; in its separate parts, and as an harmonious whole. Benevolence appears to have been its distinctive and prominent feature. Love to God,—and to mankind, shines conspicuously, running like a golden thread through the whole tissue of a long and useful life. We mark, in the boy, those strong and ardent natural affections, which, under the discipline of early sorrow and disappointment, were directed, we doubt not, by an All-wise and unseen hand, out of himself, to become in the man a broad flowing stream of philanthropy. In its onward course, it not only watered and enriched his own being, but left fertility and greenness on all the barren projects and waste places through which it was appointed to pass; until, as we reverently believe, it was finally lost in the ocean of illimitable Love.

His mind was of extraordinary capacity and vigour; and was early attracted to the investigation of scientific truth. The Editors of his "Life" give the following incident of his boyish perseverance in the attainment of means to pursue the study of astronomy.

"At the age of fourteen, he had himself constructed a telescope with which he could see the satellites of Jupiter. In describing the circumstance, he said, that 'not being strong in cash,' he was obliged to go economically to work; he accordingly purchased an eye-piece and object-glass, for which he paid one shilling; he then bought a sheet of pasteboard which cost two pence; and having made his tubes and adjusted his glasses, he found to his great delight that the moons were visible."

Natural Philosophy and Chemistry were also favourite pursuits; and the proficiency he attained, in the latter branch especially, introduced him to the notice of Sir Humphrey Davy, with whom he afterwards formed a close and intimate friendship. Wm. Allen is indeed best known to many as "the great Quaker Chemist." He does not appear to have been, like Davy or Dalton, a discoverer in science; but as an industrious and accurate investigator, his name stands conspicuous. He was long associated with these and other distinguished scientific men, privately, in the pursuit of philosophical knowledge, and publicly, in its dissemination, as one of the lecturers at Guy's Hospital, and in the Royal Institution.

The volume opens upon his boyhood; and from his eighteenth year down to the period of its close in 1819, we have a connected history of all his philanthropic labours. In this character he is so well known to the public, that perhaps our limited space will be best occupied in bringing before our readers such extracts as will indicate the spirit which pervaded his movements.

From his diary before he was eighteen:—Fifth month 6th.—It gives me great satisfaction to see so many of my countrymen warmly pressing the abolition of the Slave Trade, and I have great hopes that their endeavours will prove effectual. May the Lord Almighty, the God of Mercy, strengthen their hands, and open the eyes of men in power to see the true interest of this nation.

"First month 25th, 1790.—The affairs of the slave trade came before Parliament this day."

Following this notice, is an account of the speeches and debate, during a part of which W. A. was present, which our limits will not permit us to extract. He thus describes his feelings upon hearing afterwards that the measure was lost.

"* * * The intelligence struck me to the heart; I was seized with tremor all over, but endeavoured to conceal my emotion, and inquired after particulars." * * *

"Sixth month 27th, 1793.—Dear Samuel Emlen came to lodge at Plough Court last night. This evening, after supper, * * * he exhorted me to run with patience the race set before me, looking unto Jesus." * * *

"30th.—Yesterday, Samuel Emlen, in his kind solicitude for my best interests exhorted me to dare to do right!" * * *

After a year spent much in study:

"22d.—It was a remark of the deceased T. Finch, that 'when things were in their right places, best things would be uppermost.' Beware lest chemistry and natural philosophy usurp the highest seat in thy heart."

"25th.—Whatever knowledge thou mayst obtain, let it not excite any degree of self complacency or pride, but rather humbly rejoice that thou art favoured with an opportunity of being beneficial to mankind."

1798.—William Allen had been successfully engaged, with others, in the formation of a soup society, for the relief of the poor in Spitalfields and its neighbourhood. He records his great satisfaction in being on duty at the house, and in giving his time to the scheme.

"15th.—At the Soup Committee I hurt myself by being too tenacious of the form of the tin vessels; was partially relieved, by acknowledging my error, but it stuck by me all the evening—a sweet time in supplication before I went to bed."

There is much to be gained by observing the habits of mind of persons who accomplish a great deal.

W. A. says: "Occupy every spare minute for 'standing jobs,' not infringing upon the fixed time for certain things. Much time is lost in desultory indecision; when this comes on, catch up the first thing that comes to hand of those that must be done."

"First month 8th, 1803.—I took the chair at Guy's Hospital as President, for the first time, and was favoured to keep my place as a member of our Society. For this I felt thankful. What is the smile and the applause of the world, compared with one beam from thy countenance, O my God!"

"Third month 29th.—Made temporals give way to spirituals, in putting off my lecture this morning, on account of the Quarterly Meeting, and was glad I did, having a favoured time, and a stronger feeling of divine good, than for a long season."

In 1805, W. A. writes:—"To deny ourselves of gratifications which we believe to be inconsistent with the divine will concerning us, and to refrain from them, through love to our Heavenly Father, and a fear of offending Him, is the great work to which we are called; but which we shall be unable to accomplish without the assistance of his Holy Spirit: and this is to be earnestly and reverently sought for; herein consists the Christian's strength."

"Second month, 10th, 1807. The abominable slave trade is falling at last. The Bill, for its extermination, passed the second reading in the House of Lords on fifth day night, or rather sixth day morning. For it, one hundred; against it, thirty-six: majority, sixty-four! A glorious triumph!"

On sixth day night it was committed, and the blanks filled up with 1st of first month, 1808, but no more ships to be fitted out after fifth month next. O Lord! bless the supporters of this righteous cause!"

"Fifth month, 23rd.—Yearly meeting. The minutes of the meeting for sufferings were read, and a minute was made expressive of thankfulness to the Almighty for the abolition of the slave trade. The following is the substance of it:—

"We are inclined to express our thankfulness for an event which concerns not us only, but incalculable multitudes of our fellow creatures, our fellow possessors of the faculty of reason, our fellow objects of the redemption which comes by Christ,—we scarcely need name the abolition of the slave trade. We view it as one of the most important acts of public national righteousness, which ever dignified the councils of any government; and our minds have been directed in secret prayer to the Almighty Parent of the universe, that he may be pleased to regard this kingdom for good; and direct its future councils to such further acts of justice and mercy, as may promote his glory, in the harmony of his rational creation."

J. W. afterwards knelt down in supplication. A heavenly time, in which thanksgiving ascended from this large assembly as with the voice of one man."

In 1808, with Basil Montague, Frederic Smith, and others, he agreed to join a little Society formed to endeavour to diminish the number of capital punishments, and adds, "every thing, however small, which we do under a sense of duty, tends to nourish the spiritual life."

To a sentiment expressed in conversation that "departure from truth was not only warrantable, but our duty, in certain cases," W. A. replies in a letter as follows:

"The question is, not whether truth is lovely and of divine origin—not whether our lives should be regulated by it—not whether it be calculated to secure the happiness of mankind. On these points, I conceive there can be no question between us; but ask me whether it be allowable to depart from truth, to answer particular purposes, and I shall answer, no! He, who has declared himself the God of Truth, and that deceit and falsehood are his aversion, can never, in my opinion, have rendered the latter necessary in the intercourse of his creatures. His system, as revealed in the sacred writings, is complete without it, and as well might we attempt to reconcile light and darkness, as truth and its opposite. We find in the Bible, that one of the recommendations of the Lord's people was, they are 'children who will not lie,' and then follows, 'so he was their Saviour.' I am always alarmed when I see the symptoms of that false philosophy, (unhappily too much acted upon at the present time,) whose avowed maxim is, that 'the end justifies the means!' Think what would become of society, were it universally adopted, and it certainly is so, in a degree, wherever we set up our limited conceptions of what may be useful, as a sufficient warrant to depart from that line of rectitude, pointed out by Infinite Wisdom, for the government of his creatures. In this case, there would be no standard of right, and every man would be at liberty to adopt his own."

The nobleness of William Allen's mind is nowhere more conspicuously manifested than in his connection with Joseph Lancaster, and 'The British and Foreign School Society for the promotion and extension of the Lancasterian system of education.' The establishment of the society was the result, indeed, of Lancaster's incompetency to extend his operations upon the plan his own genius invented. W. A. became so thoroughly interested in the system, that, with his beloved friend and colleague, Joseph Fox, he laboured indefatigably for a long series of years to promote it, at home and abroad.

The following extract of a letter to — explains his position with J. Lancaster.

"I have no doubt thou art fully convinced that the cause of morality and virtue is always promoted by the diffusion of knowledge. But even in our highly favoured country, the well informed philanthropist must deplore the wretched ignorance of a very large proportion of its inhabitants. With these sentiments, I have directed my attention to the plans of Joseph Lancaster, and although I thought I had observed in his conduct some things which I could have wished otherwise, yet upon a close inspection, I am so fully convinced that his great outline is correct, and if properly filled up, is capable of producing incalculable good, and that his intentions were always honest and honourable, that it has excited in me no common interest in the subject.

In the first place it was obvious, that although the man has a peculiar talent for this work, he is deficient in some of those minute qualifications, which are nevertheless essential to the final success of any measure in which property is concerned. I saw that this was the chief bar to the attainment of the great objects embraced by his plan, and laboured to prevail upon him to commit all his financial concerns to persons acquainted with business, and upon whose honour and friendship he might depend, and by this means he would be more at leisure to bring his plans to perfection, and thereby convince the public more generally of their importance. In this, with the assistance of my friend Joseph Fox, I have happily succeeded."

"Sixth month 8th, 1812.—On occasions of public calamity, Friends' post must be the care of the poor and the relief of distress."

Our space will allow of one more extract; from p. 246—in a letter to Robert Owen.

"If a man will believe nothing which cannot be mathematically demonstrated to him,—nothing which is beyond the reach of his limited capacities and powers, he must remain in darkness, so long as it is impossible for finite to comprehend Infinite; and with respect to the operation of real religion in the world, I will take my own sect for an example, because none more strongly evince their belief in the divine origin of the Holy Scriptures, and the immediate communication of the Supreme Being with the soul of man, than we do; and what is the conduct of the inconsistent members of our Society? They hold it a duty to abstain from persecuting any man for a difference of opinion;—they hold, that as God is love, he wills the happiness of all his creatures, and that therefore it is their duty to love and do good to all mankind; hence they abstain from taking any part in war; they think that truth and sincerity are essentials of Christianity, and therefore, and because their Great Master has enjoined it, they abstain from oaths. Mark the whole lives of these men, influenced by the firmest belief in revelation, and then say whether the miseries of mankind are at all referable to such a source. I could give numerous instances of individuals, not members of our Religious Society, who have been guided by revelation, and who have been models of philanthropy and virtue. So much for the effects of that religion, which infidels hold in contempt, merely because they do not, and in their disposition they cannot, understand it. The lives of true Christians, whatever particular denomination they might bear, have always been uniformly the same;—they have been marked by love to God and good will to men; they have been assisted by a strength beyond that of their natural faculties, which, however exalted and improved, cannot, of themselves, produce steady and uniform virtue."

Perhaps no part of his life will be pondered with deeper interest than that which portrays the good man's walk with God. The tenderness of his conscience kept the avenue to his heart wide open, and we observe the consequent susceptibility to reproof, whether inwardly felt, or outwardly administered, which may be said to lie at the root of all religious progress. For this he was largely indebted to the unceasing care of his excellent mother, who watched over him when near, and followed him when absent, with the tenderest and most appropriate counsel. She perceived that he was entrusted with great gifts, and she feared for his spiritual growth, under even the legitimate use of them. She was jealous of the things which might cast a shadow between his soul and heavenly light. But the love of the faithful parent was blessed to the dutiful child; and we have rarely, in any book, met with passages of more touching interest, than those in which the Editors give us the picture of their intercourse and union. The deep pathos and heartfelt earnestness in the letters of the mother, are not more touching than the beautiful reverence with which the son leaned away from the world's offers of homage, to receive it.

Following him as a public lecturer, in the midst of admiring and applauding audiences; as a philanthropist, giving his wonderful energy of mind to the promotion of various plans for the relief of human suffering and the moral elevation of man; as a preacher of the Word, in courts and palaces; through all the temptations which might be supposed to wait upon the doing of great errands, we find him keeping the watch with his own heart; seeking, and obtaining, God's preservation in that humility, which

"Becometh all men—but the Christian most;
For he doth know how poor and bare he is,
Save as God clothes and feeds him."

At Petersburg, on a Gospel mission with Stephen Grellett, he writes thus: "We feel, as it were, shut up in prison here; seeing no way out. I think I have never felt so inwardly tried in all my life as since I came to this city. Yet we both feel in our right place, and I have since seen the necessity of these dispensations; for we have free entrance to persons in the highest station wherever we come, and it requires boldness to keep the vessel steady. Our course would be very unsafe for any to follow unless the Great Pilot were at the helm."

To Christians of every denomination the "Life of William Allen" will be welcome; and to the Society of Friends, invaluable. It will be a rich addition to its records of faithful laborers, of earlier and later times, whose course may be traced by their beautiful footprints upon the earth; and whose claim to be called followers of the Lord Jesus, rests, with that of the subject of this sketch, upon their imitation of His example, who went about doing good.

Leaving the cause, we must admit, that it has not given to the world its due proportion of burning and shining lights. In many places it has split up the noble principles of its founders into factions. The great truths which it was appointed to carry out, have not been promulgated in their breadth and fulness. Its testimonies have been borne, without reference to the doctrines which resulted from them; its usages have been adhered to, without an intelligent examination of the grounds upon which they were originally adopted; hence, it has halted and stumbled in its progress: one-sided views of Christian truth have produced their natural fruits in a partial and superficial apprehension of Christian duty. As the life of a Friend, then, who "kept the faith" as it was found and adopted by his fathers; who earned his acquaintance with it by self knowledge, and won his title to it by self denial; whose life was a testimony to its completeness, and whose death was as a seal to its sufficiency; the record of his course will be of permanent value and benefit.

We are aware that such gifts as William Allen are not bestowed upon all; that few indeed are called to move in such a conspicuous sphere of usefulness; but the faithful occupancy of his gifts and time, serves for a lesson of equal importance to the man of ten talents and to the man of one. He, whose comprehensive vision takes in the whole compass of human obligations and duties; and he whose observations are limited by a narrower capacity, may be alike instructed and invigorated by the record of a life, spent in obedience to this injunction, "Occupy till I come."

"Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime,
And, departing, leave behind us,
Footprints on the sands of time;

Footprints, that perhaps another,
Sailing o'er life's solemn main,
A forlorn and shipwrecked brother,
Seeing, shall take heart again."

ADMISSION OF SLAVE-GROWN SUGAR INTO GREAT BRITAIN.—In our last number, we announced a change in the British Ministry, and expressed our apprehensions that an attempt would be made by the new Premier, Lord John Russell, to abolish the high duties by which the slave-grown sugars of Cuba and Brazil have been excluded from the British market. We deeply regret that these apprehensions have not only been realized, but that the House of Commons has decided by a very large majority in favour of the admission of those sugars. The measure was not carried, however, without strong opposition, and, as the Editor of the Anti-Slavery Reporter remarks, "had this great question been discussed on its merits, and in view of those appalling facts with which it is associated, we feel persuaded that the decision of the House would have been the reverse of that which we have occasion to lament." It will be seen from the documents which we present to our readers, that many of the friends of the slave came forward nobly and earnestly to plead in his behalf, and we rejoice to recognize the names of a large number of the members of our religious Society amongst those who issued the "Protest against the proposed introduction of slave-grown sugars into the British market." For the present, however, the efforts in the cause of humanity have failed to secure for it the co-operation of government, and a selfish policy has triumphed. We turn, therefore, with intense interest and hopeful anticipations to the course which may now be pursued by the philanthropists of Great Britain. They have declared that the measure adopted by Government "will have the effect of strengthening the system of slavery, of stimulating the slave trade and of adding to the horrors of both;" that "it will, as certainly, and almost as directly increase the slave trade as if this country had given a premium for every kidnapped negro forced on board the slavers, and carried from Africa through the unutterable horrors of the middle passage, to interminable bondage;" that "besides the increased sacrifice of human life, and the augmentation of crime and suffering, which will, undoubtedly be the fruits of this measure, they contemplate with the deepest sorrow its destructive effects upon all that is done and is doing for the civilization of Africa;" and that the slaves who are "murdered by wholesale to make the quantity of sugar now exported from Cuba or Brazil will have to make more—that is, to-day they must be forced by the lash to a new excess of labour, at which they will be more wretched while they live, and under which they will more rapidly die."

In view of these deplorable consequences, we would most seriously press the question upon our friends in the British Isles—what is it that will alone give effect to the measure which they so justly deprecate? The answer is obvious—the consumption of the slave-grown sugars! They say truly that "when the labourer is free, every augmentation in the demand for the produce of his toil increases his means of subsistence and comfort; where the labourer is a slave, it as certainly diminishes them and destroys him." But this augmentation in the demand for slave-grown sugar, and the demand itself, are consequences, not of any governmental measure, but simply of the individual consumption of the article. If the act of the Government in permitting slave-grown sugar to be landed at London or Liverpool is wrong, because such sugar is stolen property, we know of no process by which its character can be afterwards so changed that the merchant, the grocer and the consumer may rightfully purchase it. How plain then is the path of duty which now opens to every consistent British abolitionist. It will not do to plead that they cannot distinguish between slave-grown and free-grown sugars. In every town and village and hamlet of England, they may readily make arrangements to procure sugars unstained by the blood of the slave. It is only needful that they should realize their own individual responsibility in the case, and arouse the people also, as did Clarkson and his conditors when labouring for the overthrow of the Anglo-African slave-trade. We say then to the British abolitionists, let pamphlets, such as that which Clarkson asserts occasioned the general abstinence from sugar in England in 1791 and 1792, be placed in every family of your kingdom—let all be made to feel that "the consumer is equally guilty with the planter;" proclaim in every ear that "so far as our means extend we are to combat evil, as if its extinction depended on our individual action;"—carry out thus your individual duties as Christians, and you will need no laws to prevent the introduction of slave-grown sugars over your threshold.

But while we urge the paramount importance of convincing the public of their moral and individual responsibility, we would also encourage renewed and persevering efforts for the exclusion of all "slave produce" by just laws. When the House of Commons in 1791 threw out the Bill for the abolition of the slave-trade by a vote very similar to that which now threatens its increase, the noble band who then laboured in this great cause, were not dismayed; but inculcating abstinence from West India products as a moral duty, so great was the effect upon the public mind that it was believed 300,000 people gave up the use of them previous to the next session of parliament, when a resolution passed the House of Commons that the slave-trade should cease in 1796. It is true the abolitionists of that day were disappointed in the results which they anticipated from the act for the abolition of the slave-trade; for they thought they saw in the measure the speedy extinction of slavery itself, and when after a long period of apathy, the champions of emancipation came forward, and, year after year, asked for the gradual abolition of slavery, they accomplished nothing. Public sympathy for the slave declined; the subject became tedious to the people; instead of advancing, the great cause of emancipation seemed to be retrograding, and the prospect was almost hopeless. At this crisis Elizabeth Heyrick issued her powerful appeal in favour of immediate emancipation, and illustrating the duty of abstaining from the use of the productions of slave labour. The leading abolitionists, both in Parliament and out of it, and a large portion of the people, were convinced not only of the national but of their individual responsibility in supporting slavery; they were thus aroused to renewed exertion, and slavery was abolished throughout the British dominions.

We think these instances, amongst many which might be cited, prove the necessity of enlightening the public mind, and convincing the judgment and interesting the feelings of the people, preparatory to the adoption by government of any great measure of reform—more particularly when their pecuniary interests seem likely to be affected.

Another crisis in the great work of emancipation has arrived, and if the same means which have heretofore been successful when only partially exerted, be now faithfully carried out, we cannot but anticipate a great and final triumph.

Congress.—The first session of the twentieth Congress was concluded on the 10th ultimo. Its history is characterized by the following important events:

The admission of Texas into this Union as a slaveholding state, under a Constitution which divests the legislature of any power to abolish slavery:

The commencement of a war with Mexico, in which will probably be sacrificed a great number of human lives from the two-fold causes of the battle field and disease—with the super-addition of a vast expense of treasure, and having for its great object to fortify the interests of Slavery:

The pacific settlement of the Oregon question on terms alike honorable to the United States and Great Britain, and greatly to the interest of humanity; and to which the ruling South gave a ready assent, though in doing so it had to recede from its pledge to its allies in the free West, when it asked their aid for the admission of Texas, that it would consent to receive at the hands of Great Britain nothing short of the whole of Oregon:

The reduction of the Tariff of 1842 to a revenue standard, making such a difference, and that instantly, in the value of manufactured goods, as will involve in great injury the industrial interests of the North, but leading as is supposed to a greatly increased foreign demand for the productions of slave labour. This measure, in whatever degree a gradual reduction of the Tariff to a revenue standard may find its justification in sound views of political economy, which we forbear now to examine, was accomplished in violation of pledges given by the executive officers of the nation, previous to their election, and is therefore denounced largely and severely, and we think with good reason, as an act of treachery towards the numerous persons at the North who voted for those officers, on the faith of those pledges.

The last day of the session was marked by a somewhat unexpected incident. Stung to the quick by the puerile futility of the South in several of the measures above adverted to—more we fear than from any inherent sense of right and justice, though we are ready to give much credit to this also—the spirit of freedom seems to have burst out into a vivid flame just as we supposed it had wholly expired. We relate the incident in the language of the New York "Tribune;" and from it the reader will gather full evidence, if he before doubted, that it is the settled purpose of the South in concluding our differences with Mexico, whether by negotiation or the sword, to extend the domains of slavery into regions now enjoying personal liberty. The virtue of the North may yet baffle this purpose.

The Tribune says:—"The bullying gasconade about Oregon, '54° 40'—the whole or none!'—our title, clear and unquestionable; &c., finally tapered off into the meekest of all possible dispositions and the dispute is finally settled, not very creditably nor advantageously for us, but still far better than to have it remain unsettled. We believe this is the only good thing of moment accomplished at Washington since last December, and this with every possible drawback on the mortification with which it would naturally have been regarded.

"No, there has been one other good thing effected at this Session—not designedly nor thoroughly, but yet a result of great and beneficial import. We allude to the arousing of a Northern sentiment—a FREE STATE feeling; among those who have cowered submissively to the slave-driver's lash for years, until it seemed that no degradation could be too much for them. But it is always darkest just before day, and a soul was at last created under the ribs of Death. The Tariff break-down touched the raw of Pennsylvania, New Jersey and a part of the Loco-Focos from our own State; the Mexican war, two Vetoes, etc., performed the like wholesome operation upon others. On the last night of the Session, Mr. Wilmot of Pa. (a Free Trader as well as Loco-Foco,) moved the following rider to Mr. Polk's Two Million Mexican Bribery bill:

"Provided, That, as an express and fundamental condition to the acquisition of any territory from the Republic of Mexico by the United States, by virtue of any Treaty which may be negotiated between them, and to the use by the Executive of the moneys herein appropriated, neither Slavery nor involuntary servitude shall ever exist in any part of said territory, except for crime, whereof the party shall first be duly convicted."

"This proposition would have been kicked under the table a few years ago, if any man could have evinced the hardihood implied in offering it; and it created an intense excitement even now. Mr. Dobbin of N. C., insisted that it was out of order, but the Chair decided against him. He appealed, and the Committee of the Whole sustained the Chair—93 to 37. Here Mr. Wick, of Indiana, the meanest of dough-faces, (who has declared in Congress the Mexicans must be enslaved if their country is annexed to ours,) moved to qualify by inserting 'all North of 36° 30' (the line of the Missouri Compromise) so as to leave all South of that line to Slavery. But this, which would have been carried even last winter, was voted down now—89 to 55. And Wilmot's amendment was then carried: eighty-three to sixty-four. This being in Committee, yeas and nays were not taken, but the character of the vote is sufficiently indicated below.

Every vote from this State (and nearly every one from the Free States) was recorded against the tolerance of Slavery in any territory which may hereafter be added to the Union, by any sort of acquisition. A few craven recreants dodged the vote, but that is nothing. For once, the North united and looked the spirit of eternal Slavery, which pretends to speak for the South, fully and fearlessly in the face. The old spirit which thrilled every freeman's heart in the days of the Missouri controversy was displayed. The result was a triumph, as it always would be if Northern Representatives would assert and maintain the right of Freedom to be at least as frank and zealous in our National Council as Slavery.

"The bill thus amended became a nuisance and a horror to its authors. Tibbatts of Ky., moved to lay it on the table. This was defeated by a fair vote of North against South—only Chipman, of Michigan, Craton, of R. I., (from hostility to the bill any how,) Douglass, of Ill., Fiskin, of do., Hoge, of do., McClelland, of do., Petit, of Indiana, Schenck, of Ohio, (like Craton,) Woodworth of this State, voting with the South, which went solid, of course. Even McKay, of N. C., who had reported the bill, voted to kill it. But the motion to lay it on the table was defeated, ninety-five to seventy-eight—and the bill engrossed and passed—97 to 54. Many Whigs voted for it who would have gone strongly against it but for the addition of Mr. Wilmot's rider aforesaid.

"The bill went to the Senate on Monday morning, and there died a natural death; Mr. Lewis of Ala., moving to strike out the anti-slavery provision, which Mr. Davis of Mass., rose to oppose, and spoke against till the Session was on the point of closing. He supposed the proviso would be stricken out if it came to a vote, but we understand that he was mistaken—that it would have been retained. No matter—the moral force of the vote of the House remains. It is a solemn declaration of the United North against the further extension of Slavery under the protection of our Flag. It will stand, too! Let us see what candidate for Congress from a Free State will venture to avow himself in favor of receding from the position thus taken!"

NEW HAMPSHIRE FREE.—The enactment of the following excellent law, by large majorities, in the Legislature of New Hampshire, may be regarded as a result of the remarkable revolution in the political parties of that State. Most of our readers are probably aware that this revolution arose from an attempt, by the democratic party, to expel John P. Hale from its ranks for voting in Congress against the annexation of Texas. So far was this attempt from being successful, that he has been elevated from the House of Representatives to the Senate.

A similar law was passed by the Legislature of Massachusetts a few years ago, and, if we mistake not, by Vermont and Rhode Island, also: the Supreme Court of the United States having decided that state officers are not obliged, unless compelled by state laws, to act under the law of Congress passed in 1793 relative to "fugitives from labour," and that the several states may prohibit their officers and citizens from aiding in the arrest or detention of such persons.

Let all the, so-called, free states do this, as they are in duty bound, and one of the links would be weakened in the chain which binds the slave. Pennsylvania has not only not passed such a law, but has repeatedly refused to repeal one which makes it obligatory on its officers to act, when called upon, under the law of Congress. Further than this, a law of Pennsylvania permits slaves to be brought into the state and held six months; thus, by simply changing the individuals, a person may hold slaves constantly in this state.

Has Pennsylvania "nothing to do with slavery?" and has she no duty to perform to relieve her citizens from the responsibility of actively upholding the unchristian system?

"In the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-six.

An Act for the further protection of Personal Liberty.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives, in General Court convened:

SECTION I. No judge of any court of record of this State, and no justice of the peace, shall take cognizance, or grant a certificate in cases that may arise under the third section of an act of Congress, passed January 12th, 1793, entitled, "An Act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters," to any person who may claim any other person as a fugitive slave within this State.

II. No sheriff, deputy sheriff, coroner, constable, jailor, or other officer of this State, or citizen thereof, not holding a commission from the government of the United States, shall arrest and detain, or aid in the arrest and detention of any person for the reason of his being claimed as, or suspected of, being a fugitive slave; or shall imprison or aid in the imprisonment of any such person in any prison, jail, or other building within the limits of this State.

III. If any of the aforesaid officers, or citizens of this State, shall offend against the foregoing provisions of the law, by in any way acting, directly or indirectly, under the provision of the third section of the aforesaid act of Congress; or by any way acting as the agent of any person thus claiming another as a fugitive slave, he shall forfeit a sum not more than one thousand, or less than five hundred dollars, to the use of the county where said offence may be committed; or shall be imprisoned in the county jail not more than twelve or less than six months, according to the discretion of the court."

DISCONNECTION FROM EVIL & GOSPEL DUTY. — A respected correspondent writes to us thus: — "The other day I bought half a barrel of molasses, which, for aught I know, may be the produce of Slavery. Since I began to write this letter, I have mixed several jug-fulls of switchel and carried them to the men and boys in the field. I would greatly prefer to use an article, the produce of free labour, and would be willing to pay more for it; but I would not compromise any part of the whole, pure, true gospel of Christ, our dear Saviour, for all the abolition and temperance causes that men can get up."

Our friend seems to regard a testimony against slavery and intemperance as distinct, if not antagonistic, to the gospel of Christ, and to think that a Christian may fulfil the "whole gospel" whilst he is consciously supporting a system which debars his fellow man from the pursuit of happiness in this life and in that which is to come, and annihilates the marriage and parental relation, and the right of conscience. He would seem to make the gospel a something too pure and sublimated to be applied to the every-day affairs of men — an error which we believe contributes largely to prevent the practical adoption of the principles of Christianity, and to prolong war, slavery, intemperance and a multitude of sins.

We advocate abstinence from the productions of slave labour as a duty connected with and resulting from obedience to the gospel of Christ, and not merely as an expedient or a means to abolish slavery.

We believe the spirit and the principles and direct commands of the gospel require us to withhold our support from a system which embraces within its horrible enclosure, every evil to which the heart of man is prone. Far more accordant, in our apprehension, would it be with pure Christianity, that the men and boys in the harvest field of our correspondent, should quench their thirst with water as it came from the hand of God, than that they should be supplied with molasses at the expense of the rights, the happiness, and the lives of their fellow men. King David, a man of blood, refused, when faint and weary, to partake of water brought to him by three of his mighty men, because it was done at the risk of their lives. Shall we, professing to live in obedience to the Holy Spirit, and in conformity to the precepts of the pure gospel of Christ our Saviour, enjoy the luxuries of life brought to us by the sufferings and the blood of millions of those for whom He died?

ADVERTISEMENTS.

MATHEMATICAL AND CLASSICAL SCHOOL FOR BOYS. — The undersigned proposes to open on the 1st of next month, at the N. E. corner of Sixth and Penna streets, opposite Washington Square, a Mathematical and Classical school for boys.

Being fully convinced that small schools possess many important advantages over larger seminaries, he intends so to limit the number of his scholars that he may give all the literary instruction himself, and at the same time bestow upon each pupil a large share of individual attention. He has had between 4 and 6 years' experience in teaching. PENMANSHIP and DRAWING will be taught by regular teachers of those branches.

Price of tuition in the common branches, $20 per term of five months; in the higher branches, including Latin and Greek, $35; Drawing $5 extra. Circulars containing further information may be had at the school, or of O. W. Taylor, No. 50 N. 4th street.

CHARLES J. ALLEN, Residence 140 Pine street, Philadelphia, 10th mo. 17th, 1846.
BUTCHERS — Knapp, Lewis, Dr. Samuel Jackson, Henry Empe, Samuel Alsop, Dr. Caspar Watson, John M. Whitall, Thomas C. Garrett, Dr. Joseph Thomas, Uriah Hunt, Isaac Cough, K. C. and J. Biddle, Karl Shum, John Richardson, Needles and Watson.

TEACHER WANTED. — A Friend residing near Philadelphia wishes to engage a young woman as Teacher for his family. Application may be made to George W. Taylor, No. 50 North Fourth street.

FREE LABOR STORE. — The subscriber having purchased the stock and fixtures of the store at the N. W. corner of Fifth and Cherry streets, of Lydia White, would respectfully inform his friends and those who prefer using the produce of free labor, that he will continue the business as hitherto, and hopes by attention thereto, to merit and receive a constant share of the patronage bestowed on the former occupant.
JOEL FISHER

PRINTED AT
Merrihew & Thompson's Book and Job Office,
No. 7 Carter's Alley.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

"Whoas gives the motive, makes his brother's sin his own."

VOL. I.]

PHILADELPHIA, FIRST MONTH, 1846.

[NO. 10.]

SELECTIONS.

THE SLAVE TRADE.

From the Annual Report of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, for 1846.

This execrable traffic still continues to desolate and degrade Africa. Its activity is unabated. Not all the efforts made by the British government, seconded by other powers, have affected to any considerable degree, if at all, this gigantic evil. The demand for slaves in Brazil and the Spanish colonies increases with the demand made by foreign countries for their productions. Such being the case, the slave-traders, who are usually men of wealth, offer the greatest inducements to the worst class of maritime adventurers to aid them to carry it on. The enormous profits they derive from a single successful voyage, compensates them for many failures. Besides which, the authorities of these countries either openly or covertly connive at their transactions; and the subordinates in office, receiving their accustomed fees, allow them to land their cargoes of human beings without molestation or hindrance of any kind.

From private sources of information the committee learn that there were brought before the Mixed Commission Courts at Sierra Leone in 1844, 27 slavers, nine of which were captured with 2,523 slaves on board. During the year 1845, the number of slavers condemned by these courts was 36, having on board upwards of 6,000 slaves, and there yet remained 6 which had been captured, for adjudication.

The committee further learn, that, from the beginning of April, 1844, to the middle of May, 1845, the squadron of cruisers stationed on the western coast of Africa captured 59 slavers, thirteen of which had on board upwards of 4,500 slaves. In tracing the history of these slavers, the committee find that one of them had been captured and condemned eight times, one seven times, two six times, three five times, seven four times, twelve three times, eleven twice, twenty-one once, and respecting one no particulars are given.

This striking fact shows clearly that the slave-dealers have agents residing at the seats of the Mixed Commission Courts, particularly Sierra Leone, who regularly purchase such of the slavers as cannot be destroyed under treaty; and as regularly send them forth to carry on anew the dreadful traffic. The committee deem it highly probable that many of these vessels are used as decoys to attract the attention of the British cruisers, while the real slavers, taking advantage of their being thus employed, run into the slave haunts, load their cargoes, and sail off to Cuba and Brazil.

The number of slaves imported into Cuba in 1843, the commissioners estimate at about 12,000, though they confess their inability to give an exact account from the mystery cast over all the transactions of the slave-dealers. In the years 1844 and 1845, the number of slaves imported must have been considerably greater, though the actual extent of the trade can never, for the reasons already given, be fully known.

In spite of treaties, in spite of cruisers, in spite of remonstrance upon remonstrance, the Spanish colonies have, during the last quarter of a century, been filled with African slaves; and fresh supplies of these unhappy beings are still poured in to meet fresh demands created by the mortality which decimates them, and the active demands of commerce.

And the case is even worse in relation to Brazil. In the report of her Majesty's commissioners stationed at Rio de Janeiro, on the state of the slave-trade for 1843, they say — "We have been assured that nearly 40,000 have been landed within these provinces in this period. This sudden augmentation during the past year is attributable to the continued encouragement and protection afforded by the Brazilian administration to all slavish adventures. The greater number of slave-ships which have affected the landing of their cargoes, have escaped our vigilant observations in consequence of the novel system recently followed by the slave-dealers, which has proved eminently prosperous."

The reports of the consular agents at Bahia and Pernambuco confirm those of Rio de Janeiro, as to the activity of the slave-trade. The consul at Bahia, writing to Lord Aberdeen, under date Sept. 30, 1844, says, "Your lordship will perceive that nearly 3,000 slaves have been landed in this vicinity during the last three months, besides others of whom accounts may not have reached the consulate." The perfect impunity with which the slave-trade is permitted to be carried on in every part of the empire of Brazil is so notorious, as to have convinced the British functionaries residing in that empire, of the utter uselessness of confiding in the good faith, humanity, or honour of its government. The Africans, introduced since the year 1830, form probably one-third of the whole slave population of the country.

The stimulus to this dreadful trade is its profit. What they are may be gathered from the following extract of a despatch addressed by the British minister residing at Rio to Lord Aberdeen, dated 18th May, 1844, viz: "It is my belief, my Lord, that this increased activity on the part of the pursuers of this nefarious trade will not be relaxed; that however decided the success that may wait on the new system resorted to by her majesty's government, these individuals will not be wanting on their part in exertions still greater, nor hesitate one moment more at incurring any description of risk. The safe return here of one venture alone, with a full cargo of slaves, out of six despatches to the coast, counterbalances all the loss suffered by capture of the remainder."

With respect to the eastern coast of Africa, it is clear from the reports of her majesty's commissioners at the Cape of Good Hope, that the slave-trade is carried on with great vigour. Slave barracks are found, both to the north and south of Quillemans, in each of which from 200 to 300 slaves are sometimes kept ready for shipment on the arrival of slaves from Brazil. The river Maense was, however, by the latest accounts, the principal point of embarkation. The Governor of Quillemans is reported to have received not less than 60,000 dollars in fourteen months in fees, for permission to ship slaves from the district under his jurisdiction. The commissioners further state that in a period of about ten months, eighteen vessels had been captured for being engaged in the slave-trade, and brought to the Cape of Good Hope for adjudication.

Every year's experience convinces the committee that it is in the abolition of slavery alone that any reasonable hope can be indulged of the extinction of the slave trade; and they would add, that it is their firm conviction, arising out of long and painful experience, that this enormous evil can never be overcome by means of an armed force. They would, therefore, hope that the energies both of the government and of the country may be henceforth directed to the universal extinction of slavery by those means which are of a purely moral and pacific character.

FREE LABOUR CULTURE.

From the same.

Whatever difference of opinion may exist among public men, on the expediency of discouraging the growth of tropical productions by slaves, by fiscal regulations in favour of free labour, there happily exists none as to the importance of encouraging the cultivation of those productions to the greatest extent, in British India and the British colonies. Statesmen, merchants, manufacturers, and philanthropists, are agreed in opinion on this point. At present one great branch of our national industry and commerce, is almost entirely dependent on the United States for the supply of the material required for its successful prosecution. Cotton wool is not only in great demand, but the demand is enlarging from year to year. Any sudden interruption of the requisite supplies would be felt as a great calamity, and hence all whose interests are bound up with our gigantic cotton manufactures, are anxious to draw them from quarters, where such interruption is not likely to occur. It is not on this ground however that abolitionists direct the attention of the public to the growth of cotton in India. To them it would be a matter of comparative indifference whence the supplies came, if they were produced by free-labour. One fact will show how greatly the demand for cotton-wool in this country has increased the extent of slaves in the United States. In 1790 the slave population of that country was 657,437; and the exports of cotton wool were 189,316 lbs.; in 1843, the number of slaves amounted to 2,847,819; and the exports of cotton wool were 1,081,916,136 lbs. The committee rejoice, however, to be enabled to state that the supply of slave-grown cotton has not kept pace with the demands of commerce. British India has interposed a check. In 1825 that country exported to this 39,657 bales; in 1844, 239,718 bales. During the five years ending 1841-2, the quantity of cotton-wool exported from British India to Great Britain was 330,619,830 lbs.; to China 452,725,315 lbs.; the average export to this country per annum, 66,125,966 lbs., and to China, 90,559,063 lbs. The effect of this has been to keep the price of cotton-wool down to a very low figure; and looking forward, as they confidently do, to the improvement of India cotton-wool from superior cultivation, clean picking and ginning, and superior packing, the committee feel persuaded, that the time is not distant when it will not only come into competition with the lower kinds of American cotton, but with the finer qualities also, and by its superior cheapness, drive it out of the market. The committee have given their close attention to this subject; and, in the course of the year, have laid before her majesty's government a summary of facts bearing upon it which they trust has not been without its influence. The committee are happy to add that the government of Bombay have caused the lands in that presidency, to be valued, with a view to a fixed instead of a fluctuating land-tax, much to the satisfaction of the cultivators and with advantage to itself; and the committee trust the same equitable principle will be applied to the whole of the presidencies. The committee believe they may also congratulate their friends that the government have determined to abandon the tax upon tools, agricultural implements, &c.; and, by relieving the labourer from these imposts, stimulate his industry, and tend to secure to him the fair reward of his toil.

In connection with these points, the committee may state that it is expected one of the great lines of railway now contemplated for India, will traverse the principal cotton districts, and by reducing the cost of transit from the interior to the coast, say, from £20 to £4 per ton, give the purchasers an additional advantage, and greatly promote the growth of cotton wool, a circumstance not less to be desired for the general interests of humanity, than for the benefits it will confer on the country at large.

The committee are pleased to be able to report that some of their friends have devoted their attention to the feasibility of promoting the use of articles manufactured exclusively from free-grown cotton. They most earnestly desire, that having begun this good work, they will vigorously prosecute it; and they have no doubt that Christian philanthropists generally, will aid them in their laudable enterprise. In the United States, a kindred effort was commenced several years since, and the committee are pleased to learn that it is attended with many tokens of success.

RESULTS OF EMANCIPATION.

From the same.

The committee are gratified in being able to report that, upon the whole, the progress of the emancipated classes in knowledge and character, and a just appreciation of their position as free men, is extremely cheering. That they are rapidly increasing in number is placed beyond doubt by the census of 1844, which, though extremely imperfect, shows a very remarkable increase of births over deaths. The habits of the women, both personal and domestic, have greatly improved. The purchase of small freeholds, the erection of houses, and the formation of villages and towns still goes on, though the means of the people are much less than formerly, owing to the reduction which has taken place in their wages, and the heavy taxation to which they are now subjected. This circumstance, the committee regret to say, has led to a considerable withdrawal of children from the schools, and, in other respects, has been found to operate injuriously.

The latest official reports from the colonies indicate a great decrease in crime, especially among the Creole or native population. The immigrants are chiefly chargeable with the violation of law, and the more heinous offences against person and property.

The committee have no reason to believe that any considerable portion of the emancipated classes have abandoned themselves to idle or dissolute habits. On the contrary, it is quite clear that they are industrious, and will work for moderate wages, when they are honorably used and their just rights respected. The following tabular statement of the exports of sugar from the British West Indies will prove this:

	Hhds.	Tierces.
1841 sugar exported	121,296	12,226
1842 " "	135,910	15,985
1843 " "	141,100	13,640
1844 " "	138,150	16,395
1845 " "	157,200	20,075

In reference to the exports of the colonies, it should be remembered as a gratifying fact, that the emancipated classes are now great consumers of the produce which they raise.

In reviewing the state of the British colonies, the committee have come to the conclusion that it is capital, not immigrants, which they want; and that with a resident proprietor, improved modes of cultivation, a fair system of taxation, just laws, and a pure administration of justice, so great an impetus would be given to the cultivation of tropical produce as to remove all fears of their future prosperity, and of their capability of supplying their fair share of sugar to meet the over-increasing demand in the British market.

It is a cheering circumstance, that whereas but a few years since the markets of the world were supplied almost exclusively with tropical produce wrong from the uncompensated toil of slaves; that now no inconsiderable portion of the demand is supplied by the labour of freemen. On the continent of Europe indigenous sugar produced from the beet root, enters largely into the general consumption; and in this country, all the sugar consumed, and a considerable quantity of other produce required for use or manufacture, is free from the taint of slavery. The quantity of free labour sugar imported into Great Britain during the last year was 5,069,878 cwt., of which 168,180 cwt. were the produce of foreign states: Molasses, 528,238 cwt.; Rum, 1,807,512 gallons; Coffee, 23,151,602 lbs.; Cocoa, 4,917,907 lbs.; Indigo, 90,388 cwt.

THE NON-SLAVERHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, TENTH MONTH 1, 1846.

THE BRITISH SUGAR DUTIES LAW.—We announced in our last number the passage of a bill in the House of Commons removing the distinction which had previously existed between the blood-stained sugars of Cuba and Brazil and the free sugars of other countries, by admitting all foreign sugars, however cultivated, at the same rate of duty. This bill was adopted in the House of Lords by a considerable majority, and on the 18th of 8th mo last received the sanction of the Crown, and thus is the law of the British realm. With our friends in Great Britain, we deeply deplore this event, and believe its effects on the general welfare of the human race will be most deplorable and revolting. The measure was met in its progress by repeated efforts to enlist the humanity of both houses of Parliament against its passage, but the fanaticism of free trade appears to have been resistless. We make extracts below from several of the speeches in the House of Lords on the occasion.

Lord STANLEY said: He listened with astonishment when he heard his noble friend deny that an increased demand in this country would have a tendency to stimulate slavery. Were they to be told that it afforded no stimulus to the slave-trade when they increased a demand which would call for an increased supply to be attained only by means of increased slave-labour, thereby increasing the value of slaves? They were going to add 45 per cent to the net profit of the slave-proprietors and importers in Brazil, and thereby they would increase the profit on every slave engaged in the cultivation of sugar. Although by the great stimulus of higher wages and greater encouragement of industry they might induce the free labourer to increase his exertions, yet no such motive could act on the mind of the slave labourer. By this system they would add to the punishment of the slave. The deficiency of 25,000 tons, which would follow this measure, in their supply from their own colonies, would have to be provided by 10,000 slaves from the coast of Africa. Were they prepared, with their eyes open, for the purpose of reducing temporarily and immediately the price of sugar by a small fraction, to incur a moral guilt and responsibility, and to involve themselves in all the consequences of a certain increase in the exportation of slaves to the amount of ten, or perhaps twenty, thousand, from the coast of Africa, for the purpose of increasing the produce of Cuba and Brazil? Great horrors, and loss of life, followed the pursuit of obtaining slaves from the coast of Africa. He agreed with the noble lord who expressed an opinion that, when they considered the loss of life that was consequent on the attempt to suppress the slave-trade, it was enough to make one hesitate in deciding whether their philanthropy had or had not been misdirected. He saw the other day an account of the slaughter of several slaves on the part of a slave-trader, in order to avoid the effects of the vigilance of their cruisers on the coast of Africa. They should not on the one hand, at the expense of the lives of many brave men, enter into an agreement with foreign nations, to suppress the slave-trade, while on the other hand they afford a stimulus to the avarice and the cupidity of the slave-trader. They should not adopt a measure which was justly characterized as a most extreme folly, and almost laid them open to the charge of being guilty of systematic hypocrisy. He was perfectly convinced of this, that if they were called upon to sacrifice one of two measures, the suppression of the slave-trade, by means of cruisers, on the coast of Africa, or the exclusion of slave-grown sugar for the same purpose, they ought, for the sake of humanity, to withdraw their cruisers from the coast of Africa. After having given £20,000,000 for the emancipation of slaves, they would, by passing this measure, put themselves up as a laughing-stock, and an object for the contempt and ridicule of the world. His noble friend said that he was ready, for the purpose of putting down the slave-trade, to make any sacrifice; but here he was called upon merely to make a sacrifice of a half-penny in the price of a pound of sugar. Did the noble earl opposite read the report made last year by Her Majesty's commissioners with respect to Havana? He said that it was not the cruisers on the coast of Africa that caused the decrease in the amount of slavery that existed there, but that it was the exclusion of slave-grown sugar from the British market that prevented the importation of slaves. That single check on the slave-trade was what the Government were now about to remove.

Lord DENMAN said he felt it his duty, to himself and to all with whom he had been connected in political life, to declare his direct and irreconcilable hostility to the principles upon which this bill was founded. Its immediate and necessary consequences would be—what had been stated in 1841 by the noble lord now at the head of the Government—to encourage and stimulate the trade in human beings. The very object of the measure was a sufficient proof of this; because, unless the number of slaves was very greatly increased, how could an increased production of sugar take place? No one could speak of slavery and the slave-trade with any degree of moderation, or any other feeling than the most perfect abhorrence of the principle and all its details; and, accordingly, the noble earl who had opened this debate with such great ability, and in so very lucid a manner, had found it necessary to express his abhorrence of it. But it was rather difficult to believe that those evils were so regarded by those who produced a bill the direct tendency of which was to increase them. It seemed impossible for the world to believe that those who now said, "I want cheap sugar at the expense of slave labour," were the natural descendants, politically speaking, of those who, at all events and all hazards, were determined to abolish the slave-trade. If there was not to be an immense increase in the number of slaves, he was at a loss to understand how the vast supply of sugar expected from this measure was to be produced. The great argument for the measure was derived from the inconsistency of dealing with different slave-grown commodities in a different manner. But if there was such inconsistency—if our policy was in one part good and in another bad—we are not, for the sake of consistency, to sacrifice the good and take the bad. Before this measure was introduced, the resources of the East Indies and the Mauritius should have been considered. When it was said that the principle of free trade was all-powerful and irresistible, was that principle to be applied to a traffic of bloodshed, piracy, and murder? He had thought it to be his duty to protest against this measure; and when their lordships heard of the advantage of settling this question, he maintained that a measure like this, founded upon an unjust principle, could not settle the question; and it would be a benefit to the country that it should not be settled. If we must submit to the domineering principle of free trade, he wanted to know why our own subjects should not be permitted to engage in the slave traffic. He believed that the people of England would willingly give up their share of any advantage they might derive from this measure, sooner than abandon the principles on which they had so long contended against slavery. He protested against this measure on the general principles which he had always supported. It was not by any means a settlement of the question—brought forward in so hasty a manner, at so late a period of the session, and founded on unjust principles; it could not be a settlement of the question; and it was to the advantage of the country in general that it should not be considered as a settlement of the question.

Lord ASSHURTON thought that they might do away with their colonies, if they passed this measure; for the withdrawal of all protection from the colonies would be letting all the other countries of the world, with their hostile commercial regulations, in upon them, and exposing the West Indies to competition with Cuba and the Brazils, where slavery existed in all its horrors. He feared that the slave-trade would revive in full force. It had abated in Cuba under the government of Gen. Valdez, a man who had conferred benefits on humanity, but since his time so many as 16,000 slaves annually had been imported into that island. Now, as the computation was that only one cargo in five reached its destination, 80,000 must have been embarked on the coast of Africa to supply this number. Were we, then, after all our expenditure of men and money, to encourage such a state of things? As to the argument that we already imported slave-cultivated produce, they were imported from slave states, but not from slave-importing countries. If the question were, whether we should import copper ores, for instance, from Cuba, he should give it his determined opposition. As to the importation of cotton it had existed for years, mighty interests had grown up under it, and, besides we were not called on to deal with it at this moment. We were called on to deal with slave-grown sugar, and he for one should not consent to its importation.

The Bishop of Oxford said he could assure their lordships it was not without a feeling of great diffidence that he addressed himself, even for a few moments, to support a cause which in his eyes, at least, had a character of peculiar sacredness. It was because he believed that the question was not a mere question of finance, but one most deeply and directly affecting the moral character of the country, her character for justice and integrity, as well as for humanity, that he felt compelled to obtrude upon their lordships that evening. But it was peculiarly painful to be opposed to the present Government on this particular question. He knew that they had been the friends of that cause in those days when it was not in favour, and that they were not its mere summer friends. He first knew the name of the noble marquis as one to be regarded with honour and admiration, from its connection with that cause, and he was aware that the second who bore the title of the noble earl who sat next him (Earl Grey) moved in 1807 for the total abolition of the slave-trade in the other House of Parliament. But he begged to say at once that he intended to convey no covert insinuation whatever that those noble lords who took another view of the question, were one whit less humane, or one whit less earnest to prevent the slave-trade and slavery than himself. The deficiency in the supply of sugar in the English market did not arise from the fact that we were not able to command the article, but that the whole production of sugar in the sugar-growing countries was comparatively small. It was stated by Sir James Hogg, in the other House of Parliament, that there was not produced a sufficient quantity of sugar to fill the sugar market as it was required to be filled; and he added that the only great article of consumption in which three months' supply was not left on hand at the end of every year was sugar. He (the Bishop of Oxford) therefore might assume that there must be an increased power of production in Cuba and Brazil to supply the increased demand which England was about to require. And how was that to be produced? Not by machinery, because that would imply an amount of civilization which was not compatible with the slave-trade, which had no connection with civilzation, but wrong its produce from the sinews of men. They could not bring in machinery to aid the blacks, but we must obtain from the manual labour of the Brazilian and Cuba slave a greater amount of sugar than we now get; and a greater quantity of sugar could not be obtained from the existing labour. The lash had done its utmost; already death trod hard upon the heel of those exertions by which the human frame of those unhappy men was already taxed. The Cuban slaves were being killed off at ten per cent. per annum; so that in ten years the whole stock was annihilated, and they were obliged to get a new importation from Africa to supply their places. It was, therefore, evident that the proposed measure, by causing an increased supply of sugar, must increase the slave-trade. The labour of one negro was equal to nineteen cwt. of sugar; so that for every additional nineteen cwt. of sugar which was produced over the present supply, their lordships, if they passed the bill, would directly and necessarily, knowingly and with their eyes open, cause the increase of one additional negro labourer. And it must be remembered that before they were made slaves, war and rapine must ensue in Africa; and they were, therefore, by the proposed measure, carrying back to that country all the cruelty and oppression which must be perpetrated before a slave could be bought on the coast of Africa, and subjected to the horrors of the middle passage, the waste of life on which, and in the subsequent seasoning, was dreadful. He repeated that the necessary effect of this measure must be to increase that greatest of crimes, the capturing of men by violence, and violently and cruelly transferring them from the condition of freemen to the condition of slaves. This argument was incontrovertible: no direct answer had been given to it; but it had been met by a series of objections; one of which was that the number of negroes imported into Brazil had not kept pace with the increased production of sugar. He denied the verity of the figures upon which this statement had been made by the noble earl (Earl Grey); they did not know either the quantity of sugar produced, or the number of slaves imported, and it could not set aside the fact that sugar could not be produced without labour; and if the quantity was increased, the labour must be increased also. A great deal of time took place in breaking up the virgin lands and fitting them for the production of sugar—six years at least—and provided in the year 1840 there had been a great importation of negroes, the effect would extend over the five years to which the noble earl had referred; and he found that in the year previous to that which the noble earl had referred, in the port of Rio alone no less than 30,000 slaves had been proved to have been landed. But there was another argument used—namely, that other articles produced by slave-labour were allowed to be introduced; and that we were receiving Carolina cotton whilst we would refuse Cuba sugar. He hoped the noble marquis would not charge him with hypocrisy, for he had been ready to encourage all the proper objects of free trade. But was it to be tolerated in a grave assembly of reasoning men that because they could not undo one evil, they must consent to do another; because they could not stop housebreaking, they must legalize murder; because it was impossible to prevent people from dealing in American cotton—which had been commenced before this country said it would have nothing to do with slavery and the slave-trade—was he to be told that because this could not be suppressed, he was a hypocrite if he would not allow another evil to be introduced? * * * * * And now he would say a few words as to the third objection—viz that it was necessary for the English people to have this increased supply of sugar. He denied, in the most emphatic terms, the truth of the principle, that the people of England had a right to have any man supplied by injustice, cruelty and rapine. They had a right, he would admit, that the law should be made as light as its burdens could be made, that the Government should facilitate the means of obtaining from all parts of the world everything which the people needed, provided it came in by the lawful channels of commerce; but they had no right to demand to be supplied with luxuries, or even with necessities, which were earned for them by the blood of those who, if Christianity was not a fable, were their very brothers. * * * He was convinced that her Majesty's Government, if they believed as he did, that the passing of this bill was a direct sanction of the slave-trade, would not have proposed it. That sanction, however, was given directly, though ignorantly on their part, because they were going to import in great abundance the produce of slave labour. They were giving up all their principles. This was a fearful step they were called upon to take, and he could only say, in conclusion, that he had the firmest conviction that if they took that step they would take a step more adverse to the opinions, the principles, and the convictions of the mass of the people of England than any step that they had ever taken within his memory. He believed that the history of their whole lives would prove that it was the simple announcement of the great truth that this traffic was contrary to the law of God that enlisted the sympathy of the people of England; and that the battle was won by the Christian principles and the Christian energy of the people of England. It was said that their energy had since failed in its object; he would answer that that was a political and a sectional, rather than a Christian argument. He would ask them to pause before they rushed into that great crime, which the indignant voices of their ancestors, and of some still alive, abolished when they found it existing. In this respect the question differed; for when the former battle was fought it was fought at a disadvantage, for those who fought it did so to put down an existing evil. They were now called upon to take a direct step in the opposite direction. He first called it an act of retrogression. They were now called upon, for the first time, to pledge themselves on opposite principles, to renew what, on conviction, they abolished, and to encourage injustice by leaving it in the power of others to perpetrate the most cruel injustice. * * * * * It appeared to him that they were taking a step in the wrong direction. They were now called upon to retrace their steps in that course, in which they were making a tardy compensation for a long course of crime committed by their ancestors. It was pretty clear that, if they were to have a large increase in the importation to this country of slave-grown sugar, a larger number of slaves must be employed to cultivate it. They must recollect that they were by no means to judge of the number of slaves that were taken from the coast of Africa by the number that were imported into the slave-growing countries; for every slave that arrived safe two died on the passage. If they were to have an increase of 30,000 or 40,000 cwt. of slave-grown sugar, it was evident that it should be produced by the labour of 30,000 or 40,000 slaves. When those 30,000 or 40,000 were imported into the slave-growing countries, not only was the liberty of that number taken away, but they should recollect that for the purpose of obtaining that amount, some 60,000 or 80,000 were landed into eternity by the most cruel torments. He felt firmly convinced that the increase of their supply would be bought at too great a price, if it were only at the cost of the liberty of ten men. There were no temporal, secular, or canonical benefits which could be said to be cheaply purchased at the expense of one crime. He for one would decidedly acquiesce in opposing a measure which would fix a stain on the escutcheon of this country, which he doubted whether the legislation of future years could ever effectually remove. He had some hope of having this measure postponed, in order that it may receive the full consideration which the great moral and religious principles which it involved loudly called for. He looked upon this question as one altogether distinct from political economy, and as one widely apart from the question of protection, except so far as that protection went which they were bound to afford to those unhappy beings who were now, after enjoying for some years the advantages of protection, to be handed over to the cruelty of those who would now be made more interested in this abominable traffic."

Amid the great discouragement we feel from the undeniable fact that Great Britain has now made an important retrogression in her policy regarding slavery and the slave-trade, to be followed, we fear, by other relaxations in it, we are cheered by the belief that it will lead our brethren in Great Britain to renewed exertions on behalf of the slave, and to the adoption personally, where they have not already done it, of that policy which they have in vain asked of the nation to maintain. Those efforts and that example may yet enable them to recover their lost ground.

THE EXISTENCE OF SLAVERY DEPENDENT ON A COMMERCE IN ITS PRODUCTIONS.—Other important subjects have precluded our earlier notice of a criticism on "The Non-Slaverholder" which appeared a few weeks since in a contemporary journal devoted to the abolition of slavery by exclusively moral instrumentalities. The article bears the aspect of an editorial, and, for that reason especially, the error of its suggestions ought to be corrected.—The writer, commencing where he thinks he may, objects much to our supposed subservience to, and undue exaltation of one division of the great anti-slavery movement—the disuse of slave produce—and accuses us of entertaining but "a fragment" of the "one idea" charged upon abolitionists, when we over-rate, as he judges we do, the duty of abstinence, and its efficacy as an agent in effecting the overthrow of Slavery. He proceeds to some extent in an effort to show that were the use of the products of slave-labour to be discontinued by all but slaveholders, still, under the mere influence of the vulgar and despicable pride which disdains labour, of sensual lust, and of love of uncontrolled dominion, slavery, though financially unprofitable, would continue to exist to the extent at least of retaining a moiety of its present subjects.

In appearing before the public as the humble advocates of the outraged and down-trodden slave, we felt that our mission was prominently to proclaim the doctrine that abstinence from any participation in the fruits of the wrong done to the bondman was an appropriate, and even necessary preparative to the full demonstration of that moral power which we desired to see wielded against slavery; at the same time we held ourselves ready to promote by all means, which were just and pacific, the overthrow of that evil. Thus far our practice has been accordant with these views; and if there is to be attributed to us any offence, we believe it must consist in this, that we have expanded the "one idea" beyond the capability or convenience of others to receive it; not that we have derogated from it in any particular. We have asked abolitionists to do, what they and we have asked slaveholders to do—RELINQUISH YOUR CONNEXION WITH THE WRONG.

Can any one doubt that a renunciation of the profits and comforts which two hundred and fifty thousand American Abolitionists now contentedly derive from slavery, would do more to seal on the minds of slaveholders a conviction of the real iniquity of the system, and prepare them for a voluntary surrender of their proportion of its emoluments, than all the arguments showing its abstract wrongfulness which could be presented to them, unaccompanied by the evidence that they proceeded from honest hearts, seeking to be clear of the wrong, and disdaining to derive advantage from it?

The South demands at our hands the testimony which only can be afforded by a life of practical conformity with our high pretensions to Justice and Humanity, that we are sincere in our abhor-rence of Slavery. Till then we may not expect her to surrender, at our persuasion, her millions of vassals, and hundreds of millions of dollars which she claims to hold in them. Pharaoh-like, when she receives from us this proof, she may refuse to give liberty to her bondmen; but on her, and her allies, not on us, will in that case be the burden of her injustice.

If Slavery, as our reviewer supposes, would continue to one-half its present extent, or if it would continue to its whole extent as others might assert, notwithstanding the withdrawal from it of all external patronage, still the obligation of each and all to make this withdrawal, in order to show their moral dissent from the wrong it practices, would not be the less clear. We admit that the duty would receive a further confirmation if the truth of the assertion at the head of this article were shown. We proceed to show it; and, in doing so, to demonstrate the error into which our commentator has fallen.

It is more than three centuries since the first importation into America of slaves from the African Continent. During most of this period unlimited authority has been conceded to the Slave power to do what it pleased in order to make its system availing and permanent. We may then conclude that in all this time its capabilities and disabilities have been fully developed. We present the following facts as the result of this development.

1. Slave labour, with the restrictions on intellect, skill and enterprise which the protection of the slave system necessarily imposes, cannot be used in the mechanic arts or applied to the manufacture of goods to an extent commensurate with the wants of a community, or, in any extent, as cheaply as free labour can be used and applied in free States to the production of the same articles.

2. Free labour, from the unalterable fact that in Slave communities all manual industry is held to be servile and ignominious, is only to be obtained in such communities at a cost which it is supposed will compensate for the degradation suffered, as well as for the labour performed. Thus free labour, as well as slave labour exerted in any of the arts, in a slave State, is a dear power.

3. Slave holding communities are not, and, from the facts shown, cannot be manufacturing communities, but must rely on importation for the supply of most of their wants dependent on artificial production.

4. In the branches of agriculture now common to free and slave labour, free labour, with wages, is more productive of profit than slave labour without wages; but where slaves are not grossly overworked their natural increase forms a new increment of profit which compensates in some measure for the deficiency in the avails of their labour. It is the slave market, then, which the demand for slaves, where their labour is more productive, creates, which continues slavery in States pursuing the branches of culture adverted to.

5. Slavery in the household is less economical than compensated help, where the latter can be obtained, and has other comparative disadvantages. Nothing retains it in the kitchen but the repulsion of free labour which the out door existence of slavery occasions, and the fact that slaves are a merchantable commodity, and the kitchen a convenient nursery of those articles of commerce.

6. The love of power, including the several motives for its exercise which our reviewer describes, however it may influence men to cling to slavery while yielding even an inferior emolument, cannot induce them to forego wholly the consideration of profit. The wealth must be endless, or its possessors fatigued, that would allow the continuous indulgence of such a feeling. With the mass of slaveholders, profit must form an indispensable consideration.

7. Slavery finds its great strength and essential vitality to consist in furnishing to the world productions which free industry cannot, or does not supply—not in competing with the skill, intelligence and assiduity of voluntary labour in its ordinary application. In this view it has seized on large domains fitted by a prolific soil and congenial climate to the culture of a few agricultural productions, in general demand; chiefly rice, tobacco, cotton and sugar. With the results of this cultivation it unites in a minor degree the products of the forests, mines and other natural advantages found within its limits, and seeks a market for nearly the whole quantity in foreign parts. It does not await the slow progress of population for obtaining its supply of labourers, but looks abroad for adult cultivators; whence results a vigorous inter-state and foreign slave trade. It cannot manufacture its own goods. It does not even stop to cultivate many of its articles of food. Its goods and much of its aliment are supplied by importation. Thus there is written on the system the fact of its dependence on commerce.

It is evident from what has been above shown, that slavery, but for the slave trade, would quickly disappear from portions of the country under the dominion of the slave power in which the branches of agriculture are common to free and slave labour. On the disappearance of the export trade in the productions of slavery, the slave trade, and thus the slavery it locally sustains, would disappear. Let us see what would be the effect of a discontinuance of this export upon the great residue of slavery.

The exports from Brazil in productions of slavery are rated at sixty millions of dollars; of the Spanish Islands in the West Indies at fourteen millions; of the French Islands at nine millions. Of the other slave Islands and of the European slave possessions on the contiguous continent, we are without information. The exports from the United States to foreign countries in such productions in 1840, were seventy-five millions, and the consumption of the free states estimated at fifty millions more. In round numbers we may safely state the export production of six millions of slaves at the annual sum of two hundred millions of dollars, or thirty-three and one-third dollars for each man, woman and child held in American bondage. Most of these exports are returned to the countries whence they emanate, in commodities indispensable to the comfortable well-being of those countries, embracing almost all species of manufactures and a large amount of provisions and bread stuffs.

Recurring to the facts which the long experiment of slavery has furnished, we perceive it impossible that the amount of labour now issuing in those exports could be so diverted into home channels as advantageously to absorb that labour and supply the wants of slaveholding communities. True, a portion of the labour would have to be directed to the cultivation of agricultural products previously furnished by foreign nations. But to what could the remainder be applied? We have shown that it could not be to manufactures and the mechanic arts with such benefit to the masters as would make a continuance of the slaves in bondage desirable. Under these circumstances a general emancipation appears to us to be an inevitable consequence. That effected, there would be a return of the foreign trade, in productions no longer wrung from wretched slaves, but cheerfully proffered by contented remunerated freemen.

It is not necessary for us to determine the question whether the world would have virtue enough to reject the advantage it now derives from its great existing commerce in the productions of slavery, or discernment enough to perceive the still greater advantages which would ensue to it from a temporary suspension of its commercial interchanges with slave communities. It is sufficient for us to show, that with that suspension the downfall of slavery is certain.

In ascertaining what is the aggregate action proper to the removal of a moral evil we discern also what is the required individual duty. Faithful to it ourselves, the wrong will be at least corrected in the lesser world which we govern, and from it will proceed a sphere of influence which will operate on the greater, and in process of time may wholly remove the evil from it also—Our obedience or disobedience may promote or retard the coming of that day when "the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea."

FREE PRODUCE ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDS OF OHIO YEARLY MEETING.—We are glad to learn that a few Friends have associated under this title, and propose to issue an address to their fellow members inviting them to attend a meeting to be held in Mount Pleasant.

Friends in Ohio are annually required to answer whether they maintain a testimony against slavery. At their recent Yearly Meeting the answers to this query were very full—there was no exception or doubt of the testimony being faithfully maintained. We will not call in question the honesty of these answers, because we are not able to say how closely Friends in Ohio scrutinize their own conduct and practice, nor what they consider as constituting a testimony against slavery. This testimony cannot be simply refusing to hold slaves, nor can it mean a mere testifying in words against slavery to those who are engaged in holding slaves. In this case, as in many others, "acts speak louder than words," and "example is stronger than precept."

Does he who purchases goods of a smuggler bear a testimony against contraband trade? Can the purchaser of stolen goods say he maintains a testimony against robbery? Is a testimony against murder upheld by the hire of an assassin? Can he be said to bear a testimony against war who contributes to its support and participates in its plunder? Slavery is not only closely allied with war, but is itself a perpetual war; it depends, in several countries, for its existence on a contraband and piratical trade,—the African slave-trade; it is a system of murder, which, if universal, would in a few years depopulate the earth; it is robbery in its worst form—not only seizing forcibly upon the fruits of a man's labour, but robbing him of himself, his wife, his children! Are we maintaining a testimony against this hydra-headed monster—this combination of crimes—when we participate in its avails, and contribute the support which alone sustains it?

We have had an opportunity of knowing, that many Friends in Ohio Yearly Meeting are seriously turning their attention to the duty of avoiding the use of the products of slave labour, as an essential part of the testimony which they are called upon to bear against slavery. We trust the effort which has been commenced will be encouraged, and the necessary measures be adopted to obtain, in every section of the country, a supply of free products. Let merchants in the various towns and villages be induced to keep articles of this description in their stores. Cotton goods of various kinds may be procured of the Agents of the Free Produce Association of Friends, and the American Free Produce Association. Coffee, sugar, rice, molasses and many other articles produced by free labour, are always to be had at Joel Fisher's, N. W. corner of Fifth and Cherry streets.

THE ACQUISITION OF NEW TERRITORY, AND EXTENSION OF SLAVERY.—The constant, persevering, and successful efforts of the Slave Power to control the operations of the Federal Government, and to acquire new territory, with the intention and hope of perpetuating its sway, are at length arousing the people of the Free States from their lethargy. The triumph of Anti-Slavery sentiment in New Hampshire, to which we alluded in our last number, has been followed by indications of a similar change occurring, at no distant period, in Maine. We give below, a few extracts from various political Journals—both Whig and Democratic—which exhibit a growing determination to stop the encroachments of the slaveholders.

The Philadelphia Public Ledger, says:—

"One of the journals, in some speculations about the acquisition of new territory, as the probable result of the present war with Mexico, strives to show that the extension of slavery to any new territory would be a public benefit. It says that a difference of opinion prevails about the policy of acquiring new territory; that one party regards the acquisition of Southern territory as directly giving a preponderance to the slave States; that the other party regard such acquisition as important to the whole Union, all parts of which are bound by a community of interest. It then proceeds to say that the annexation of Mexico would extinguish a slavery more galling than any existing in the United States; and that the addition of slave territory will tend to abolish slavery in the old States. It then makes some remarks about the process of renovation now active in Virginia, in the influx of free labour upon its lands once exhausted by slave cultivation.

"All these speculations are based upon the hypothesis, that, whatever new territory is acquired, will be open to slavery of course. We understand all this. The journal in question is the organ of a clique of Southern politicians, mostly of South Carolina, with a 'sprinkling' from other slave States. Their grand object is the perpetuation and extension of slavery as an element of political power; and the organ in question is probably well paid for disseminating their doctrines, one of which is that slavery must extend over all new territory South of latitude 36°. We must protest against any of these assumptions, and call upon all the free States, and all that portion of the slave States not wedded to slavery as an instrument of aristocracy at home, and of undue power in the Federal government, to wake up, and by a single united effort, to defeat forever this locally and personally ambitious design.

"We protest against the doctrine, that, slavery extends, of course, over new Southern Territory. All new acquisitions to the South must be made from Mexico, from all of whose territory slavery is now excluded. Hence if California and New Mexico be ceded to the Union, they will become free States, if left as they are, in relation to this institution. But if ceded to us without any provision against it, they would not be left as they are. Emigrants from the Southern States would immediately settle in them with their slaves; and once introduced, this institution could not be eradicated by legislation. It would cover the whole territory and remain there till destroyed, as in some of the old States, by its own inherent vices. Therefore an act of Congress, excluding slavery from new territory, is necessary. Here the free States should move together as one, and exhibit no wavering or flinching. Pennsylvania has a vital interest in this great question, and has the power of preventing the extension of slavery. Let that power be exerted now; and this 'perpetual disturbance' will be disarmed of its terrors; and will soon begin to sink under the natural laws that are digging its grave. The obvious policy of the Union is the extension of the confederacy over the whole continent. But to render that extension a blessing instead of a curse, it must proceed without the incubation of slavery. Pennsylvania is under deep and heavy responsibilities in this question, and we call upon her to do her duty."

The Sandusky Mirror, (Ohio,) quoting the Ohio Statesman, says:—

"California is now free; shall it remain so if acquired? One would think it was an act of such impudent presumption to raise the question, that even the brazen-faced South would not think of doing so. It argues that it would be just as reasonable to propose extending slavery over Ohio, Iowa, or Wisconsin, as over California. 'Besides, where do you find power in the constitution to authorize the Federal Government to extend slavery over free territory? The South tell us that by that instrument we cannot interfere to abolish it. We grant it; and it is equally true that you cannot interfere to create it.' 'The excuse,' it continues, 'for the continuance of slavery' in Louisiana, Florida and Texas, 'was that it already existed there; but shall we now acquire free territory, and turn it into a land of slavery?'"

The Lafayette Courier (Indiana,) has the following remarks:—

"And in addition to all this—it were folly to attempt to disguise the fact—there is a sentiment of freedom—an anti-slavery sentiment if you please—aroused in the free States by recent and yet transpiring events, which nothing can quench or smother. Call it infatuation—fanaticism—or what you will; you cannot change the fact. It exists: and whether right or wrong, politic or impolitic, its influence will be both seen and felt. That sentiment will prevent great numbers of conscientious and well-meaning men, who have heretofore acted and voted with the Whig party, and who would gladly continue to do so, from ever again voting for a slaveholder for President. We repeat, characterize this sentiment as you will, it is a fixed fact, which it were madness to overlook."

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, a Democratic Journal in Ohio, contains the following:—

"The Democracy of Hamilton county, at their late Convention, passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the West will seal an amnesty on the Oregon question, only on condition that the ordinance of 1787, the broad foundation of the Northwest, shall be extended over our Pacific Empire, present and future."

"To this complexion we are coming at last. Let the Democracy of the North show an undivided front, and stand boldly and firmly upon this ground, and in them the cause of freedom has a most glorious triumph. We rejoice to see how universal has been the expression of the Democratic press in the North, in respect to Mr. Wilmot's amendment upon the defeated two million peace bill. Now let the Democratic masses, in their Conventions, speak out in the same tone, and the work is done."

The Whigs, at a Convention in Cleveland, declared these sentiments:—

"Resolved, That all men are born equally free and independent and have certain natural, inherent and inalienable rights, amongst which are the enjoying and defending life and liberty, acquiring, possessing and protecting property, and pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety.

"Resolved, That as morality and knowledge are essentially necessary to good government, we believe it to be the duty of the Legislature to provide schools and the means of instruction for the education of all children, without regard to creeds or colour.

"Resolved, That we are in favour of the immediate and unconditional repeal of the unjust and oppressive 'Black Laws' of this State, and we will not support any men for Representatives to the State Legislature who are not in favour of this resolution, and who will not make the repeal of these odious laws a prominent topic of legislation.

"Resolved, That as citizens of the United States, we do most solemnly protest against the accursed system of human slavery, as being wrong and only wrong, as being fraught with evil and only evil, in all its influences upon society and upon the nation."

At Medina, Ohio, the Whigs adopted the following resolutions:—

"Resolved, Therefore, that we distinctly announce to the country our uncompromising opposition to the further extension and longer existence of American Slavery; and that we hereby deliberately declare our unalterable purpose to use every lawful and constitutional means for its overthrow and entire extinction; and we hereby pledge our cordial co-operation with the friends of civil liberty throughout the Union, in every just and practicable measure, that shall tend to free our country from the domination, curse and shame of slavery, and make her great and glorious among the nations of the world.

"Resolved, That inasmuch as the policy of slaveholders is and has been to control this government in such a manner that all its legislation should tend to foster and protect slave labour at the expense of free labour, we therefore believe that the time has arrived for freemen to declare, that their public servants shall be free from the contaminating touch of slavery."

In referring to the course pursued by Southern politicians, the (Boston) Christian Register, says:

"If however, they still persist, as they have for a few years past, in extending the dominion of slavery, and making that the turning point in public measures, then, come what may, we must be faithful to our convictions of duty. We cannot lead our influence to the extension of an institution which does violence to all our moral feelings, and must be a curse to the nation that willingly upholds it. The old plea of necessity, which Milton has characterized as the tyrant's plea, cannot be urged in favour of these new measures, and they should be met, as sooner or later they must be, by the solemn execrations of all good men, whether at the North or the South. It is beyond the power of language to express the woes which will otherwise be entailed on the fairest portions of our land. We would, therefore, urge it upon the people of the South, not in the spirit of menace,—but in all kindness we would entreat them, not to press us too far in this matter. Whatever smooth speeches may have been made by Northern men, whatever concessions may have been made by Northern merchants, or subservience shown by Northern politicians, the whole system is at variance with the deepest and strongest feelings of our nature.

"We are a conservative people. We love our country and its institutions. From an inexpressible unwillingness to break up the Constitution of the United States, we have submitted to much; and the great mass of our people are willing to go on, using only constitutional means for the removal of this national crime and disgrace. But let our brethren at the South beware of pushing us too far. Let them consider how they would feel if we should undertake to make them, as members of the government, sanction acts of piracy, and authorize the fitting out of vessels to prey upon the commerce of the world, pillaging, burning, and murdering, wherever plunder was to be gained; and this solely for the pecuniary profit of the North! How would they look upon such a proposition? And yet, even this would not be more abhorrent to their moral convictions, than measures for the further extension of slavery are to ours.

"The extreme measures for the last two or three years have done more to stir up the North, and to rouse the public sentiment against slavery, than all the efforts of the abolitionists for a quarter of a century. It will not be safe to carry matters farther. The insulting laugh with which Southern members of the Senate received Mr. Webster's assertion, that they did not understand the people of the North, is quite too much for our patience, and does more than a thousand incendiary speeches to awaken the indignation of the free States. We have been betrayed by our leaders. The real sentiment of the community has not found utterance through our strongest men. But every year it is making itself felt more and more. And if the upholders of slavery go on as they have done, they will rouse, all along their borders from Maine to Oregon, such a spirit, that no public man who lends his sanction to slavery, will dare look to any free State for support; and the names of those Northern men through whose influence Texas, with its iniquitous war, has been annexed, will be as a hissing and a by-word among the people.

"We do not often approach this subject. But the public, and especially the religious press of the North must speak out. In the slaveholding States there are thousands who respond to us, and thousands more who would gladly do so if they could only see how to free themselves of the dreadful evil that is upon them. Let all who have the real welfare of the country at heart consider these things well. The revolution in New Hampshire, though it has undoubtedly been hastened by the firmness of one bold man, who had the magnanimity to take his stand on a great moral principle, only shows the real state of feeling in this whole section of the country; and to all Christians and philanthropists, is a most encouraging fact. But whatever may be our success, let us be free, open, gentle, firm, and true,—faithful to what we believe the right, and leave the event to God, sure that in his own good time all things will be directed to a prosperous issue."

ENCROACHMENTS OF THE SLAVE POWER.—A small pamphlet entitled "An Address on the Encroachments of the Slave Power," by Lindley Murray Moore, 1845, has recently been put in our hands, from which we extract the following:

"We have witnessed with alarm, for many years past, a steady determination on the part of the Slaveholders, to monopolize all the legislative and judicial powers of the nation, and a disgraceful yielding on the part of northern members of Congress to southern dictation. Although in a population of eighteen millions of inhabitants, there are but about two hundred and fifty thousand Slaveholders, yet we find that all the measures of the Federal Government, and all the offices in its gift, are entirely under the control of this small central power. And although the Slaveholders are but a small minority of the white inhabitants in the Southern States, yet none but Slaveholders are sent to Congress, or have the offices in the gift of the Federal Government conferred on them. And when in Congress, they have their instructions to be united in every measure, in which the Slave interest can, in the least degree, be protected, however disastrous it may prove to that of free labour. Indeed, in some instances, they seem even more intent in destroying the interest of free labour, or in bringing it into disrepute, than in building up their own. With what supreme contempt do they speak of northern labourers? Governor McDuffie declared 'Slavery to be the corner stone of our Republican edifice; and that twenty-five years would not elapse, before northern labourers would be owned as property by the capitalists.'

"Professor Daw, of William and Mary College, says: 'Political power at the South, is thus taken from the hands of those who might abuse it, and placed in the hands of those who are most interested in its judicious exercise. How can he get wisdom, that holdeth the plough, that glorieth in the goad, that driveth oxen, and is occupied in labours, and whose talk is of bullocks?'

"Benjamin W. Leigh, one of the most distinguished men of Virginia, said in their state convention as early as 1829, 'There must be some peasantry; and as the country fills up, there must be more,—that is, men who tend the head and dig the soil, who have neither real nor personal capital of their own, and who earn their daily bread by the sweat of their brows. I ask gentlemen to say, whether they believe that those who depend on their daily bread for subsistence, can or ever do enter into political affairs? They never do, never will, never can.'

"Pickens, of South Carolina, says: 'All society settles down into a classification of capitalists and labourers. The former will own the latter.'

"Thus we find that they are not satisfied with holding the black man in abject and degrading bondage; but they call upon the capitalists of the north to reduce the white labourers to the same miserable condition; and McDuffie gives them but a quarter of a century to do it in, and several years of that have already elapsed.

"All the great disastrous measures, from the Fugitive of 1850, down to the late FLORIDA WAR, [we may now add the MEXICAN WAR,] have been forced upon the nation by this united central power, by the assistance of a few from the north, whom they have always been able, by the lure of office, to associate to their aid.

"The free population of the United States including the Territories, and the District of Columbia, according to the census of 1840, was 14,434,190 persons. Of these the non-slaveholding States contained 9,653,663; the slaveholding, 4,780,427. That is to say the free States contained just twice as many free inhabitants as the slave states, and 92,809 persons over.

"Now it is a very important thing to the slaveholders, to secure judicial decisions of the highest authority favourable to Slavery. To effect this, it is thought necessary to have a majority of the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, from the slave States. And accordingly Congress has so divided the Circuits as to give to the slave States, having not one-third of the free population, five Judges, and to the free States, having more than two-thirds, only four. The Circuits, also, are so arranged that no slave State is included in the Circuit of a Judge residing in a free State, nor any free State in the Circuit of a Judge residing in a slave State.

"The largest population of a slave State Circuit is only a fraction over one-half the largest population of a free State Circuit, and less by sixty thousand than the smallest! While the smallest population of a free State Circuit, is more than six times the smallest population of a slave State Circuit. The 7th Circuit, of which Ohio is part, contains more than seven times as many free inhabitants as the fifth of which Mississippi forms part.

"The fact that for thirty-one years during the last thirty-four, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, has been a Slaveholder, shows again how entirely that body has been under the control of the central power.

"A great majority of our foreign ambassadors are slaveholders; and those who are not, have, before their appointment, generally shown a disgraceful subserviency to their power. Cotton, rice, and tobacco, are vigilantly guarded in foreign Courts, to the neglect of wheat and other agricultural productions of the free states. But our limits will not admit of dwelling on this topic, one of vast importance to every man, 'who earns his bread by the sweat of his brow.' We earnestly entreat the reader to examine, at least, this branch of the subject, and give evidence that may convince the southern aristocracy, who speak so contemptuously of northern laborers, that he can perform other functions, besides 'holding the plough, handling the goad, and talking of bullocks.'

"During the fifty-six years that the Federal Government has been in operation, the free states have furnished a president for twelve years, and the slave States for forty-four years. No northern president has ever secured a second election, and no southern one has ever failed in it.

"Here we find a small central power in our country, that has for many years past, completely controlled all the executive, legislative and judicial action of the Government, and the appointment of all our foreign ambassadors. And this power, instead of weakening, is daily gaining strength. It now boldly bids defiance to the north, and to the friends of freedom every where."

POEMS OF HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW.

An article in our fourth number, headed "The all pervading influence of slavery," mentioned that the anti-slavery poetry of this distinguished writer had been omitted from the beautiful Philadelphia edition of his poems, because of the humiliating fact that he could not get the work published except on condition of this exclusion.

We are glad to be able to say that a more independent feeling has since prevailed with, at least, some of the publishers. A neat edition, containing all of Longfellow's poems, has been issued from the press of Harper and Brothers of New York, at the cheap rate of fifty cents per copy, which will probably give it a circulation far exceeding that of its imperfect and costly predecessor.

We offered to our readers some time since, one of his pieces entitled "The Arsenal at Springfield," and present to their notice, to-day, two others of his poems, from which those who have no other access to his writings may discover his poetical as well as moral temperament. We do not mean to endorse all that we find in the full edition of his poems now before us, but we certainly discern in parts of it, much that is beautiful and excellent, and in the remainder, much that will please the merely literary reader. We give below, the sentiments of a correspondent who loves intensely whatever is genuine poetry.

"We have at last a neat, cheap, and full edition of Longfellow's poems. The Anti-Slavery pieces, whose omission the pro-slavery spirit of our country required in Carey and Hart's late splendid edition of the same, are here looking up from the page beneath us with serene confidence in their own goodness and beauty. They are in truth among the best pieces their author has written. "The Slave's Dream," "The Slave singing at midnight," and "The Witnesses," are graphic in a high degree. "The Good Part" is very tender and beautiful. We are glad, if one edition of his poems must have the mark of censure upon it, that it is the one intended for the few, not the mass, to possess. That which is to go forth among the people to enlighten and elevate them—that by all means we would not have given of its word for the poor and oppressed. And we believe that this edition of Longfellow will do a good work in this respect. Nay, the whole book is so scattered through with passages of reformatory Christian character, that we do not doubt it is one of Truth's missiles in the moral battle of the present day. With what force does it inculcate the duty of doing, watching, suffering, and achieving—boldly, as the Word may direct! But what need of eulogy when all lovers of Truth and Poetry, have by heart his "Psalm of Life," "Light of Stars," "Footsteps of Angels," "Flowers," "The Goblet of Life," "Maidenhood," "Excelsior," "The Arsenal of Springfield," and "Walter Von Der Vogelweide!" These, with some of his Anti-Slavery poems, no one, in view of their high-toned thought, and pure and graceful diction, can well deny to be his very best. In addition to these, for mere sentiment and literary excellence, "The Castle by the Sea," "Song of the Silent Land," "The Skeleton in Armor," "Eurytion," "The two Locks of Hair," "The Belfry of Bengos" and "The Day is Done," are worthy of much praise. Could Longfellow only obtain a little of that power which close conflict with wrong gives, we scarcely know who would surpass him in that endurance of fame which lives alike through dark ages and those which are radiant with the light of intellect."

CONSUMPTION OF FREE-LABOUR GOODS.—We take pleasure in calling the attention of our readers to an invitation in our advertising columns, to the consumers, by preference, of free labour goods, to ascertain in their respective neighbourhoods the names of individuals disposed to co-operate in this concern, and have such statistics as they may be able to collect, forwarded to one point. Besides the advantage to the arrangement for a general free-labour store, which we are gratified to be able to announce as likely to be in operation early in next year, we think the statistics called for highly valuable for future reference, as this righteous testimony shall make progress among those who look upon slavery as repugnant to Christianity.

CORRESPONDENTS.—We are indebted to many of our friends on both sides of the Atlantic for letters of an encouraging character. Several communications intended for publication are on file, and will be inserted as soon as our limited space will allow.

INTELLIGENCE.

PROCEEDINGS IN BOSTON.

The Emancipator of the 23d ult., contains the following intelligence.

"Our community has been as much agitated as the spirit of Mammon would permit, by a fearful carrying out of Judge Story's decision in the Prigg case, by which all the safeguards of personal liberty are thrown down, and every man and every house are laid at the mercy of the slaveholders. Week before last complaint was made against Capt. Hannum, of the brig Ottoman, one of the New Orleans line of packets, belonging to John H. Pearson & Co., for kidnapping a colored man in South Boston.

"The man was a slave in New Orleans, and took refuge in the brig, where he kept himself secreted until it was too late to return him. After the brig had arrived at this port, Capt. Hannum kept a supervision over him, intending to return him to his owners at New Orleans by the first vessel. He was sent down to Spectacle Island in a boat attended by a guard. While the keepers were on shore, the fugitive set sail for South Boston and reached that place in safety. He then took the land, and had nearly reached the bridge, when he was overtaken by Capt. Hannum, who told the crowd that he had stolen his pocket book and that he was about to take him to the jail for the robbery. He was however again put on board the boat and taken to Point Shirley, with the view of putting him on board a vessel about to sail for New Orleans.

"A writ of habeas corpus had been issued by Judge Hubbard, but the negro could not be found, and a precept was issued against Capt. Hannum, but he has not been arrested. Considerable efforts were made by the friends of freedom, by employing boats, steamers, &c. to obtain the liberation of the man, but the commercial spirit threw too many obstacles in their way, and they were defeated. One steambot was openly taken out of their hands and employed to tow the Niagara, (on board of which the unhappy man had been conveyed,) out to sea, and she is gone.—She was pursued by another steamer, but without avail. Had the case been reversed, and occurred at New Orleans, or even in Boston, no doubt the forts would have been signalled, the revenue cutter employed, and a general turn out to prevent a slave escaping out of bondage. But when the object was to return him to slavery, and save a commercial firm in Boston from a paltry loss by fine or suit, it was almost impossible to get anything done, and nothing could be done to effect.

"We are informed that John H. Pearson declared he would get that man back to New Orleans if it cost him a hundred thousand dollars. And the whole commercial community and the commercial press evidently sympathise with him and sustain him!"

A great public meeting was held in Faneuil Hall on the evening of the 24th ult., to express the indignation of the freemen of Boston, on this great outrage on human rights. We understand that JOHN QUINCY ADAMS presided, and that the proceedings were appropriate to the occasion, but we are not informed of the particulars.

WAR WITH MEXICO.

We have not thought it necessary, to keep our readers advised of the progress of this war for the extension of the slave power. It may be sufficient to state in general terms, that in the several conflicts which have occurred, success has attended the arms of the United States. The last tidings are, that Santa Fe was taken by General Kearney, without opposition, on the 18th of 8th month last. Much sickness appears to prevail in the army. The following facts relating to it are collected from New Orleans papers.

"There were near 600 sick volunteers in the hospitals at Camargo, and they were dying very fast. So many were sick that it required near a whole regiment to attend to them. Those whom the Tennesseans left behind seemed to be particularly unfortunate, for they had to call on the Alabamians to attend the living and bury the dead. As fast as these men get able to leave the hospital they are discharged and sent home. In fact, Gen T. shows a disposition to discharge all volunteers who are discontented and wish to return to their homes. Though the number of patients in the hospital at Matamoros is larger than at Camargo, the mortality is greater at the latter place—near 3 to 1. Those who are unaccustomed to a Southern climate, when once prostrated by the fever, seldom regain their former strength on the Rio Grande; without a change of atmosphere they die off quickly, else become so enfeebled that they are unable to help themselves. A person who has visited the hospitals at the different posts, has said that if one half of the northern and western volunteers who went to the Rio Grande, are effective men on the 15th October, it is more than he looks for."

COTTON CROPS OF THE SOUTH.

The accounts of the crops this year indicate a considerable failure. The Charleston News says: "We have conversed with an intelligent merchant who has just returned from an excursion of some weeks in the interior of Georgia, and who has made particular inquiries as to the extent of the Cotton Crop, as also the probable injury which it has sustained by the caterpillar and boll worm. From all that he could learn, Georgia will be materially injured, while the greater portion of Alabama, Louisiana and Mississippi will be swept of fully one-half of the estimated product two months since. It is the general opinion in those sections that in no event can the crop reach two millions, while the most intelligent men with whom our informant conversed, estimate it at 18 or 1900,000 bales. We learn also, that the crop in this state will not, probably, much exceed that of last year. The caterpillar and worm have appeared on several plantations in the upper districts."

The New Orleans Delta of the 18th says:

"We were yesterday shown a box of cotton bolls gathered promiscuously from a field in Wilkinson county, Miss., entirely destroyed by the ravages of the worm. We regret to learn from a very large cotton planter in that county, that the crops in that region are almost entirely destroyed. We cannot imagine a more melancholy sight than a cotton field which has been visited by the worm, the stalks destitute of leaves and covered with black, rotten and unsightly looking bolls."

A letter from Fort Gibson, under date of the 12th, says:

"For the last week the army worms have been very busy eating up the cotton, and such destruction as they have made of it, I have never before seen. They have literally eaten up the cotton, not a leaf blown or young bolls are left, the cotton fields look just like they usually do in the month of March, when they are picked clean and the frost destroyed the foliage; not a place has escaped in my knowledge, and it is general, as far I have heard, above and below this place and in Louisiana. Not a half crop can possibly be made. Col. Bridges told me yesterday that his usual crop is 200 bales, and that he will not make over 40 bales; his neighbours are as bad off, if not worse, with the worm. We have had rains daily for ten days past, and the weather promises rain yet. I look upon the crop as almost a total failure. If the planters make cotton enough to buy meat and bread, it will be as much as they can do. The worms not only eat up the leaves, forms and young bolls, but eat up bolls two-thirds matured. As many as 8 to 10 worms get upon a boll; the whole soil is alive with them."

Still another account, dated Greensborough, Ala., Sept. 19th, says:

"About the first of August the 'boll-worm' made its appearance in this section, and so general and destructive were its ravages, that there was scarcely a cotton field to be found that escaped entirely, whilst much the larger proportion were, in the course of three weeks, cut off nearly or quite one-half. The boll worms, however, about this time measurably disappeared,—leaving the planters with some hope that, should the balance of the season prove propitious, they might possibly make half a crop; but even this hope has been sadly blighted,—for scarcely had the boll worm disappeared before the caterpillar made its appearance, and commenced destroying the leaves and a few young bolls that had been left. This work of destruction would probably have lasted only a few days, had the rain ceased; but during the latter part of the week two or three heavy rains fell, which had the effect of adding myriads to the enemy's forces. And on Monday last many of the cotton fields were left without a single leaf, and but few bolls.

POETRY.

THE WITNESSES.

BY HENRY W. LONGFELLOW.

In Ocean's wide domains,
Half buried in the sands,
Lie skeletons in chains,
With shackled feet and hands.

Beyond the fall of dews,
Deeper than plummet lies,
Float ships, with all their crews,
No more to sink or rise.

There the black slave-ship swims,
Freighted with human forms,
Whose fettered, fleshless limbs
Are not the sport of storms.

These are the bones of slaves;
They gleam from the abyss;
They cry, from yawning waves,
"We are the Witnesses!"

Within Earth's wide domains
Are markets for men's lives;
Their necks are galled with chains,
Their wrists are cramped with gyves.

Dead bodies, that the kite
In deserts makes its prey;
Murders, that with affright
Scare schoolboys from their play!

All evil thoughts and deeds;
Anger, and lust, and pride;
The foulest, rankest weeds,
That choke life's groaning tide!

These are the woes of slaves;
They glare from the abyss;
They cry, from unknown graves,
"We are the Witnesses!"

[Against whom do these witnesses testify?—Eds.]

THE SLAVE SINGING AT MIDNIGHT.

BY THE SAME.

Loud he sang the psalm of David!
He, a Negro and enslaved,
Sang of Israel's victory,
Sang of Zion, bright and free.

In that hour, when night is calmest,
Sang he from the Hebrew Psalmist,
In a voice so sweet and clear
That I could not choose but hear;

Songs of triumph, and ascriptions,
Such as reached the swart Egyptians,
When upon the Red Sea coast
Perished Pharaoh and his host.

And the voice of his devotion
Filled my soul with strange emotion;
For its tones by turns were glad,
Sweetly solemn, wildly sad.

Paul and Silas in their prison,
Sang of Christ, the Lord arisen,
And an earthquake's arm of might
Broke their dungeon gates at night.

But, alas! what holy angel
Brings the slave this glad evangel!
And what earthquake's arm of might Breaks his dungeon gates at night!

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FREE LABOUR GOODS.—Arrangements are in progress for the establishment of a Free Produce store, wholesale and retail, in co-operation with the Free Produce Association. It is desirable to know, so far as practicable, what amount of patronage may be relied upon. With this view it is suggested that measures be taken to ascertain who are the friends of the cause in the various sections of the country, and that the names and residences of those who desire to use the products of free labour in preference to those of slave labour, be collected and forwarded to George W. Taylor, No. 20 N. Fourth street.

GOODS MANUFACTURED FROM FREE LABOUR COTTON. For sale by Thos. S. Field & Co. No. 36 N. Front street (op. stairs) Philadelphia, belonging to the Free Produce Association of Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. "Manchester" Ginghams, two qualities, various patterns; Table Diaper assorted widths, white and coloured; Canton Flannels double and coloured; coloured Cambrics and Prints; Apron checks assorted plaids; 4-6 shirting and 5-8 sheeting; Muslin twilled Muslin and plaid cotton Hdkies; cotton Laps, very superior; white and coloured Wadding; hose and half hose very superior and heavy; knitting Cotton various numbers. 9th mo. 29th.

THE NON-SLAVERHOLDER.

Is published on the first of each month, at one dollar per annum for one copy, or five dollars per annum for six copies in one order, payable in advance. Abraham L. Pennock, Samuel Rhoads, and George W. Taylor, are the Editors and Publishers; either of whom will receive subscriptions, payments, and communications. Letters and papers addressed to them, or endorsed Non-Slaverholder, directed to box 777, Philadelphia Post Office, will duly reach them.

By decision of the Post Master General, the Non-Slaverholder is subject to newspaper postage only.

THE
NON-SLAVERHOLDER.

"Whoso gives the motive, makes his brother's sin his own."

VOL. I.] PHILADELPHIA, ELEVENTH MONTH, 1845. [NO. 11.]

ASSOCIATED ACTION.

EIGHTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF THE AMERICAN FREE PRODUCE ASSOCIATION.

In the review of the last, as of previous years, your committee find occasion to regret the apathy which generally prevails respecting this important department of anti-slavery labour, but they think it more profitable to direct their attention and yours, on this occasion, to the encouraging signs of the times, which, though perhaps "few and far between," may be distinctly observed. As the business of the Association is conducted chiefly by our Manufacturing Committee, the details of its operations will be found in their report. Your Executive Committee are happy to announce that their operations have been as successful during the past year, and that the present prospects of the society are as fair, as in previous years. They derive encouragement from the increasing demand for the products of free labour, which surely denotes some progress of correct principles or feeling. This progress has apparently been greater in the west, than in the east, during the last few years. From Ohio and Indiana cheering accounts have been received of growing interest in our cause, and of sacrifices of convenience and luxury, made to principle, which the success of the manufacturing department of our Association renders unnecessary here, and which would not be made, excepting where the seed of truth had taken deep root in a good soil. We rejoice in these encouraging facts, especially because adverse influences have been at work in Ohio to check the progress of its growth, and to blight the fruit of its early promise.

In the east, also, where lamentable apathy relative to this subject pervades the anti-slavery ranks, our principles are not powerless. Here and there they have sunk into the heart and conscience of an individual, and his daily example is a light shining in a dark place.

Your Committee hail with pleasure the existence of the Free Labour Association of Friends, organized in this city, within the past year, hoping that it will prove a valuable coadjutor in our work. They regard its formation as indicative of an increasing interest in our principles, and, as such, highly encouraging.

In Great Britain, also, we perceive indications that those principles are at work in the hearts of philanthropists, and have moved them to the utterance of a faithful protest against the recent action of their government, in opening the ports of that kingdom for the admission of slave-grown sugars. We sincerely unite with them in deploring this act of the British government, whereby a new impetus will be given to the slave-trade, and new vigor to the horrible system of slavery. It is computed that, in consequence of this measure, "seventy to eighty thousand tons of slave-grown sugars will be annually required to meet the increased demand in the British markets," and that, at least, "fifty thousand new slaves must be obtained to prepare it for exportation; and to meet the wastes of mortality that will be occasioned by the severity of the system under which they will be placed, a large additional number of Africans must be imported to join that host of human beings who are every year torn from their native homes by the slave-traders, and compelled to surrender their liberty to the tyrant task-masters of Brazil and Cuba." Thus is England, who expended twenty millions of money to abolish slavery in her own colonies, offering a bounty on the enslavement of 50,000 Africans! Thus is she, while keeping an expensive armed force on the coast of Africa, for the suppression of the slave-trade, furnishing at home the strongest inducement for the continuance of that trade, directly promoting, by one act of Parliament, that which by another act she seeks to destroy! The inconsistency is the more gross, inasmuch as she assigns for her motives in the latter, the considerations of justice and philanthropy. Yet such is the inconsistency of those individuals who profess to abhor the system of slavery, regarding it as inherently sinful, while they daily feed and clothe themselves with its fruits. Their words say to the oppressor, "spoil not the poor, oppress not the weak, enslave not the image of God;" their louder-speaking conduct says, "continue to extort that unrequited labour from your helpless victims, and we will pay you for its fruits." It is to be hoped that those friends of the slave in England, who have recorded their protest against the inconsistent course of their government, will see to it that their tables and wardrobes do not involve them in the same condemnation. Inasmuch as the chief motive for slaveholding is pecuniary gain, it must be evident, to any careful observer, that the consumption of the products of slave-labour is one of the main pillars of the system. It is true that there are other pillars, the removal of which would, doubtless, destroy the monstrous edifice; but does it become abolitionists, while working with courageous hearts and strong arms to hew down those, to be also strengthening this? Is not such a course not only impolitic and unwise, but sinful? If we demand, in the name of justice, that the slaveholder relinquish his hold on that which he wickedly calls his property, although the act may reduce him to utter poverty; if we say to him, "honest poverty is better than ill-gotten gains;" shall we demur at the inconvenience, the sacrifice, in which we shall be involved by an attempt to abstain from the use of the products of stolen labour? If we do, how bitterly may he retort upon us, "Physician heal thyself!" It is cause of rejoicing that many have listened to the rebukes of conscience on this subject, and are diligently striving to make clean the hands which bear the ark of Freedom before the people. That there are many more who heed not its admonitions, or in whom it is not sufficiently enlightened to speak aright, should be to us an incentive to more faithful labour, and unwearied efforts to disseminate the truth, which is destined to vanquish error, and ultimately to unite in unbroken harmony all true friends of God and man.

JAMES MOTT, Chairman.

MARY GREW, Cor. Sec.

MINUTE OF LONDON YEARLY MEETING, 1846.

A Report has been now brought in from the Meeting for Sufferings as to the amount received from the different Quarterly Meetings, in conformity with the Minute of last year, recommending a subscription on behalf of the coloured population in the West India Islands, and elsewhere, and the Aborigines of different countries. The said Report, containing also information as to the appropriation of a part of the said Fund, is satisfactory to this Meeting.

NEGRO AND ABORIGINES FUND REPORT.

To the Meeting for Sufferings:—The Committee appointed on the appropriation of the subscription recommended by the Yearly Meeting on behalf of the coloured population of the West India Islands and the Aborigines of different countries, report that the subscription for these objects now amounts to £4099 10s 2d, according to the statement herewith presented. As we are informed, however, that the Yearly Meeting of Ireland has recommended to its subordinate Meetings that a subscription be made in augmentation of the Fund, we doubt not but that a considerable addition will yet be made to it.

The grants which have been made from the said Fund up to the present time, the particular application of which is shown in the statement above referred to, amount to the sum of £1700, all of which have been made with the sanction of the Meeting for Sufferings, and in strict accordance with the following regulations laid down in the 7th month last, relative to the appropriation of the subscription, viz.:—

1st.—"That each School so established or assisted should come under separate or distinct notice as to its situation, wants, and number of scholars, whether boys or girls, and as to the particular care exercised over it.

2d.—"That whenever a grant shall have been made, a report be expected; and that no second grant be made until a report of the appropriation of the previous one has been received.

3d.—"That the religious instruction in all schools, which may be aided out of this Fund, be from the Holy Scriptures alone, or from lessons selected from the Holy Scriptures alone; and that no Catechism or similar book be used in such schools; and that no denominational or sectarian views be taught as such in those schools; and that no assistance be rendered to any such schools until satisfactory information has been received on the foregoing particulars."

Great as was the apparent want of school instruction among the coloured inhabitants of the West India Islands, it nevertheless appears by the various communications which from time to time have been received from those Islands, that it is yet greater than was anticipated, leaving no doubt but there is a wide field open to the appropriate application of the liberality of Friends. The assistance already rendered has been most timely and efficient, by which schools, which had been closed, have been re-opened, and others that in all probability would have been discontinued, have been kept open. The grateful feelings with which the respective grants have been received, and the encouragement which has been evidently given to the parties immediately engaged in their superintendence, have afforded the Committee much satisfaction.

We may add, in conclusion, that notwithstanding the grants which have been made to facilitate the education of the Negro race in the West Indies, there are other pressing cases from those Islands, still before the committee, in regard to which it is manifest, that in rendering the pecuniary aid contemplated by the Yearly Meeting, the real welfare of this class of the human family will be very substantially promoted.

Signed on behalf of the Committee,

ANTHONY HARRIS,

Clerk this time.

Devonshire House, 14th of 5th mo. 1846.

COMMUNICATIONS.

To the Editors of the Non-Slaveholder.

The denomination of professed Christians in Scotland, now known as the Free Church, consists of a large number of persons who have separated from the National Church. Having nobly sacrificed worldly honour and pecuniary emoluments, for the high duty and privilege of obeying Jesus Christ rather than fallible men, in the things pertaining to his holy kingdom, they have solicited the aid of their brethren, who have contributed means to build houses for worship and to defray other necessary expenses.

Commissioners from this church in Scotland were sent some time since to the United States, for this object, and a considerable sum of money was obtained from the North and from the South. The friends of the slave, believing that the God they worship, "hateth robbery for a burnt offering," have justly protested against the act of this church, which is seeking liberty for itself, sanctioning the enslavement of their brethren, in soliciting and receiving, by their Commissioners, the fruits of vile oppression which are the price of their brother's blood. They earnestly call upon that church to "send back the money." Yet alas! while they loudly condemn that church for this single act, the majority of them are most inconsistently guilty of repeated and continual acts of the same character, in not only receiving from the oppressor, and feeding and adorning themselves with the fruits of coerced and unrequited toil, but voluntarily paying the robber for his stolen goods, thereby presenting the most effective motive to him to continue his fraudulent and cruel oppression, as well as giving their sanction to the same.

The following address was written to call the attention of abolitionists to this important subject, and to persuade them to carry out their own just principles into their own practice.

AN APPEAL

To Abolitionists who approve of the "Letter to the Commissioners of the Free Church of Scotland," and who do not abstain from the use of slave products.

DEAR BRETHREN:—Our transatlantic brethren, who have visited us for the purpose of soliciting funds for the Free Church of Scotland, the members of which, we believe, sympathize with us in our opposition to the entire system of American slavery, have been very consistently and earnestly entreated to keep their hands pure from the gains of oppression. For the honour of religion, and for the sake of your brethren in bonds, you sanction this faithful entreaty. Alas! brethren, how reluctant we are to benefit ourselves by a faithful application to our own conduct, of the principles which we clearly perceive to be condemnatory of the conduct of others.

"We must say, respected brethren, in Christian fidelity, that your present position strikes us as singular and unfortunate." "What!" object to your brethren receiving the money of the oppressor, while you are receiving his goods? Object to their receiving the very money which you yourselves have voluntarily paid to the slaveholder, through the hands of his agents, for the fruits of unrequited toil, which you believe to be stolen goods? If you may receive these goods for the benefit of your bodies, why may not the Commissioners receive the money you have paid for them for the benefit of the soul? Is it consistent for you to complain of them for "now actually laboring that their honorable poverty may become less, by contributions which are the price of slaves and souls of men," while you are also labouring that your poverty may become less by purchasing the cheaper articles, which are "the price of your own brethren for whom Christ died?" If he who receives the "impious gold" cannot escape the "wo (of) him that coveteth an evil covetousness to his house," how can they escape, who receive the "impious" cotton and sugar? Are the latter any purer from the blood of the slave than the former? If "the Moloch of the South stands ready to pay" the Commissioners for their "virtual" sanction of his atrocities, does he not stand as ready to pay you for the same service, if not in hospitalities, in mockeries of your protestations against him, for your being the actual partakers of his evil deeds? Does he not plainly see that you, and other consumers of his fruits of robbery, are his most efficient supporters, by furnishing the profit which sustains and strengthens every link of that infernal chain with which he binds the bodies and the souls of his unhappy victims? Is it possible that you will continue thus to "make common cause" with a system of iniquity which fills you "with disgust and abhorrence?" Will you thus continue to "clasp hands with its defenders, and (purchase) their blood-stained offerings?" If the slaveholder "can number (you) among his allies, he may well think his victory complete."

"It is possible that you may allege, in the language of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, when they receive, may, solicit the donations of slaveholders," that you, by receiving, may, purchasing the produce of slaveholders, "sustain no relation to the system that implies approbation." "Let us briefly examine this." It is asked, on supposition, that if Ann Pray, of Georgia, had directed her slaves to be sold, and the proceeds in cash to have been given to the Board, would the Board have declined the offer? If not—if they would have received the cash, why turn from the human flesh? If they would have sent the money back, why solicit the money of slaveholders? Suppose, now, that Ann Pray had directed in her will that the amount of her bequest should be given to the Board in the produce of the unrequited toil of the lacerated "bones and muscles and immortal minds," what would you say on the question of the Board accepting this? Your own example, if it is a righteous one, justifies them in doing so. But by what kind of logic will you prove that the acceptance of the cash, or the human flesh, would sanction the vile system of oppression, and that the acceptance of the cotton and sugar would not? Know you not that the "professors of the religion of money" would never "have torn the mother from her children, and sent her into a merciless and returnless exile," had not you and others stood ready to purchase their fruits of robbery and oppression? Will it be no thorn in your dying pillow, that you have furnished the chief motive for that system of oppression which you denounce as "the sum of all villainies?" Let consumers cast off their fellowship with "the accursed thing," and the slave must be made a freeman. Do you say the amount you purchase is small, and that your abstaining would effect nothing? The abstinence of all abolitionists would effect something. But you have furnished a better reply. "It is the principle against which we contend, and not the amount of the (produce) received."

It was not the size of Achan's wedge that troubled the camp of Israel."

"The Christian abolitionists of this land," who, for the sake of their poor brother, refuse to purchase the fruits of his uncompensated toil, "need your aid, dear brethren, in pulling down the strongholds of oppression, and they feel that you will not be sustained in your consciences," if you refuse to add to your anti-slavery faith this "virtue." Whether or not you "are strengthening the hands of (our) opponents," by your practice, as much as the Commissioners are by theirs, deserves your serious consideration.

Is there no ground to censure that abolitionism, which is unwilling to pay an extra penny for the pound of sugar, or yard of cotton, or to take a little extra trouble to procure articles unstained by our brothers' blood? Is this the example of sacrifice and self-denial which we would have the oppressor imitate? Will he not consider that your unwillingness to make the small sacrifice, justifies him in declining to make the greater? And will he not consider that your "actions" of participation in his evil deeds, "speak louder" than your "words" of testimony against them? Far be it, that you should continue to furnish such an anodyne to the conscience you would awaken. Far be it, that you should present such a shield to your opponent, wherewith he will cause all your arrows to fall harmless at his feet.

Oh! for the sake of the broken-hearted mother, bereft of her offspring—for the sake of your agonizing brother, now suffocating in the slave-ship—for the sake of him who is now writhing under the tormenting lash, you are affectionately entreated to obey the divine command to "have no fellowship, (communion or participation) with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them." "Touch not; taste not," the unclean thing. Should you respond to this call of love for the poor and outraged, you will prove that you "love not in word" only, "but in deed and in truth." Having taken out the beam which is in your own eye, you will clearly see how to take out the mote from the eyes of the Commissioners.

A union of consistent practice on the part of the numerous abolitionists would lessen, in some degree, the demand for the fruits of unrighteousness, and, consequently, in the same degree, lessen the demand for the victims of avarice required to produce those fruits.

"The American church" is justly considered "the bulwark of American slavery." But how can any professors of that church, who do not actually hold slaves, be implicated in that charge, if you, who are the voluntary partakers of its fruits —you who unite with others in supplying the means—the profit—for the sustaining of the entire system of iniquity, are not also implicated? How, indeed, is the slaveholder in the church himself implicated, if the partaker of his evil deeds is not? Who needs to be aroused to "a due sense of sin, to repentance, and works meet for repentance," if such partaker does not?

If you "know that if the Commissioners of the Free Church of Scotland, solicit gold of Southern slaveholders to build up (their) cause, (they) will weaken (your) hands—soothe the South in her mad career—deadens still more the portentous apathy of the North, and disappoint the friends of human rights throughout the world," ought you not to know that you are more constantly, and to a greater extent, producing the very same evil effects by your own practice? What is the difference between the gold and the goods? Do they not both emanate from the same corrupt fountain? Are they not both stained with your brother's blood? Do you not clearly perceive that if the one is the fruit of unrighteousness and oppression, so is the other? In bringing to your tables the "guilty sweet," and clothing your households with garments woven with oppression, are you not using your "neighbor's service without wages," giving "him not for his work?" Does the fact of your paying the defrauder, disprove this? Does not this fact rather enhance your sin, by encouraging the slaveholder and his agents to continue their oppression? Supposing that you were using the wool of a sheep, known to be stolen, would the fact of your having paid the thief for the sheep, justify your conduct? Would the fact of your furnishing the thief with the most influential motive to steal more sheep, extenuate your criminality? Would you not, in this case, be accessory to his crimes? As the sheep-stealer possesses no right in the sheep, and, consequently, can convey none to you, so the slaveholder possesses no right to the fruits of the slave's unrequited toil, and, consequently, can convey none to the merchant, who can, therefore, convey none to you. According to your own principles, unequivocally proclaimed to the world, the slaveholder, the wholesale and retail merchant, and the consumer, constitute a fraudulent combination. It is doubtless as far from your deliberate intention, thus to make "common cause" with the oppressor, as it was from that of the Commissioners, in soliciting the "impious gold."

As you "respectfully and earnestly implore" them, "not to solicit" the slaveholders' "filthy lucre," permit us, in the same Christian spirit, to "implore of you" that you would not partake of their "filthy" produce. Dear brethren, "suffer our friendly and frank expostulation." "Never did the jewel of your souls shine so brightly as in the dark hour when you went forth bearing the reproach of Christ," proclaiming his blessed law of love in behalf of your outraged and stricken brother. Oh! that you would now perfect that love, and confirm your glorious testimony by a corresponding practice! While you would have the Commissioners pour into one ear of the oppressor, the faithful rebuke, "God forbid we should touch your money," do, in mercy, be consistent, and pour into the other the reproof, "God forbid that we should touch your produce." Hasten, brethren, "to the rescue" of your own reputation, ere the Commissioners return to tell the astounding tale, that the abolitionists were unwilling that we should "carry home the slaveholders' bounty," while they themselves were carrying home the fruits of his oppression. "This, Christian brethren, is a deed which we devoutly deprecate, and we respectfully and earnestly implore of you" no longer to build again the things which you have so commendably begun to destroy.

HENRY GREW, ABRAHAM L. PENNOCK,
GERRIT SMITH, DANIEL NEALL,
SAMUEL D. HASTINGS.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

TO THE VOTERS OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK.

PETERBORO, Oct. 10, 1846.

I have, this moment, finished the reading of the New Constitution. I may be charged with immodesty for lifting up my voice to hundreds of thousands of my fellow men. But the feelings of shame, sorrow, indignation, alarm, which fill me, will not stop, and need not stop, to consider the claims of modesty. A woman, however delicate and shrinking, might, were her child in danger of being kidnapped, rush into the street, and cry so loud for help, that all her neighbours could hear her—and she, nevertheless, remain uncensured, even by those who are most observant of the proprieties of life. Thus do extraordinary circumstances justify not only, but highly commend the act, that would, otherwise, be exceedingly offensive. It is in such circumstances that I have now taken up my pen—and may not this gain me pardon for beginning my Circular with so wide an address? May not this shelter me from the charge of immodesty and egotism for presuming to speak to so great numbers?

A deep and cruel wrong has been devised against the fifty thousand coloured people of this State. It is meet to call upon you all to help them—for you are all able to come to their help. It is meet to call upon you all to help them—for they, who have devised this deep and cruel wrong, call upon you all to sanction their device and carry it into execution.

You are called on to adopt a Constitution, which contains the provisions,

First, That a man, for having a coloured skin, shall not be represented in the Legislature. In other words, that, for this cause, he shall not be counted in the apportionment of members of the Legislature.

Second, That a man, for having a coloured skin, shall be denied his right to cast a vote.

To be guilty, under a representative, and withal, a republican, Government, of shutting out a part of the people from a representation in the Government, is to be guilty of a partiality for which there is, certainly, no excuse. It is to be guilty of a wrong as palpable, as would be their exclusion from the common air and common water. It is, simply, a triumph of the strong over the weak—of the many over the few. The triumph, in the present instance, is over persons born upon our soil, and of parents, many of whom shed their blood in its defence. And as if to make the triumph most insulting and withering, the New Constitution prefers the white paupers, who subsist on the public charity, to the coloured man, who earns his own bread. The Old Constitution, in the apportionment of members of the Legislature, excludes the pauper, as well as the coloured man. The New Constitution leaves the coloured man in the disgrace of such exclusion; and greatly deepens that disgrace by lifting up the pauper out of it.

The right to vote is not less sacred, and it is more valuable than the other right, of which the New Constitution robs the coloured man. The right to vote is indispensably protective of all the other rights of him who wields it. Emphatically true is this in the case of him, whose humble condition exposes him to aggressions. Hence, when Pennsylvania stripped her coloured people of the right to vote, it made, as the sequel proved, all the other rights of that afflicted people an open and easy prey. But that they were without the respectability and influence of voters, the coloured people of the City of New York had not been mobbed in 1834:—and that white persons were mobbed along with them, was, because such persons had magnanimously identified themselves with a people whom our laws and usages degrade.

As in the case of their being denied political representation, so in this of their being denied a vote, the coloured people suffer a wrong and a loss far less tolerable than they would from the plunder of their property. They might be plundered of their property, and yet be respected by others, and their self-respect also not invaded. But the denial of the right in question degrades them, both in their own esteem and the esteem of others; and, doing this, it contributes to multiply obstacles in the way of their subsistence, respectability, usefulness and happiness, so great and so numerous, as to compel a debasement of character, from which it is well nigh miraculous that so large a share of them escape. God be praised, that they do escape! The few of us, who have made ourselves acquainted with the coloured people of this State, and have cast in our lot with them can testify, that it is truly a large share of them, who escape the debasement of character, which their adverse and wretched circumstances force upon them. Would that the white people of this State could throw down their prejudices against these coloured brethren, and look candidly and patiently at their history! They would never take up those insane and murderous prejudices again. Repentance would break their hearts; and they would, henceforth, love and admire those whom they had previously hated and despised. No where have there been more triumphant struggles against the assaults of vice upon virtue; against the onset of despair upon hope; and against mean, malignant, mighty oppressions, than those of which great numbers of coloured men and coloured women in this State have shown themselves capable. In the midst of those temptations to low vice and utter abandonment, which, in such mighty hosts, assail extreme poverty; in the midst of discouragements the most appalling; in the midst of such persecutions, as strike their iron deepest into the soul; their indomitable courage and unbending integrity have, under the Divine blessing, still borne them along, and brought them off conquerors.

The political disabilities in question are to be deprecated, not for the sake only, or even mainly, of the coloured people of this State. The three millions of American slaves will suffer from them. Their chains will be made tighter by them. As sinks the coloured freeman, so sinks the coloured slave; and as rises the one, so rises the other. To be able to say, that the coloured people of the North are ignorant, abject, wretched, is to have the most plausible argument for his oppression that the Southern slaveholder has ever coveted; and never are Northern men more effectually doing the slaveholders wicked work, than when engaged in disfranchising their coloured brother, and multiplying impediments in the way of his obtaining science, property, respectability, and happiness. Let, however, the coloured man of the North but have the rights of the white man of the North; and let the way be as open to the one as to the other, to acquire wealth, and character, and power; and the Southern oppressor, instead of continuing to look Northward for justifications of his guilty relation, will find influences pouring in upon it, from that quarter, which will quickly dissolve it. The coloured man of the South, when the capabilities of his race shall have been proved by the coloured man of the North, will present himself in a new light to his master. Despised and hated before, he will then have become an object of respect and affection. The master will no more task, and lash, and chain his victim. Of all such work his hands will then be weary. It will be palsied by the truth, which has flashed upon him, that he, whom, ere this, he had mistaken for a brute, is, in reality, a man, his fellow-man, and his equal.

I have intimated the strong tendency of these political disabilities to degrade the subjects of them into the subjects of ignorance, vice, and crime. Their tendency is also to destroy in the subjects of them, all attachment to the Commonwealth which inflicts so cruel and unprovoked a wrong. Our State cannot afford to inflict this wrong; for it cannot afford its consequences. The public morals cannot afford, that so considerable an element in our population should be stamped with an almost necessarily characteristic debasement. Our political safety cannot afford, that scores of thousands, who, else, would equal the most patriotic of their fellow-citizens in devotion to the public good, and in capacity to promote it, should be converted into a fruitful source of disaffection and danger.

That in the year 1846, and after fifteen years of earnest, faithful, investigation of the wrongs, and manly and eloquent assertion of the claims of coloured Americans, a Convention to prepare a Constitution for the State of New York should propose these outrages on their political rights, is, indeed, amazing. One would have thought, that the sorrows in which this unhappy people had, for centuries, been steeped, were enough to satiate the malice of the most fiend-like heart. One would have thought, that, by this time, hatred towards these poor outcasts had begun to exhaust itself, and pity begun to take its place. So far from this, however, the year 1846 surpasses every former year in conspicuous and flagitious measures of the white Americans against the coloured Americans. The first of these measures is our war. Mexico had not wronged us. But, to perpetuate the slavery of coloured Americans, we must have more territory to soak with their sweat, and tears, and blood; and, hence, have our armies gone forth to dismember that nation. The annals of the world are searched in vain for a war prompted by motives so base and diabolical. It is, withal, a war of eminent cowardice on the part of our country—a war, not only as unrighteous, as Mexico is unoffending, but as cowardly, as she is weak and distracted. Again, the most influential religious Association in the land, to avoid giving an occasion for pressing it, in the name of consistency, to question the piety of slaveholders and their fitness for Church membership, has, within a few weeks, actually refused to say, that it is wrong to vote notorious adulterers into the Church of Jesus Christ. Again, scarcely had we heard of this virtual and authoritative indorsement of American slavery, ere news of another, and still more authoritative and influential indorsement of it came from the other side of the Atlantic. The late World's Convention in London threw wide open to the buyers and sellers of human flesh a door of admission into the World's "Evangelical Alliance." The declaration of those American gentlemen in the Convention, who are in Church fellowship with slaveholders, that slavery is the creature of law, and their pretty broad hint, that, if they were required to give up their pro-slavery, the European delegates should be required to give up their rum-drinking; these, together with the sympathy which the Convention very naturally felt for men who would rather pray than eat, prevailed to open that door. Slavery the creature of law—and hence, the slaveholder is innocent! Lotteries the creature of law—and hence the dealer in lottery-tickets is innocent! Rum-selling the creature of law—and hence the rum-seller and rum-drinker is innocent!

I have glanced at a few of the recent crimes against coloured Americans. The Convention for revising your Constitution would have you add another crime to this cluster of crimes. In apportioning members of the Legislature, and in prescribing the qualifications of voters, it asks you to pass over the poor black man, as no man. What will be your answer? God grant, that it may be, that "A MAN IS A MAN." God grant, that your answer may be an indignant rejection of the man-trampling and God-despising paper, which you are asked to adopt. That it is God despising, as well as man-trampling, is as evident as that to His great and loving heart all branches of the human family are equally dear. "God is no respecter of persons"—and who, that truly loves him, is? Alas, what counterfeits of the religion of Heaven are current among men!

I am aware, that some of you, for the purpose of getting your votes for the adoption of this wicked paper, will be referred to the separate proposition in behalf of coloured men, which the Convention has submitted. But this proposition is an Amendment to the New Constitution, rather than a part of it. It is a good Amendment; and every man who does not suffer prejudice to tyrannize over his understanding, and the spirit of ease to shrivel his soul, will eagerly vote for it. But, however good may be the proposed Amendment of a Constitution, and however likely to prevail, it does not follow, that we may, therefore, approve of the Constitution itself, ere the Amendment has prevailed. It is, surely, time enough to approve of a thing, and to vote for it, after it is made right. We are not at liberty, because it may possibly, or ever so probably, be made right, to indorse it, whilst it is yet wrong. But the Amendment in question was proposed without the least expectation on the part of any one that it would prevail; and, as to the great majority of the Convention, it was proposed without the least desire that it should prevail. Some members of the Convention, and, among them, the respectable gentlemen from my own county, sincerely and warmly desired that it should prevail. But the dastardly and malicious provision in the body of the Constitution for disfranchising the coloured man, whilst it exerts the mightiest of all the influences for the defeat of the Amendment, indicates also, most unequivocally, the desire of the great majority of the Convention for its defeat.

What, if, after all, this Amendment, put forth so coldly and hypocritically, should prevail! God has done even more improbable things than this for the cause of his poor, and His own glory.

We could not vote for the New Constitution even were it right on the point of voting. Its crime against our coloured brother, in excluding him from political representation, is, of itself, sufficiently great to disentitle it to the votes of all persons, who, believing, that a man is a man, believe that, in the apportionment of members of the Legislature, the coloured man should count, as well as the white man.

To get votes for the New Constitution, it will also be said, that, unless it be adopted, we shall have to live another quarter of a century under the Old one. Why, however, should we need to live three years longer under it? Having rejected the New Constitution, why need we lose a moment in taking steps for another Convention, that shall present to us another Constitution? Whether, indeed, it be rejected or adopted, why need we lose a moment to this end?

Would that I were permitted to close this Circular with a stronger hope, that you will do what my whole heart has just called out to you to do. But my hope is faint. When your party leaders and party presses were influencing us in the choice of Delegates to the Convention, a large slave of them sought to make us believe, that for nothing did they desire a New Constitution so much, as to elevate by it the coloured man of this State, and by means of his elevation to help his enslaved race at the South. We were suspicious of them then. We are more suspicious of them now. We had, repeatedly, seen their anti-slavery professions followed by pro-slavery voting—even by voting for traffickers in human flesh. And now, we not only see this heinous crime unrepented of, but added to by their tame and quiet acquiescence in the outrage of the New Constitution on Coloured Americans;—by, I might, perhaps truly, say, their heartfelt approval of that outrage.

Voters of the State of New York! be on your guard against these party leaders and party editors. They will ask you to vote for the New Constitution; and some of them will put on an anti-slavery face, when they ask the favour. Ask them, in turn, if they are ready for a practical adoption of such mottoes, as these:—

"No slaveholder for civil office; and no person who thinks a slaveholder fit for it."

"No man for civil office, but a republican; and no slaveholder is a republican, and no person, who thinks a slaveholder fit for civil office, is a republican."

If they are not ready for it, then consent to be counselled by the Calhouns and McDuffies, who vote, as they talk, rather than by those who go for the slave with their lips and their pens, and stab him to the heart with votes.

Your friend,

GERRIT SMITH.

[The following letter, from Patrick Henry to Robert Pleasants, has never, we believe, been published entire. It is a noble testimony to the Truth, by the great orator and statesman, but we have to regret, that, in paying his "devoir to virtue," he did not "choose," as well as "approve" her.]

HANOVER, Jan. 18th, 1773.

Dear Sir,—I take this opportunity to acknowledge the receipt of Anthony Benezet's book against the slave trade. I thank you for it. It is not a little surprising that Christianity, whose chief excellence consists in softening the human heart, in cherishing and improving its fine feelings, should encourage a practice so totally repugnant to the first impressions of right and wrong. What adds to the wonder, is, that this abominable practice has been introduced in the most enlightened ages. Times that seem to have pretensions to boast of high improvements in the arts, sciences, and refined morality, have brought into general use, and guarded by many laws, a species of violence and tyranny, which our more rude and barbarous, but more honest ancestors detested. Is it not amazing, that at a time, when the rights of humanity are defined and understood with precision, in a country above all others fond of liberty; that in such an age and such a country, we find men, professing a religion the most humane, mild, meek, gentle, and generous, adopting a principle as repugnant to humanity, as it is inconsistent with the Bible, and destructive to liberty.

Every thinking, honest man rejects it in speculation; how few in practice from conscientious motives? The world in general has denied your people a share of its honours, but the wise will ascribe to you a just tribute of virtuous praise, for the practice of a train of virtues, among which your disagreement to slavery will be principally ranked. I cannot but wish well to a people whose system imitates the example of him whose life was perfect. And believe me, I shall honour the Quakers for their noble effort to abolish slavery. It is equally calculated to promote moral and political good.

Would any one believe that I am master of slaves of my own purchase! I am drawn along by the general inconvenience of living without them. I will not, I cannot justify it. However culpable my conduct, I will so far pay my devoir to virtue, as to own the excellence and rectitude of her precepts, and to lament my want of conformity to them.

I believe the time will come when an opportunity will be offered to abolish this lamentable evil. Everything we can do is to improve it if it happens in our day; if not, let us transmit to our descendants, together with our slaves, a pity for their own unhappy lot, and an abhorrence of slavery. If we cannot reduce this wished for reformation to practice, let us treat the unhappy victims with lenity; it is the furthest advance we can make towards justice. It is a debt we owe to the purity of our religion, to show that it is at variance with that law which warrants slavery.

Here is an instance that silent meetings have done that which learned and elaborate preaching could not effect; so much preferable are the genuine dictates of conscience, and a steady attention to its feelings, above the teachings of those men who pretend to have found a better guide. I exhort you to persevere in so worthy a resolution. Some of your people disagree, or at least are lukewarm in the abolition of slavery; many treat the resolution of your meeting with ridicule, and among those who throw contempt on it are Clergymen, whose surest guard against both ridicule and contempt is a certain act of assembly.

I know not where to stop; I could say many things on this subject; a serious review of which gives a gloomy perspective to future times. Excuse this scrawl, and believe me with esteem

Your humble servant,

PATRICK HENRY, JR.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, ELEVENTH MONTH 1, 1846

RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION OF THE NEGROES.—A book of thirty-six pages octavo has been sent us, containing the "Eleventh Annual Report of the Association for the religious instruction of the negroes in Liberty county, Georgia," being for the year 1845, and bearing the imprint Savannah, Office of P. G. Thomas, 1846. It opens with this exordium:—

"Another year has rolled over us. The great drought which has rested upon the earth, has been but an emblem of the spiritual drought which has rested upon our Zion. Yet the mercies of God, abounding beyond our expectations, and immeasurably beyond our deserts, demand of us gratitude and repentance, and resolutions of greater fidelity, and devotion in time to come."

The Society has been operating, as the title of these reports indicates, for the instruction in religious knowledge of the people of colour, during the past eleven years. Its President, Robert Quarterman, its Vice President, J. S. K. Axon, and its Missionary, Chas. C. Jones, are clergymen. Its remaining Officers, six in number, appear to be laymen. The report was prepared by the society's missionary in a manner creditable to his zeal and ability, and furnishes details of much interest, not only in respect to the operations of the society itself, but also in relation to those which are going on in the South generally, in reference to the religious training of the slave and coloured population.

The county, to which the care of this society is specially directed, contains a population of 1,854 free whites, 24 free negroes, and 5,493 slaves. "The people," is a term very frequently used in the report instead of slaves, and with great fitness certainly, in view of their superior numbers, though the idea we of the North attach to the designation implies sovereignty.

Two modes, independent of what may exist in particular families, are resorted to for imparting religious instruction to the blacks. One of these is public preaching—the other is “Sabbath schools.” Within a portion of the county, which contains 4,880 slaves, and embraces an area of 25 miles long by 15 broad, are twelve houses of public worship in which the seats set apart for negroes are estimated at 2,000. The opening of these houses is so alternated “as to accommodate and bring the gospel within the reach of the whole population” within a succession of two or three weeks. “From November to May” there is an average weekly attendance of from 8 to 900 negroes, and “from May to November” the average attendance is from 1,200 to 1,300, of whom one-third are children. This class of attendants is considered an entire gain since the operations of the society commenced, and there is a considerable increase of adult attendance.

Some of the negroes are described as being extremely regular in attending public worship; others irregular, and many as wholly neglecting the duty. No planter in the county is known to interpose the least obstacle to the attendance of his people, or “to require labour of them on the Sabbath, beyond ordinary and necessary attention to stock and household duties,” “the plantation people” being “all at leisure, and the family servants taking turns to remain at home on the Sabbath.”

The report asserts that “on no plantation is the work so weighty as to unfit the people for public worship.” Their labour “ends with the evening twilight,” and even “in a vast majority of cases, before the sun is down.” This is “universally so in the warmer seasons of the year, and, for weeks together, they have, as their own, hours of sunlight every day. From the close of the labours of one day to the beginning of the labours of another, the time of the people is their own.” It therefore attributes their absence from public worship to the same causes which influence all labouring and mechanical classes to a neglect of it. “The Sabbath is their day of rest, of recreation and enjoyment, and they are at home with their families, or abroad luxuriating in forbidden indulgences, and in freedom from occupation and care. It is a problem in benevolence not yet solved—how shall these masses ever be brought under the sound of the gospel on the Sabbath day?”

That the people have for themselves, occasionally, hours of sunlight, we think quite possible. It might be difficult to find occupation for their whole time in winter, and imprudent to impose it in the extreme heats of summer. We are skeptical of any avoidable remission of their toil, whilst of this we feel confident, that were our missionary friend to take his station at the side of the slave, and work with him but for a few days in a Georgia cotton field, under a Georgia sun, he would soon thereafter reconstruct his sentence regarding the weight of the labour imposed upon him.

Pressing on “Christian owners” the duty of laying before their people the advantage and necessity of public worship, the report says—“We cannot be too solicitous about it, for the faith of the negro comes emphatically ‘ex naribus,’ and unless they are found in the house of God, the prospect of their salvation is dark indeed!”

Besides preaching at the stationary places of public worship, plantation meetings are resorted to as a means of imparting instruction to many old and decrepid persons, as well as to many, both old and young, who from year to year do not hear the gospel preached except when it is preached on the plantation where they reside.—Twenty-one such meetings are reported to have been held during the course of the year, and to their influence, as well upon the people as upon their masters and mistresses, awakening the latter to a conscientious discharge of their duties to the former, much good is attributed. Whether such meetings are ever held on any days of the week, which would diminish to the master or mistress the avails of the slaves’ toil, we are uninformed.

It is suggested in the report “that every plantation ought to have a chapel, or a room fitted up for the accommodation of the people in their social worship.” For the want of such accommodation, numerous inconveniences are now shown to exist, and “a chapel,” says the report, “adds much to the finish of a plantation, even if an owner would do no more than consult appearances.”

In the circumstances in which the people are placed, their proper instruction and management, when professedly under serious impressions, is represented as involving great difficulty. The prominent causes of it appear to be the inability of the people to read the Scriptures of Truth, and the ignorance of their coloured co-religionists and instructors. Remedies for the latter are suggested and discussed, but not for the former. The report describes the awakened individuals as “distressed souls, unable to read the Word of God, and to search for themselves, and to receive light from the great fountain itself.” To those who consider it right to attach these high appellatives to the Bible, we think the duty of endeavouring instantly to remove all impediments to the outflowing of that light, ought to be apparent.

Within the range of the society’s operations are nine “Sabbath schools,” under the care of 34 teachers, with an average attendance of 647 coloured pupils, adult and juvenile. Of the aptitude of the scholars to receive instruction, repeated testimony is furnished. At the Wallhouseville Sabbath school, with an average of about 100 attendants, the scholars sustained an examination on the ground passed over with great credit to themselves, and teachers. At the Jonesville Sabbath school, where from 50 to 60 scholars were present, the scholars were prompt and perfect in their answers, and their progress encouraging. At the Gravel Hill Sabbath school, from 30 scholars to 40 and upwards, attended, and most of them appeared anxious to receive instruction. They were examined from the beginning to the end of the Catechism, the most important questions being selected. The white congregation were astonished at their promptness, and the correctness of their answers. At the Midway Sabbath school, where the average attendance was about 60, parents as well as children appeared to desire a knowledge of the Holy Scriptures. The number of adults, who took part in the exercises, was frequently almost as great as that of the children.—The Colonel’s Island Sabbath school with 80 scholars, one half of whom are adults, is taught by two ladies, aided by their children. “The attendance of the people is voluntary, their improvement satisfactory, and their sobriety and order without the least interruption, although no gentleman was ever present at any one meeting.” “In how many parts of our country,” says the report, “might not similar schools be established by pious and energetic females, which would confer blessings upon thousands ready to perish? And how many mothers might, by the blessing of God, in this manner bring up their sons and daughters to self-denying labours, and cultivate in them that benevolence of heart which would fit them for stations of eminent usefulness in the world?” The suggestion, we hope, will be carried out to a yet greater extent, and with greatly extended usefulness. In works of mercy, women and youth are fit and frequent pioneers.

With that warmth of feeling which characterizes the report, and certainly outlives the reporter to our high esteem, the details of the Sabbath schools in this locality are concluded by the following remarks—“May we not indulge in feelings of gratitude at the numbers brought under the most efficient means of instruction which we can employ for our coloured population? Shall all the seed thus sown in young and susceptible minds be lost? Shall the many fervent prayers offered to God by pious and engaged teachers receive no answer from the Lord? We dare not believe it. Though fruit appear not to reward our labours now, yet we will in faith ‘cast our bread upon the waters, for we shall find it after many days.’”

We have been accustomed to consider the establishment of “First-day or Sunday schools,” in their original intention of imparting to the poor, in the absence of other opportunities for improvement, during the week, the elements of literary and moral instruction, and especially of enabling them to read the Holy Scriptures, as replete with Christian beneficence; and to regard with nearly similar feelings the extension of the plan to children of every class in society who have made literary advancement elsewhere, so as to give to their attainments a pious tendency. Instruction in reading, or its direction into right channels, and the possession and use of books, are predicated of the “Sunday school system.” “Search the Scriptures” is its polar star!

In our first cursory glance at the array of “Sabbath schools” brought by this report to our vision, we supposed that all the concomitants of the system advocted to, would be found in these schools. We wondered at the brilliant light that was bursting forth on the hitherto benighted slaves, and saw in it a new era, in which, sitting under her own vine, with the volume of Holy Scripture in her hand, Ethiopia should stretch forth her hands unto God! In the simplicity of our hearts we believed, for the moment, that the slave was now to be taught to read, and the shackles removed from his mind in that dark region of Georgia, however they might yet be suffered to remain on his body! Alas, the vision was but for a moment. On reglancing at the 6th page of the book, the adverb only, a little word speaking a big truth, suddenly struck upon our view, and our hearts fell within us. The slave was only to read the words of the inspired volume through the eyes, and the hearts, and the interests of others. What of Christianity would constrain him into a peaceful endurance of his wrong? was to be taught him. What would open to his view the brotherhood and equality of mankind, and especially of Christians, among whom none was to be called Master, was to be, or would be, withheld from him!

We copy below a portion of the report alluding to the restriction of the slaves to oral instruction. It is extracted from a statement made by Josiah S. Law of his missionary labours on behalf of the negroes during a portion of the year 1845.

"In May last," says the narrator, "I attended the Southern Baptist Convention in Augusta, called by the southern and south-western Baptist church, to take into consideration the expediency of separating from the Baptist churches in the non-slaveholding States, and forming a distinct organization for missionary purposes. Among other interesting and important matters brought before the body, was the religious instruction of the coloured population. I was highly gratified to witness the feeling and interest manifested. The Convention unanimously framed a resolution instructing the Board of Domestic Missions to take all prudent measures for the religious instruction of our coloured population. From this Convention, I went to Forsyth, and attended the Baptist Georgia Convention. During the sittings of this body, the subject was brought before it on the report of the committee on the state of religion, in which report a plan of religious instruction, similar to that in this county, was recommended. There was strong opposition by one or two laymen to the plan, but none to the giving religious instruction simply by preaching. I found all the ministers with whom I conversed, strongly in favour of the proposed plan, and though that part of the report was stricken out, yet they resolved to carry it out, as far as practicable, among the people for whom they laboured. Since the meeting of the Convention, I have learned with pleasure, that the Central Baptist Association in this State, at its last meeting, recommended to the churches composing it, to find out and adopt the best plan for giving religious instruction, orally, to the coloured people. The pastors of some of these churches are now actively engaged in carrying out this recommendation; and from their known faithfulness and perseverance, I have no doubt much will be accomplished by them. The cause is certainly moving onward. The Lord is for it. Who then can be against it?"

We do not mean to impute insincerity to, or derogate in any degree from the claims to piety of the several persons immediately connected with this enterprise of enlightening, though but orally, the minds of the slaves. We have already testified our respect for the missionary, to whose pen we are indebted for a report which fully establishes the capacity of the slaves for receiving instruction, and thus their right to have it. He has done a good work in this respect, and in behalf of humanity, we thank him for it. He and they may have gone to the extent of their powers in the performance of what they are now accomplishing, and so long as their feelings are in antagonism to the withering system of slavery, which is crushing the mind and body of their fellow men, their piety will be safe from reproach and their consciences from stain. If, however, they use their position and influence to bolster up the system of gross iniquity which slavery is; aiming to serve, at once, that of God which is in the slave, and that of Mammon which is in the master, we believe that God will not accept their labour, but leave them to the enjoyment and reward of that SIMONY which they, in such case, will wholly represent. Let them beware that in their ministration of reconciliation of man to God, they shake not hands with the oppressor, and convert God's Truth, by their false application of it, into a Lie!

The report goes on to detail the progress of the work of religious instruction to the blacks in the southern and south-western States, and seeks to connect several revivals in religion in those States with the previous attention paid to that work in their respective vicinities. We cannot enter into the statistics the report furnishes, except to state the number of slaves in Christian fellowship, which we shall do in the sequel. From the facts presented, there appears to be resting on the conscience of the South a heavy sense of duty as to the education of the blacks;—sustified indeed by considerations of worldly expediency which has led it to accept the compromise of conducting that education orally. If conscience, however, is allowed to have its perfect work, it can not long be content with this trammel upon the religious right, which every slave has, to be taught to read, for himself, the precious words which are written in the Scriptures of Truth. Till this right is procured for him, we shall feel incredulous of the general efficacy of oral teaching, however faithfully it may be performed by some. What preaching and teaching often is, may be read in the following testimony of Frederick Douglass, who has experimentally felt and known, what is the law and what is the gospel of southern slavery:—"I have heard sermon after sermon preached to make me satisfied with my position as a slave, and to show that God intended me to occupy that position; and that my hope in time and for eternity depended upon my obedience to my master and my mistress."

If this statement needed verification, it is amply found in the following extracts from a printed volume of sermons prepared by a distinguished southern prelate, for rehearsal by masters and mistresses to their slaves. We derive them from a late speech of George Thompson, at Exeter Hall:—

"Having thus shown you the chief duties you owe to your great Master in heaven, I now come to lay before you the duties you owe to your masters and mistresses here upon earth. And for this you have one general rule that you ought always to carry in your minds, and that is, to do all service for them as if you did it for God himself. Poor creatures! you little consider when you are idle and neglectful of your masters' and mistresses' business, when you steal and waste and hurt any of their substance, when you are saucy and impudent, when you are telling them lies and deceiving them, or when you prove stubborn and sullen, and will not do the work you are set about without stripes and vexation—you do not consider, I say, that what faults you are guilty of towards your masters and mistresses, are faults done against God himself, who hath set your masters and mistresses over you in his own stead, and expects that you will do for them just as you would do for him. And pray do not think that I want to deceive you when I tell you that your masters and mistresses are God's overseers!—Christian ministers are commanded to 'exhort servants to be obedient to their own masters, and to please them well in all things, not answering them again, or gainsaying?' You see how strictly God requires this of you, that whatever your masters and mistresses order you to do, you must set about it immediately and faithfully perform it, without any disputing or grumbling, and take care to please them well in all things. And, for your encouragement, he tells you that he will reward you for it in heaven—because, while you are honestly and faithfully doing your master's business here, you are serving your Lord and Master in heaven. You see, also, that you are not to take any exceptions to the behaviour of your masters and mistresses, and that you are to be subject and obedient, not only to such as are good and gentle and mild towards you, but also to such as may be forward, peevish, and hard. For you are not at liberty to choose your own masters; but into whatever hands God hath been pleased to put you, you must do your duty, and God will reward you for it."

The climax is yet to come. Under the head of "Correction" the Bishop discourses as follows:—

"Now, when correction is given you, you either deserve it or you do not deserve it; but whether you deserve it or not, it is your duty, and Almighty God requires that you bear it patiently. You may, perhaps, think that this is a hard doctrine; but if you consider it right, you must needs think otherwise of it. Suppose, then, that you deserve correction, you cannot but say that it is just and right you should meet with it. Suppose you do not, or at least you do not deserve so much, or so severe a correction for the fault you have committed,—you, perhaps, have escaped a great many more, and are at last paid for all. Or suppose you are quite innocent of what is laid to your charge, and suffer wrongfully in that particular thing,—is it not possible you may have done some other bad thing which was never discovered, and that Almighty God, who saw you doing it, would not let you escape without punishment?"

All such preaching may reconcile the victim to the altar on which he is sacrificed, but what shall we say of the priest who officiates at the horrible translocation?

The report informs us, that within the Diocese of South Carolina, are 1636 coloured communicants of the Episcopal Church, and within the whole South 130,640 coloured communicants of the Methodist, and 100,000 coloured members of the Baptist Church. Nearly all of these are slaves, and liable to be severed from wife, husband, children, parents, friends, home, at the instant bidding of ruthless owners.

Do the southern churches intercede with the law-makers on behalf of their coloured members, that God's image may at least be respected in the members of his visible Church? Do they forbid masters and mistresses of their own communion to drag, as from the horns of the altar, and sell into remote bondage, with the recommendation that they are Christians, and therefore the better slaves, those with whom they have eaten bread and drunken wine "in remembrance" of a common Lord?

These are important questions, and such as the churches South ought to be able, if they are Christian churches, to answer affirmatively.

MINUTE OF LONDON YEARLY MEETING.—NEGRO AND ABORIGINALS FUND REPORT.—We take great pleasure in presenting these interesting papers to our readers. The abolition of slavery in the British Colonial possessions is to be attributed, in no small degree, to the active exertions, unwearied perseverance and noble liberality of Friends in England. But they are well aware that a people so long degraded and oppressed could not possess, or, at once, acquire, the means of educating their children and qualifying them for the full enjoyment and exercise of the rights which the British Government has accorded to them, as men and citizens. Our English brethren have, therefore, in the spirit of true Christian philanthropy, contributed most liberally to their aid; and not to theirs only: for a portion of the Fund has been appropriated to schools in Hayti and New Zealand. We regret that our space will not permit us to publish the correspondence on the distribution of the Fund. The assistance thus given appears to have been particularly seasonable in many instances and gratefully appreciated in all. It is gratifying to us to perceive,—and we think it must have been encouraging to Friends in England,—that the care exercised by the Committee to appropriate the Fund strictly in accordance with their religious principles, was satisfactory to the recipients of their bounty, and commended, as one of their correspondents remarks, “as wise, just and proper.”

An extract from a letter dated New Zealand gives a remarkable description of the natives of those islands, and will be read with interest.

“Education in New Zealand, like everything else, is of a very anomalous character with respect to system; nor, indeed, with the present habits of the people can it be otherwise. According to their means, they are a knowing people; as shrewd and intelligent as they are indoligent and attentive. Very few indeed of the missionaries have ever had to teach them their letters; and yet most of the New Zealanders between the ages of 10 and 40 or 50, are able to read the Testament with fluency; while most of the young men can write a legible, some of them a superior hand, either on the slate or on paper; and you would be surprised at the degree of correspondence which is carried on amongst them, the fact is, they have taught each other. Arithmetic they consider a mere plaything. Last week I sat up with three of them in a country village, till 2 o'clock in the morning: one of them knew simple Addition and Multiplication with the proofs; and with two examples each of Subtraction and of Short and Long Division, he could readily work those rules with accuracy. Indeed, they can learn anything as easily as they can plant potatoes. Of course you will observe at once, that this is a mere intellectual process, and as such is the lowest quality of that education which it is our desire and duty to furnish them with.”

CAPTAIN HANNUM AND THE FLYING FUGITIVE.—We give in another part of this journal the letter of Captain Hannum of the brig Ottoman, narrating his re-capture of the escaping slave. We have no words to express our indignation at his cold blooded description of the circumstances attending the re-capture, much less of the act itself, which for deep atrocity can only find its parallel in the hateful African man-hunt, without the mitigation which there exists in the inferior intelligence of the captives. When Cain murdered his brother Abel, the sad deed was without a remedy. The betrayed slave, though the victim of as horrible a crime, still lives, and Captain Hannum, repentant of the act, may yet rescue him. We wish him that happiness. All the wealth not of himself only, but of his gaily and wealthy accessories would be cheaply expended in that recovery, if necessary to its accomplishment.

DEATH OF THOMAS CLARKSON.—The arrival of the Caledonia brought us the intelligence of the death of our venerable and honoured friend Thomas Clarkson. This event took place at Playford Hall, near Ipswich, England, on Seventh day the 26th of the Ninth month last. He was born on the 28th of the Third month 1760, and had thus arrived at nearly the middle of his eighty-seventh year.

It appears that the health of our friend failed rapidly during the last three weeks of his life, and that he finally took to his bed just one week previous to his death. Until absolutely confined to his room, he continued to give his attention to matters of public good. From this time, however, it was observed that he did not enter upon external matters, but gave his mind much to prayer, and was unwilling to be interrupted in his prayerful thoughts upon the future. On the evening but one preceding his death, he subsided into an apparently unconscious sleep, during which he neither stirred nor spoke. On the succeeding evening with his physical powers much reduced, he roused up so as to call on some of his attendants by name, but without the ability to articulate his wishes to them for little matters to be done for his ease and comfort. He now spoke with imploring look, and with agitated and clasped hands, but was incapable of receiving or enjoying any attentions; and after some suffering relapsed into a calm, about ten minutes before his death, and then gently breathed his last.

Such is the account we have received of the last hours of this good man. Feeling as if present at the solemn closing scene, the language of our heart is “The Lord giveth and the Lord taketh away.” “If the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?”

THE WAR AGAINST MEXICO.—In our view, all wars are unchristian; but we regard the present war with Mexico as preeminently wicked and barbarous. It is a war of aggression and invasion, waged for the diabolical purpose of extending and perpetuating American slavery. It is well known that the proximate cause of the war was the Annexation of Texas, and the immediate occasion of hostilities was the invasion, by American troops, of Mexican territory; yet the Washington Union, understood to be the Government paper, declares “the sole object of our war—a just and honourable peace, with proper security against a repetition of Mexican outrages.”

The American troops have taken possession of Monterey, Santa Fe and Chihuahua, but not without great sacrifice of human life at Monterey. Speaking of the capture of that town, the New York Tribune says:

“That the Mexicans have made a more gallant and obstinate resistance at Monterey than was at first anticipated in this country, is certain. The three days’ fighting, the heavy loss of our troops, (obviously not exaggerated in the accounts which have reached us,) and the terms of capitulation, all testify that the badly armed, worse fed, undisciplined Mexicans have fought better than the character they have borne among us would give reason to expect. True, they fought for their hearths, their altars, their national integrity, their wives and children, while our soldiers fought for—what? How stands the account in the books of the Recording Angel?”

“It does seem to us that no considerate man, who believes that the Universe has a Ruler, would willingly become responsible for the sufferings of one thousand human beings, the deaths of probably half that number, the robbing and ravaging of a populous Christian city, with the innumerable bereavements and agonies therewith connected, for all the power of Polk or the fame of Napoleon. None can say that these Mexicans in Monterey have deserved death at our hands; none can fail to see that they were defending their own soil; we think most would prefer to have fallen with them in defeat rather than have died in the arms of victory among the exulting invaders. And can any one believe that the responsibility of all this horror is not charged somewhere? Corporations are said to have no souls; Nations often act as if they had none; but Divine Justice is not thereby defrauded. Every citizen of the United States who has in any manner cheered on the clamor of war—who has not done what he lawfully could to arrest it—is to some extent a part-taker in the guilt of these awful butcheries, and therefore responsible before Heaven.

“We trust the thirst for slaughter is now satiated, and that our Government will make open and favourable proffers of Peace to Mexico—proffers which the world will say she honourably may and ought to accept. Mere professions of a willingness to treat are not sufficient. Let the terms on which we will make Peace be submitted to the impartial judgment of mankind, and let us at any rate refrain from further slaughter except in our own defence. We do not need the territory of Mexico; we should hardly consent to incorporate her people with ours on terms of perfect equality, and we have no right to subject them to a Government which they have no hand in directing. We can gain nothing by further invasion and offensive warfare that we ought to desire. Peace! Peace! give us Peace! Has there not been enough of human slaughter in such a cause as this?”

In the case of nations, as of individuals, the commission of one crime leads to another; small, at first, may be the departure from truth and right, but each subsequent step in the downward career will be marked by constantly increasing turpitude, until utter corruption is reached at last.

The following remarks are copied from the Washington correspondence of the New York Journal of Commerce:

“It is now the general belief and expectation that the United States will retain, govern, settle, and occupy the territory that they conquer, or so much of it as may be convenient or valuable to them, on account of its products, situation, or commercial facilities. No one supposes or will admit that we are to make peace without retaining the Californias. But there are other provinces of equal value to us, and which we have just as good a right to retain. If the war continues, it is a matter of certainty that the public mind will become resolved to conquer and retain all Mexico.

“Let it be observed how much the tone of the public feeling, of the government organs, and of public men, have changed on this subject since the war began. Towards the close of the late session the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means stated that the war would be ended by us as soon as Mexico would give us the Rio Grande for a boundary, and recognize our just claims for the spoliation of our citizens. If to this the Government added the Californias, it was intended, no longer ago than in July, to pay Mexico for them. But the whole face of the matter is now changed. Our demands now embrace all that we are obliged to conquer, and that will speedily be the whole of Mexico.

"No question occurs to the public mind as to the morality of this thing. The contempt that our people have for the Mexican race or races, does not allow them to consider this point. But they look to one fact. The Spanish Americans have boundless territories which they do not occupy and cannot improve. They have possessed the country for three centuries, and it is now less populous and no more cultivated than at the time of the conquest by Cortez. Our people, therefore, go to Genesis, with Mr. Adams, and claim Mexico, as he did Oregon, under our title to subdue the earth, and replenish it. It was by this and no other title that the Pope assumed to give Mexico to Spain. For three centuries the Spanish race have held the country, and have neither subdued nor replenished it; our army of invasion, therefore, goes into Mexico with a writ of quo warranto, to ascertain by what warrant she exercises her power. She can show no title under her original charter."

THE ELECTIVE FRANCHISE IN THE STATE OF NEW YORK.—Under the present Constitution of New York, "men of colour" who "shall have been for three years citizens of the State, and for one year next preceding any election, shall be seized and possessed of a freehold estate of the value of two hundred and fifty dollars, over and above all debts and incumbrances charged thereon, and shall have been actually rated and paid a tax thereon, shall be entitled to vote at any such election."

In the Convention recently engaged at Albany in altering the Constitution, efforts were made, on the one hand, to deprive the coloured citizens of their franchise, even with this property qualification; and, on the other hand, to place them on equal ground with the white citizens. These efforts failed, and it was agreed to submit the question to the decision of the people, as follows:

"Resolved, That at the next general election, and at the same time when the votes of the electors shall be taken for the adoption or rejection of the amended Constitution, the additional amendment in the words following—

"§ Coloured male citizens, possessing the qualifications required by the first section of the second article in the Constitution, other than the property qualification, shall have the right to vote for all officers that now are, or hereafter may be, elective by the people after the first day of January, 1847—shall be separately submitted to the electors of this State for adoption, or rejection, in form following to wit:

A separate ballot may be given by every person, having the right to vote for the amended Constitution, to be deposited in a separate box.

Upon the ballots given for the adoption of the said separate amendment, shall be written or printed, or partly written and partly printed, the words,

"Equal suffrage to coloured persons?—Yes."

And upon the ballots given against the adoption of the said separate amendment, in like manner, the words,

"Equal suffrage to coloured persons?—No."

And on such ballots shall be written or printed, or partly written and partly printed, the words,

"Constitution: Suffrage."

In such manner that such words shall appear on the outer side of such ballot when folded.

If, at the said election, a majority of all the votes given for and against the said separate amendment shall contain the words 'Equal suffrage to coloured persons?—Yes,' then the said separate amendment, after the first day of January, 1847, shall be a separate section of article second of the Constitution, in full force and effect, anything contained in the Constitution to the contrary notwithstanding."

We copy under the head of Selections a part of the report of the debate in the Convention, to show the kind of arguments used by those who would deprive a portion of our citizens of their rights, because they have "a skin not coloured like our own."

In connection with this, will be found in the department for communications, an impressive and powerful appeal to the voters of the State of New York, by an evervigilant friend of the slave.

SELECTIONS.

LETTER OF ISAAC E. MORSE.

BALTIMORE, Oct. 12, 1846.

To the Editor of the N. Y. Herald.

SIR—In looking over the files of the New York Tribune, I find the following paragraph, extracted from a speech delivered by me in Congress on the 11th of Jan. 1845, with the annexed commentary:—

"WHAT SLAVEHOLDERS! THINK OF SLAVERY.—Mr. Isaac E. Morse, of Louisiana, in a speech in Congress, January 11, 1845, said:—

"He denied the principle which seemed to be assumed here as a thing conceded, namely, that slavery was an evil. He insisted that it was no evil; on the contrary, it was the greatest blessing which God Almighty himself could have ordained for the protection and safe-keeping of a large mass of human beings who were incapable of maintaining and preserving themselves."—Appendix Cong. Globe, vol. 14, p. 92.

"We find the above floating about in the newspapers. It is calculated to create or confirm false impressions. Some slaveholders think as Mr. Morse does; more, we believe, of those who think at all, consider slavery as a great evil, but one not to be easily abolished. It is wrong, therefore, to say that slaveholders think this or that of a topic whereon their opinions are divided. Mr. Morse is a New England Yankee, who has chosen to live in Louisiana, and become an extensive slaveholder there; and such are apt to glorify slavery more than those born to it—in part, to drown self-reproaches; but more probably to dissipate the suspicions with which they are apt to be regarded by those born slaveholders, who naturally think all Northern men are anti-slavery, or ought to be."

"Mr. Morse, it need hardly be said, is harmful of democracy and all that."

Now, although my individual opinions upon the subject of slavery may be of very little importance to the public, and the place of my nativity touchless, still a respect for truth induces me to ask the favour of an insertion in your paper of a few remarks upon this subject. I avail myself of the Herald as much on account of its extensive circulation as of its impartiality. In the first place, Mr. Morse is not a New England Yankee, nor were the sentiments contained in his speech upon the Texas question uttered "in part to drown self-reproaches; but more probably to dissipate the suspicions with which they are apt to be regarded by those born slaveholders, who naturally think all Northern men are anti-slavery, or ought to be."

These sentiments are the deliberate and matured opinions of a man who has seen the white slaves and serfs of Europe, and who reiterates another opinion, that the slaves of Louisiana are better fed, better clad, do less work, and are a great deal more intelligent than the operatives in the factories of Europe, as I shall endeavor to show in another part of this communication.

The great length of the last session of Congress prevented my return to Louisiana, and the interval has been employed in recruiting my health, for another arduous session, and in making observations upon the opinions of our friends of the Northern States, upon the subject of slavery and abolition, which I hope may be useful not only to my own constituents, but to the South generally.

I might have availed myself of the privilege of making a "personal explanation" from my seat in Congress, and have given my views at length, but personal explanations to me are at all times extremely disagreeable, and not approving of the custom of using the time of the public in discussing private concerns, a custom infinitely "more honoured in the breach than in the observance," I take the usual way of correcting any misapprehensions in relation to myself, my opinions, and particularly my motives.

It need not be concealed that the abolition feeling has been greatly strengthened and extended throughout the entire North. What formerly was confined to a few insignificant misguided fanatics, agents and creatures of the English government, now infects the high places of the republic, is heard from the pulpit, in the fourth of July orations, at the exhibitions of our colleges, in the councils of the nation, as seen in the vote of the House of Representatives upon striking out the slavery clause from the constitution of Florida; and still more recently in the vote on Wilmot's resolution, when, with a majority of 65 members friendly to the administration, the supplies were refused the President, unless accompanied with an act that violated the letter and the spirit of the Missouri compromise. Whether that vote or the patriotic speech of John Davis of Massachusetts is chargeable with the blood of the five hundred men killed and wounded at Monterey, I have not now the time or the inclination to discuss. Time has the Missouri compromise been openly and palpably violated; a compromise, so called, where every thing is yielded on one side and nothing on the other, viz.:—that slavery shall never exist north of a certain line, but free States may exist either North or South.

I understand that the paternity of that resolution (Wilmot's) is disputed at the West, and several gentlemen expect to transmit their names to posterity by their connexion with it. The spirit of that resolution is one that binds indissolubly abolition and dissolution of the Union together. I envy no man the wreath that shall encircle his brow, who achieves this double triumph. It is not the first time in the annals of the world that notoriety has been mistaken for fame. "The aspiring youth who fled the Ephesian dome, outlives in story the pious fool that raised it." Be mine the meed of self-applause, with the untold name of that pious fool that stayed for one day, one hour, one minute, the fall of this great temple of civil and religious liberty.

I repeat it, abolition and disunion go hand in hand. If our Northern friends do not make the issue, we will, and I appeal to all good men of the republic North and South. Let us have no more talking and acting in the dark. Are you ready and willing to sever this Union for the cause of abolition? Is the toleration of slavery in one portion of the Union a greater evil to you than the dismemberment of the republic? Are your consciences so nice that you will no longer hold communion with Southern men who hold slaves? Do you hold slavery in such abhorrence that you will buy our slaves at our estimation and free them? Or will you fight for the abolition, and to make no converts to your notions of liberty? For, talk and turn it as you will, "to this complexion must it come at last." Do you think that all the talking, preaching and writing in the world will ever induce men with common sense to surrender their property, for which they periled life in two wars, and will do so again? Was there ever an instance of a whole State or community having been talked or preached out of their property? The English government, because might made right, freed the slaves of the colonists; but with the slightest prospect of success, does not every man in the world know the colonists would have defended their rights at the point of the bayonet? "Who can hold fire in his hand, by thinking on the frosty Caucasus—or wallow naked in December's snow, by bare reflection on the summer heat?" That man may be persuaded to surrender the fruits of years of industry, or the inheritance of his ancestors, for a conscientious scruple in another man's bosom, and one which never troubled the repose of the greatest and the best men in the republic, and which is sanctioned by God himself.—Credat Judæus, non Ego.

If these questions are to be answered affirmatively—if it is a fixed fact that slavery must be abolished in the United States, the sooner we know it the better. We have no apprehensions on the subject. But let us see how the thing works, whether our brethren at the North are not somewhat in the situation of the fox who was to have his tail cut off because another had done the same thing, and whether England, after ruining uselessly her West India colonies, is not the fox who had lost his tail.

It will no doubt be frankly admitted that there is no danger, however we may extend the area of slavery South; of our forcing slavery upon any free State, if we had the power, and therefore, the sin alone is on our own heads. I have never had a doubt but that the whole of this movement is of foreign origin. England knows that this is the only possible weak point in the Union, and if she could induce a separation of the States, she must be greatly benefitted by such an event. Who does the carrying trade for the South—the millions of bales of cotton; the hundreds of thousands of hds. of tobacco, of sugar, of rice, besides the return price of all this produce in English and American manufactures, besides the profits which you make in the manufactory of the cotton of the South? Why, New England derives more profit from supplying the Slave States with the commerce of her soil than the Slave States do themselves. I have no reliable statistics about me, but I do not hesitate to assert that the revenues received in New England from the product of slave grown articles is greater than the value of the articles themselves. Let Maine answer, with her overwhelming tonnage. Let every town and vill in New England respond. But perhaps it is thought you can raise three millions of bales of cotton, a half million of hds. of tobacco, two or three hundred thousand hds. of sugar and rice, et multæ alius, with free labor, and you can yet get this trade. Go and try it, ye hardy mountaineers of New England. It is false, as is pretended, that you are excluded from any country by the Missouri compromise. Go and cultivate California, Mexico, and if you want free States, so decide—nothing can prevent it.

I despise cant of every kind, and I say at least for myself, and I have no doubt I speak the voice of the entire South, that we will never permit our slaves to be liberated, directly or indirectly, presently or prospectively, without making the best resistance that we can, and that we would rather die in the last ditch than surrender, not our property, but the principle on which we hold it.

You can never take our property without our lives; but let me say what you can do, and what, if you persist in breaking down all agreements and compromises on this subject, you will do—you will make the tenure by which we hold our property so unstable that the advantages of the Union cease to be of value, and when that day comes I tell you what we can do—we can make a treaty with England, or any other nation in Europe, by which the right to our slaves shall never be questioned, and by which we can receive all the manufactures of England at a reasonable duty, and she will buy our cotton, do our carrying trade, and in fact become to us what New England is now; and such a step the South can take in six weeks, and the English navy would be ready and willing to defend such a treaty of reciprocity, if necessary.

The English people have paid enough in the utter destruction of her West India colonies and trade, and in the discriminating duties on sugar, for abolition, and they are getting very tired of it. That such a step may never be necessary on our parts, is the second wish of my heart; the first is, that we may be secured in life, liberty, and the possession of our property.

I have occupied so much of your paper that I will not attempt to discuss the proposition that our slaves are more intelligent than the operatives in the manufactories of Europe. I will only mention one single fact witnessed by a large party of Americans in Manchester, in 1832. It happened that a number of our countrymen were in Manchester when the celebration of the reform bill took place, and those poor operatives had a holiday from their sixteen hours of labor, (for the number of persons, men, women and children used up by their system of white slavery had not aroused the public indignation,) and consequently the streets were filled with them.

Having invitations to a large museum in that place, I asked twenty-two persons in the streets and on the square, where it was situated, and not one single person could inform me, and a large majority of them born, raised there, and working in the factories. Very few of them even knew the meaning of the word, and gazed in stupid astonishment.

I venture to assert, (and any man can try it in New Orleans) that there is not one slave in ten in that city, who has been there six months, who will not tell him the name and situation of every public building in the city. One word more and I have done. If our Northern brethren are so conscientious, and they are willing to invoke all these calamities on our happy country to effect their end—if they are sincere and honest, let me say this to them: there is a very easy way to get rid of slavery in the United States without interfering with us, without doing one single thing that the nicest caviller could censure, and which I believe in sober seriousness will effect your object as certain as day succeeds night, and which, though it may entail ruin and distress upon a large portion of your fellow-citizens, they have no right to object to, or complain of—"Touch not, taste not, handle not" one single product of slave labour.

Very respectfully, your ob't servant,

ISAAC E. MORSE.

[So—so—it has come to this. Isaac E. Morse, and those slaveholders whom he represents, while they so fully believe in the industry and energy of abolitionists, as to admit that "what was formerly confined to a few insignificant, misguided fanatics, now infests the high places of the republic, is heard from the pulpits, in the fourth of July orations, at the exhibitions of our colleges, in the councils of the nation"—have no confidence in their deep conscientious abhorrence of slavery. They believe that appeals to northern cupidity, as regards manufactures and the carrying trade, will turn aside the power that even now is sweeping on to hurl down their system. The fear of the loss of "Maine's overwhelming tonnage" is to steel the hearts of Northern men against the cry of the oppressed and suffering. And so confident are they in this thing, that under cover of advice they even taunt abolitionists with their selfish inconsistency, believing in their hearts, that low selfishness is the Universal God. Abolitionists have yet to prove to them that however desirable "Maine's tonnage" may be, it is valueless in comparison with clear hands and pure hearts. They must take up the slaveholder's challenge, and by acts that speak louder than words, respond to it by indeed abstaining from all that connexion with slavery, which by its comity, use, commerce, or any other lure, hardens hearts, blinds eyes, and bribes and lulls consciences in its favour. Let abolitionists prove that their earnestness is not energy merely, but that it is a power so deep rooted in their souls as to far underlie convenience, pride, or love of wealth, and can act just as potently when none are present to stimulate as when the eyes of thousands are upon it, and Isaac E. Morse and his colleagues will either side with us—hating slavery as warmly as they now love it and themselves abstaining from its products, or, if standing in their present position, not even admitting abstinence to be a legitimate result of anti-slavery principles. As long as men do not expect to be incommoded by any abstract opinions they hold, or advice they offer, they can afford to seem noble; but let there be a prospect that their views will be carried out, and lo! how they shrink from the light. Abolitionists who do not abstain from slave-produce, are in this latter category. They know the wrongfulness of slavery, and the wrongfulness of employing men to hold slaves for them, and yet appetite, pride, love of ease, and love of gain, are too strong for their faith. Maine's overwhelming tonnage wins the day in their hearts.

Eda. Non-Slaveholder.]

DEBATE ON THE ELECTIVE FRANCHISE IN THE NEW YORK CONVENTION.

The report of the committee No. 4 was then taken up. Mr. Kennedy, in behalf of the chairman of the committee, explained the object of the committee in reporting the section as it stood.

They omitted the qualification of property from the consideration that this was an odious and cruel provision. The coloured man should either be excluded on account of his race, or otherwise admitted to the enjoyment of the same rights and privileges with the white population. He drew a distinction between civil and natural right. The one was indelible, and made no distinction in age, sex, colour, or nativity. If suffrage was a natural right, then women and children might claim its enjoyment. Civil rights were those bestowed by the Government, and it could limit and restrict them. If the number enjoying this right was too small, it should not be increased by bestowing it upon those who are foreigners in our midst. The coloured man, by the strong marks which nature had placed upon him, was evidently a distinct race; and was, from his inferior qualifications of mind and habits of life, separated from us by an impassable bar. The mind revolted from the broad proposition which was presented to admit the Ethiopian to occupy the same position in all respects with ourselves.

Mr. Dana followed, expressing his belief that there were rights which were neither strictly natural or civil. He defended the coloured man from the representation of Mr. Kennedy, and said, if that gentleman still declared himself the friend of that race, they might well pray to be saved from such friends. He (Mr. D.) was willing to recognize the full political rights of the negro, and he would as soon vote to destroy the privileges of his own children, (whom he loved with an affection as strong as a father could have for his offspring,) as to cast down the rights of his coloured brethren. He was surprised that the proposition to admit to the rights of the franchise seven thousand coloured men, should frighten forty thousand chivalrous white men in this State.

Mr. Briggs made an explanation, and went on to remonstrate earnestly against the putting through of a question of so much importance by the spur of the previous question. The Convention had occupied days and weeks upon the comparatively insignificant question of the union of the practice of law and equity; but when we came to the broad and universal subject of natural and political rights, it is to be choked off under the fifteen minute rule, and the application of the previous question. He called upon this Convention to decide whether the coloured people were men or not. If so, admit them to enjoy the common rights of man, or otherwise make them slaves to yourselves and your children, and trample them in the dust forever. Pretend no longer to have sympathy and respect for them, while thus denying them their just claims as men like ourselves. He renewed the previous question, according to his engagement.

Mr. Hunt said, I feel bound, Mr. President, to offer a few words upon the subject of negro suffrage, and will come to the point at once. My doctrine, and the doctrine of my constituents, in relation to the right of suffrage, is briefly this—We want no masters, and least of all negro masters, to reign over us. We contend for self-government. We hold that no man who is not a part of the republic's self—who is not a bona fide citizen, shall have any voice in the State. We also concede to all other persons, and all other nations, in their respective spheres, the same rights we claim for ourselves. This is what we mean by equal rights. But we will sanction no confusion of rights. Rights are distinct as well as equal, and can only be exercised by the possessor within his own proper sphere. It does not follow that because a man has a right to put his hand in his own pocket he may thrust it in mine, or that because he has a right to participate in the government of his own nation he may take part in our government also. Such a doctrine would be fatal to all rights; and that, no doubt, is the reason why the enemies of democracy and of the rights of man, both in Old England and in New, are so zealous in insinuating it into weak minds in every part of the republic, and at every opportunity. They would fain cause the principle of equal rights to be carried to a ridiculous and unwarrantable length, in order to compass its destruction.

The fact that all men have a right to form themselves, or rather are formed by the operation of circumstances and the law of necessity, into distinct nations or states—that every nation has the right of self-government, without the interference of aliens or of other States, so long as it will take the trouble to exercise that right with any tolerable degree of wisdom and justice—these facts are so very obvious that I would not name them, were it not that the advocates of negro suffrage have such a wonderful faculty of forgetting them, or of leaving them out of sight. They forget that negroes are aliens—aliens, not by the mere accident of foreign birth—not because they speak a different language—not from any petty distinction that a few years association may obliterate, but by the broad distinction of race; a distinction that neither education, nor intercourse, nor time can remove—a distinction that must separate their children from our children forever.

I regret as much as any one, that this class of irreclaimable aliens is fastened upon us. If any good could come of wishing, I would wish as heartily as any one that the Ethiopian might change his skin, and become a part of our body politic. But all such wishes, and all efforts to realize them, are idle.—They may indicate a good disposition, but they do not indicate a very good head.

One thing is certain to my mind—that our past attempts to elevate the political or legal standing of our negroes have added nothing to their happiness. When our negroes were called slaves, they owned their masters almost as much as their masters owned them. Their cares and their hearts were lighter than now. They were more at liberty to act out their negro natures—to sing negro songs—to laugh at negro wit—to deck themselves with negro finery. Their present condition is analogous to that of a poor woman compelled by a visitation of sudden riches to court the fine lady. They are no longer free to be negroes, and they cannot be whites. We may close our eyes in a fit of amiable enthusiasm, and try to dream their wool out of curl; but our dream does them no good. They know and feel all the while, (that is, all some negroes,) that they are negroes and aliens by the act of God, and there is no remedy.

The greatest injury that any man can inflict upon his fellow, is to place him in a false and unnatural position—to tempt him into a path which he cannot travel, a sphere not his own; to seduce him into a war against his inevitable destiny, and thus destroy his powers of usefulness and his chances of happiness together. In my judgment, our negroes have thus been injured by their friends. They have been deluded with unreal hopes, and blinded to their true destiny—a destiny, as I read it, far from ignoble. For as they progress in knowledge, their pride will incite them to return to the home of their race, where they can hold the position of superiors and teachers. They have gained much by their intercourse with civilized men. They are no longer idolaters. They are no longer naked savages. They have made much progress in the arts and the learning of a superior race. They yet may—I believe they yet will—convey these arts and this learning to their uncivilized brethren. Instead of being mere recipients they will become imparters of light, and thus gratify the noblest ambition and perform the highest duty that man can feel or perform. Such is the path I would point out to them—the destiny I would aid them to accomplish.

I am aware that people in the country, who form their judgment of all negroes from perhaps a single sample, do not see the impossibility of naturalizing them so clearly as we do in New York. A negro placed beyond the influences of negro society is a very different being from those whose characters have been formed by contact and association with their own race. It should be remembered that the race at large do not, and never can, fully correspond with the isolated specimens of the country towns, and whose associations and training have been so different. And further, our coral fellow-citizens have not negroes enough among them to make it a matter of much consequence in their elections, whether they vote or not. It is not so in New York. There they would often hold the balance of power, and give laws to the whole city. But they could not govern us long. The people of the city would take the Government out of their hands by driving them from Manhattan Island. Such would be the practical operation of negro suffrage, I fear, in the city of New York.

One consideration more. No union can be advantageous or lasting, unless it be also fit and seemly. The Jews were forbidden to yoke animals of different kinds together; and if it be wrong to unite the cow and the ass in the same yoke, can it be right to unite the Caucasian and the negro race in the same Government?

To conclude. The reason why my constituents refuse to enter into a partnership with negroes in the business of Government is, that we can perform all our political duties better without their help than with it. We can preserve our popular institutions from subversion by aristocrats, and demagogues, and simpletons, much better without their help than with it. We do not wish to debase ourselves by any hypocritical professions of fellowship, or to give our hand where we cannot give our heart. We cannot acknowledge as co-citizens a class of men more widely separated from us than any other race upon the globe, and who cannot be naturalized by any fiat of law or lapse of time. We know that we put ourselves upon a par with negroes whenever we put negroes upon a par with us. We cannot enter into any political amalgamation with blacks. We will not meddle with their Government in St. Domingo, nor in Africa; and, if we can prevent it, they shall not meddle with ours.

Mr. Rhodes then continued the debate in reply to Mr. Hunt, and in favour of the amendment.

Mr. Waterbury said the Convention was about to vote upon a proposition which, if adopted, would place us upon the same footing as Vermont, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island. He thought we might with safety assume the position which they occupy. The gentleman from New York (Mr. Kennedy) had brought in the women and children to sustain his argument. But the wives and children of all our own white citizens were protected in their rights and privileges by husbands and brothers. Where do you find any one to stand up for the coloured man? Not one. The argument that because a race of men are marked by a peculiarity of colour, and crooked hair, they were not endowed with a mind equal to another class who had other peculiarities, was unworthy of men of sense. The negro race must always make a part of our population. Colonization would never transfer them all to their original country. As well might we attempt to drain out all the water of the ocean with a dipper. What position they would occupy he was not prepared to say, but he would remind gentlemen that those who were once slaves in Rome became freemen. The argument of the gentleman from St. Lawrence (Mr. Russell,) reminded him of the Pharisee who went into the temple to pray, and forgetting his errand, went on to brag how much better he was than other people.

THE CASE OF CAPT. HANNUM.

We have great pleasure in complying with the wishes of Capt. Hannum, of the brig Ottoman, by laying his letter before our readers.—N. Orleans Picayune.

Boston, Sept. 11, 1846.

Editors of the Picayune:—In my own native city, a refugee from the fury of the Abolitionists, I address you on a grave subject, though it has placed me in the midst of many a comical and ludicrous scene.

I arrived at your port on the 9th, and sailed on the 10th of August, in command of the brig Ottoman, for Boston. Seven days out a mulatto slave was found secreted in the fore peak; I kept a look-out at the mast-head, in the hope of finding some vessel by which to send him back, but unfortunately did not succeed; kept on my way, and arrived off Boston light, at 2 in the morning of the 7th. Here I placed the runaway on board of a pilot-boat, for safe keeping, till 4, A. M., the next day, when I arrived from town according to agreement, and took the darky in my boat, which contained, besides myself, a trusty friend, a boy of sixteen, and a boatman. Agreeable to arrangements in town, I was to await the bark Niagara, to sail next day for New Orleans. That night an easterly gale commenced, and next day no Niagara came. Unable to weather it any longer in the lower harbor, I kept her away for Spectacle Island. There, as ill-luck would have it, while taking "a drop of consolation" at the hotel, the negro gave me the slip, and with the boat made sail for South Boston Point; post haste we followed in another boat, but he landed about ten minutes ahead. We took after him, through corn-fields and over fences, till finally, after a chase of two miles, I secured him just as he reached the bridge. Accusing him of theft, I marched him, arm in arm, towards the Point, followed by a crowd of men and boys—a friend came up with a team, when I drove to the Point, and we took to our boats and were off.

The news of the escape and capture spread through the city—officers were despatched in all directions—$100 reward was offered for the "kidnapper-captain and pirate-boat Warren." That night we lay at anchor under Lovell's Island—the easterly blow continued—we dared not venture farther out. Next morning our case was desperate. Out of water and provisions, I beat down to the outer island in the harbor, (an uninhabited pile of barren rocks,) landed with the darkey and boy, and sent my companions to town for supplies and another boat, while we remained hid in the gullies of the rocks. They returned at night with the "Vision," the fastest sailer in the bay, and took us off. So hotly were they pursued in town, that the only refreshments they were enabled to obtain were gin and crackers, and on these we subsisted during the remainder of the expedition. We now stood for sea, and waited for the Niagara till 2, P. M., the next day, (the 12th,) when she came out in tow of a steamer. I put him on board as the steamer left, giving Capt. Rea letters explanatory of the whole affair. No sooner had I left the bark than I discovered a steamer making directly for us. Knowing that she could chase but one, I steered a course opposite to the Niagara, till the steamer came up and ordered me to heave to; this for some time I refused to do, wishing to delay them as long as possible, in order to give the Niagara a chance to get clear. Bayonets glistened in all parts of the boat; darkies were there of every hue, crying out, "Run him down," "Fire into him," &c. After this was hushed, and I had brought them to terms of civility, I hove to, and received on board two officers, who examined the craft; not finding the objects of their search, they went on board the steamer and put off for the bark; but they had wasted too much time with me—the Niagara was well out to sea with a fine breeze. The abolitionists, after chasing her a few miles, became sea-sick, and commenced casting up their accounts; the balance were in favour of returning home, and back they went, to wreak their vengeance on your humble servant—humble enough, God knows, though elevated to garret life.

Stigmatized as a slave-stealer at the South—branded as a kidnapper at the North—my situation is anything but enviable. The journals here are bitter against me, and accuse me of interested motives. On the contrary, with a hundred dollars reward against me, I have been obliged to spend a like sum in order to re-ship the negro to his master. John H. Pearson, Esq., a merchant of this city, well known for his integrity, sanctions my proceedings. This is my lengthy story; lay it before your readers, that they may know we are not all abolitionists, and that the reputation of our beautiful city may not suffer through their disgraceful proceedings.

Very respectfully yours, gentlemen,

JAMES W. HANNUM,

Master brig Ottoman.

HOW TO REFORM GOVERNMENT.

Existing governments have their merits. They might be worse than they are. They are as good as the great mass of the people demand, or are capable of appreciating. If full grown Christian constitutions were proffered to them, they would vote them down with contempt. If we could cheat them into the reception of one, they would not know how to live under it. Governments are correct exponents of the aggregate religious light, moral sentiment and intellectual development of the people living under them. People with a false and low religion, a false and low morality, a low and undeveloped intellect, will have a corresponding false and low organization of society, false and low government! An Esquimaux, Hottentot, or New Hollander, would devise and administer an Esquimaux, Hottentot, or New Holland government. The reason why we have not a Christian government is, that our people are not in the aggregate a Christian people. The aggregate religion is far below the Christian standard. The aggregate conscience and moral sentiment of the people are semi-barbarous. And their aggregate intellect is not yet sufficiently improved by knowledge and discipline to see how low their religion and morality are. They are, therefore, not even ashamed of war and slavery. They do not see that these gross abominations are their disgrace and curse. We have got to enlighten them, expand their intellect, purify their moral sentiment, quicken their consciences, and reform their religious ideas. This is not to be done by voting at the polls, by seeking influential offices in the government, and binding ourselves to anti-Christian political compacts. It is to be done by pure Christian precepts faithfully inculcated, and pure Christian examples, on the part of those who have been favored to receive and embrace the highest truths. They must hold up the true standard, let their light shine, and patiently persevere in the great work of creating a new heart and a new spirit in the people. They must do nothing to disparage or hinder whatever is good in the existing order of society and government. Still less must they do anything to hinder their own pure testimony; either by seditious opposition to government, or by voluntary participation in its sins. They must not falsify their principles by going with the government to do evil, nor in going against its wrongs by anti-Christian means, nor by contemning any thing in it which is right and good per se. This is the strait and narrow way of Christ.

When a considerable portion of the people have been enlightened and won over to Christian non-resistance, the tide of public sentiment will begin to set with such force against war, and the whole injury-inflicting system, that the less enlightened and less conscientious portion will insensibly yield to the current, and the relics of barbarism, one after another, be "cast to the moles and bats." Thus, ultimately, government will be christianised, and the most scrupulous disciples of the non-resistant Saviour feel at liberty to perform any service in it which the public good may require.

What a work is to be performed! It has commenced, and will progress much faster than either faint-hearted friends or unbelieving scoffers anticipate; though doubtless its consummation is at a great distance. In this view of the case, how supremely silly would it appear for a handful of non-resistants to run a tilt of politics, and harness themselves to the car of Juggernaut, in the hope of influencing the besotted multitude to renounce their idolatry! It would be treason to their cause, and ridiculous infatuation, for them to play such antics. Their mission is to "have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them." To teach, not number the people. To show forth a model of what ought to be—not conform to what is. To testify against spiritual wickedness in high places, and to cause the popular abominations of the land to be properly appreciated and utterly loathed. To scatter light and call the people to repentance. To reform our thirty thousand religious teachers, so that instead of patronizing, inculcating, apologizing for, consenting to, and pronouncing benedictions on military power and display, they may view and speak of it with the same abhorrence they now do of idol worship. To convert our hundreds of thousands of church members to that primitive Christianity, which served up the ancient disciples to say, in the face of threatened death—"I am a Christian, and cannot fight!" When we have done all this, we will begin to think about voting and accepting office in the government. We believe we shall then no longer be obliged to subscribe Constitutions which make our governors and presidents "commanders-in-chief of the Army," or which invest Congress with discretionary power "to declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal"—those flagrant crimes against God and humanity. If we should, why then, we would still ply our axe to the root of the tree, and non-participate till a better day had dawned on the world. Such is the method by which true Christianity teaches its disciples to reform government. True, it is not according to "the wisdom of this world, which is foolishness with God;" but it is according to "the wisdom that cometh down from above, which is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisy."—James 3: 17.—Christian Non-Resistance.

ABOLITIONISM RETARDING EMANCIPATION.

It is said that the Anti-Slavery agitation in the North has thrown back the cause of emancipation in the South, and the South are not now prepared to hear the truth on account of this agitation.

A few facts will show that the South were no better prepared to hear the truth before the Anti-Slavery agitation in the North, than they are now. More than forty years ago Father Gilliland established a Sabbath-school in North Carolina to teach the blacks to read the Holy Scriptures. It was disbanded by the slaveholders. About thirty years since Mr. John Rankin commenced a similar school near Lexington, Kentucky, which was soon broken up by an armed band of slaveholders. Some eighteen years ago, some of the members of the Strawberry Plains Church, East Tennessee, commenced instructing the colored people to read the scriptures. In a few months it was broken up by the slaveholders. About twenty years since, a Theological student by the name of Hill, made in Marysville seminary, East Tennessee, a few Anti-Slavery addresses. The surrounding country became so excited that for some time he dared not go out of the institution for fear of his life. About eighteen years ago, a young minister by the name of Eagleton, preached a sermon against slavery, in East Tennessee. For this his Presbytery took away his license to preach, and refused to return it again until he pledged himself not to preach any more against slavery. All these facts occurred where slavery is found in its mildest form. Many more might be given, but these are sufficient to show that the southern mind was no better prepared to receive the truth before the Anti-Slavery agitation in the North, than it now is. The fact is, the South has not been so well prepared to receive the truth respecting slavery for the last forty years as it is now. There are more decided Anti-Slavery men now at the South, and more is now doing to extend Anti-Slavery principles in the slave states, and these principles are better received than at any other time, as might be proved by almost any number of facts.

American Citizen.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FREE LABOUR GOODS.—Arrangements are in progress for the establishment of a FREE PRODUCE STORE, wholesale and retail, in co-operation with the Free Produce Association. It is desirable to know, so far as practicable, what amount of patronage may be relied upon. With this view it is suggested that measures be taken to ascertain who are the friends of the cause in the various sections of the country, and that the names and residences of those who desire to use the products of free labour in preference to those of slave labour, be collected and forwarded to George W. Taylor, No. 30 N. Fourth street.

GOODS MANUFACTURED FROM FREE LABOUR COTTON.—For sale by Thos. S. Field & Co. No. 30 N. Front street (top stairs) Philadelphia, belonging to the Free Produce Association of Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. "Manchester" Ginghams, two qualities, various patterns; Table Damper assorted widths, white and coloured; Canton Flannels solid-colored and coloured; coloured Cambrics and Prints; Apron checks, assorted plaids; 4-4 shirting and 5-4 sheeting Muslin; twisted Muslin and plaid cotton Flannel; cotton Lays, very superior; white and coloured Wadding; hose and half hose, very superior and heavy; knitting Cotton various numbers.

all ano. 50th.

FREE COTTON GOODS.

TO accommodate Friends and others who wish to supply themselves with free cotton goods, but cannot conveniently give or lend money to aid in the manufacture, the Finance Committee of Friends' Free Produce Association, propose to receive from such individuals any sum of money they may choose to advance, and furnish them with goods to the same amount when these are ready for sale.

ELIHU PICKERING,
S. ALLINSON, Jr.,
THOMAS WISTAR, Jr.,
GEORGE W. TAYLOR,
SAMUEL RHODES,

Committee.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER

Is published on the first of each month, at one dollar per annum for one copy, or five dollars per annum for six copies in one order, payable in advance. Abraham L. Pennock, Samuel Rhoads, and George W. Taylor, are the Editors and Publishers; either of whom will receive subscriptions, payments, and communications. Letters and papers addressed to them, or endorsed Non-Slaveholder, directed to box 777, Philadelphia Post Office, will duly reach them.

By decision of the Post Master General, the Non-Slaveholder is subject to newspaper postage only.

PRINTED AT
Merrihew & Thompson's Book & Job Office,
No. 7 Carter's Alley.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

"Whoso gives the motive, makes his brother's sin his own."

VOL. I.] PHILADELPHIA, TWELFTH MONTH, 1848. [NO. 12.

COMMUNICATIONS.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

THE CASE OF THE SLAVE IN THE UNITED STATES EXAMINED.

What is meant by slavery, as practised in this country?

It is one part of the community being held by another part as property; an article of merchandise; deemed such by the law of the land.

What length of time are these people necessitated to submit to be made merchandise?

During life, unless released by rebelling against government, or by the government repealing the tyrannical law which places and retains these persons in the character of property.

Has immorality or crime any bearing in rendering a person subject to enslavement?

Not in the least, far otherwise; so much so that though he be possessed of all the godliness and virtues of Noah, Job or Daniel, he is not, therefore, the less subject to the dreadful doom of enslavement.

In what, then, does the liability consist of being made a slave during life?

In being born of a slave mother having African blood.

Then are not children, very nearly white, liable to be enslaved?

Certainly: the master may even sell his own children into perpetual bondage, if born of a slave having African blood.

Do all the States in the Union sanction slavery?

No. Slavery is not tolerated in thirteen* of the States, in the other thirteen it is. And also in Texas, which has been recently annexed to the Union, and likewise in the District of Columbia.

* It cannot be said that slavery is not tolerated in Pennsylvania. By a law of this State, slaves may be held six months; thus it may happen that a slaveholder residing in Pennsylvania, and owning slaves in Maryland or Virginia, may hold slaves constantly in Pennsylvania, by simply changing the individuals semi-annually.—Eos.

Are not the free States in proportion to their number and influence, equally as responsible as the slave States for the continuance of slavery under the general government?

They most certainly are; this is indisputable.

Are not the victims of the slave system greatly increased every year?

They are; and from a small beginning have now attained the vast number of near three millions.

Is the slave permitted to present his grievances before the public, or have access to the legislature in petition for a repeal of the law in his case?

By no means. In fact, so far from this is his case, that he seems to be made to vote by means of his master for the perpetuity and security of his own sufferings and bonds.

Who, then, are responsible for the continuance of slavery and its attendant evils?

Those in the enjoyment of liberty; and to those only can the attention of the slave be reasonably directed for relief.

Are his hopes here misplaced?

If they are not, they have with small exceptions thus far met with disappointment.

What class is the most deficient in a due discharge of its responsibility to the slave and his oppressor—the religious sects, the statesmen, or those in the private walks of life?

With little exception, all these different classes in their different capacities, give nearly the same marked manifestation of disregard to the case of the afflicted slave.

Those statesmen whose constituents are principally the holders of slaves, seem ever vigilant in going to the utmost verge of their power in carefully guarding the system of slavery by every means human wisdom can devise, while the legislator from the non-slaveholding States seldom remembers the slave, only and so far as he deems will promote his own popularity. If, however, at any time he has been engaged for the slave upon pure motives, his efforts have been such as to give the most decisive evidence of being blinded and entangled by prejudice and partiality—hence the slaves' cause never fails to be made subservient to the claims of a political party.

The legislator has hitherto entirely failed to plant himself upon the broad firm ground of equal rights, in behalf of the slave.—He seems never to have thought, that the slave's claim to liberty is no less valid than his own.—He seems totally to have forgotten, that the most prominent feature of legislation should be, to guard and protect the rights of the weak against the invasions of the strong—he manifests gross ignorance of the injuries already inflicted upon the slave, by his willingness to compromise a part of the liberty which justice demands for him. Let the legislator be divested of prejudice and partiality, and he could not fail to stand up like a man and a brother, and present the claims of the enslaved with a weight and force as yet unknown. Feeling that these claims were only second in importance to life itself, he would forcibly impart and sensibly impress this feeling upon others within his influence. Standing upon this firm ground of justice and impartiality, he would feel impelled to present slavery in its true character of deformity, as one of the most complicated crimes ever committed by mortal man, and which, being persisted in, must prove a heavy scourge and curse to the nation.

What aid is the slave receiving from the religious associations of the day?

But little—these generally evincing in the case too much the disposition of the Priest and Levite, who passed by upon the other side. One would hardly suppose that any society formed professedly for the promotion and extension of the Christian religion, could fail to use its utmost influence by all Christian means, for the immediate extinction of slavery, especially when we recollect what godliness demanded, even in the days of the Prophet Isaiah—"Wash you, make you clean, put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes; cease to do evil; learn to do well; seek judgment, relieve the oppressed, judge the fatherless, plead for the widow;"—"Is not this the fast that I have chosen, to loose the bands of wickedness, to undo the heavy burdens and let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke? Is it not to deal thy bread to the hungry, and that thou bring the poor that are cast out to thy house; when thou seest the naked, that thou cover him, and that thou hide not thyself from thine own flesh?"—what Jeremiah saith, "Woe unto him that buildeth his house by unrighteousness, and his chambers by wrong; that useth his neighbour's service without wages, and giveth him not for his work;"—and what Jesus Christ, under the gospel dispensation, himself laid down as a rule of universal application, that covers the whole ground of man's duty to his fellow-man—"All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them?"—many others of his precepts clearly inculcating the doctrine of universal brotherhood, in acts of love and kindness, without partiality. Who then would suppose for a moment that any religious Society whatever, professedly based upon a doctrine embracing in an eminent degree these obligations—obligations not of humanity and moral justice only, but of brotherly kindness and charity, even to the remembering of those in bonds as bound with them, to the doing to and for these as we would wish to be done by, if placed in their tried situations—could fail of making the slaves' case a prominent concern for energetic action?

But lamentable to say there is a marked deficiency in this respect. Indeed so far are the different religious sects, of which I have knowledge, from making the slave's case a matter of interesting enquiry with a view to action, that there appears to be more engagement to prevent such enquiry, in the fear that it may disturb the peace and unity of the Society, than there is to relieve the sufferings of the slave, notwithstanding the high professions which are often made of deep concern for them.*

Do these societies put forth an influence commensurate with the importance of the occasion?—If the priest and Levite were justly chargeable with unkindness in passing<sup>14</sup> by upon the other side,<sup>15</sup> what charge do these societies merit who seem studiously to maintain, with little exception, nearly a midnight silence as it respects any organized mode of action for the extinction of the slave system, though the slave's blood is continually crying from the ground?<sup>16</sup>

Now could all the religious societies professing the Christian name, come to such a sense of brotherly feeling and sympathy for the slave and his oppressor in their sufferings, as to put their souls in these souls' stead, what efforts would be made—what powerful and constant appeals would be applied to the public mind! The language now uttered would proceed from a sincere heart, and, coming from the heart, would reach the heart and conscience too, and thus spread conviction from sea to sea. How soon might religious societies, being in a good degree consistent with their profession, give such tone to the community as would forever wipe the foul stain of slavery from the national character. If this be the fact, as I think must be evident to every unprejudiced mind, what awful responsibility attaches to the different religious societies for the continuance of the sin of slavery. I trust, however, these societies are not without their anti-slavery heaven. They are not entirely destitute of any testimony against slavery. They have their individual members whose feelings and actions are for the suffering and dumb. If these keep their habitations in the Truth, and abide in the patience, some of these societies may yet be found elevating a testimony against man's claiming property in his fellow man, to its meridian height.

* Our readers will probably demur, as we do, to the accuracy of this statement in a particular relation. The published accounts of the proceedings of various religious bodies, and especially of the late convention held in London, under the title of The Evangelical Alliance, afford, however, lamentable evidence of the too general truth of our correspondent's assertion.—Ers.

We may now inquire what aid people in general, in their individual and private capacity, are giving to the slaves? In reply to this it may be said—little more than to wish them set at liberty when it can be done with safety to the best interests of all concerned. This profession at first glance may appear quite plausible. But in the first place we must bear in mind the vast difference between such professions, and the appropriate action for producing such results as it proposes. If the profession be never so good, that, of itself, cannot remove one solitary chain from the slave. Again, the proposition is based upon spurious grounds: for, first, it takes for granted that it may be unsafe to manumit slaves; secondly, it assumes that the best interests of the parties may not be promoted by such manumission. Now this profession and these assumptions, are very wide from the proper ground. They are altogether of a different character from that which philanthropy and true christianity throw around their votaries—for these are made to believe, that as there is no partiality with the Creator, who makes all emphatically accountable to himself, all are born free and equal, and consequently liberty is an inalienable right. This being the fact, as must be evident to every unprejudiced mind, then to suppose and assume, that the removal of the obstacle to the enjoyment of liberty from the slave will be unsafe and injurious, would be fairly taking the ground that slavery was an improvement surpassing the wisdom of the Creator, who ordained and instituted the relation of man to his fellow man to be free and equal. Now the true question we should ask ourselves in the premises is this—Is it right, is it just, is it Christian to hold slaves? In our hearts it is at once said NO!

Such being the case, this at once and forever, sweeps away the oft repeated, sophisticated, deceiving plea of safety and interest, which is made a turning point in sustaining the slave system. Although interest and safety are so successfully urged in favour of slavery, they are principles, when rightly understood, powerfully and imperatively demanding the immediate extinction of the horrid system in question.

Now, to turn more directly to the question of individual action in behalf of the slave, he stands, as a general thing, unaided, unprotected, unbefriended, from this quarter, having little more than degradation and poverty, (which have been forced upon him,) to recommend him to notice and protection. So far are the majority of people from taking any action for uprooting slavery, in an individual capacity, that where a decided indifference does not prevail, the action taken will often be against the measures of the few who may have signalized themselves upon the side of the down-trodden slave. There is another class who remain inactive as to any relief of the slave, though convinced of, and acknowledging, the iniquities of slavery, but who deem the removal of the system a work of the community. Hence they content themselves with the idea that what they can do will be so little towards the accomplishment of the work, that they make no effort to do any thing: seeming to forget that communities are made up of individuals;—united and general action, of individual action,—and general neglect, of individual neglect.

Again, the slave's cause is seriously injured, probably, by nine-tenths of the people in the free States, in becoming sharers and partners with the slaveholder in the sale and consumption of the products of his slaves' unpaid toil. Let no market be found for slave-labour products, and no such products will be found for market. Awful responsibility, to patronize and sustain a market upon which slavery depends for its continuance!—Reader, give full scope to conviction on this point.

Now, if it could be the case that any one of the free States were to bid a bounty on free labour products sufficient to make them come to the consumer at three-fourths the price of slave-labour products, very soon we might see nine-tenths of the people of such State practically acting for the abolishment of slavery, by refusing its products. Oh! how we sacrifice duty to imaginary self-interest! Who so blind that cannot see that DOLLARS AND CENTS form a powerful link in the chain, both in the North and South, which binds down millions of our fellow men in a state of degradation, and the most abject privation and suffering!

Notwithstanding the slave's case excites so little pity, is so little looked after, is so much buried in misrepresentation, so much trodden under foot of political aspirants, and so much neglected by the formal professor of the Christian name, yet he has truth, justice, reason, humanity and Christianity all on his side, and these are powerful principles,—more powerful than the greatest armies of men! These principles can, under the blessing of an overruling Providence, give the victory by few or by many. And I am consoled in the belief, that that there are some scattered up and down through the land, who are engaged on behalf of the suffering slave, under the guidance of these principles. May the efforts and the number of these increase, until the last fetter be removed from the bondman. Hasten that day when he shall be permitted to stand erect on equal grounds with his fellow man, as children of one common Parent!

DAVID IRISH.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

However strange it may seem to us, it is nevertheless true that the Society of Friends has permitted its members to import slaves from Africa, and buy and sell and hold them in America.—Another fact is equally strange and true—that after the sinfulness of slaveholding had been clearly demonstrated by Friends of Germantown in their remonstrance to the Yearly Meeting in Philadelphia, nearly one hundred years elapsed before all its members ceased to be slaveholders. From the history of that period we learn that a few faithful labourers were successively raised up, who could not be satisfied with merely declining to hold slaves themselves, but were constrained to testify against the practice in their brethren. The spirit of gain ruled in the hearts of the many, and steeled them against the claims of justice and humanity. The "faithful few" endured contumely and reproach, and severe were their conflicts in labouring with those in the foremost rank in society, "the ministers, elders, overseers, and other active Friends who held slaves." John Woolman says:—"The messages of the prophet Jeremiah were so disagreeable to the people, and so reverse to the spirit they lived in, that he became the object of their reproach; and in the weakness of nature, thought of desisting from his prophetic office, but, saith he, 'His word was in my heart as a burning fire shut up in my bones, and I was weary with forbearing, and could not shut.' I saw at this time, that if I was honest in declaring that which Truth opened in me, I could not please all men; and laboured to be content in the way of my duty, however disagreeable to my own inclination."

The anticipations of this faithful labourer were soon realized, and though he has left but little on record of the opposition he and his coadjutors experienced, yet there is full evidence both in his writings and from other sources to prove that Friends who held slaves were exceedingly averse to "any agitation of the subject." They were quite willing that Friends who felt scruples about holding slaves should set them free, but they were not disposed to submit to the scruples of others, or be "forced" to put themselves to inconvenience, or sacrifice their "property." Such as these were very earnest in advising their brethren to continue patiently under the exercise, alleging that "the Lord in time to come might open a way for the deliverance of these people [the slaves]." In the Yearly Meeting of 1758 the subject of "dealing with persons who purchase slaves," was considered, and "several Friends who had negroes expressed their desire that a rule might be made, to deal with such Friends as offenders who bought slaves in future," but they did not wish to be disturbed themselves. Other Friends were disposed to go a little further, and strike at the root of the evil, and several expressed their desire that a visit might be made to such as kept slaves; and many Friends said that they believed liberty was the negro's right; to which, at length, no opposition was made publicly. A minute was made on that subject, more full than any heretofore; and the names of several Friends entered, who were free to join in a visit to such who kept slaves." (J. Woolman.)

It was at this Yearly Meeting that John Woolman, in replying to those who opposed any action on the subject, on the ground that "the Lord, in time to come, might open a way for the deliverance of these people," made the following truthful and impressive remarks:—"Many slaves on this continent are oppressed, and their cries have reached the ears of the Most High. Such are the purity and certainty of His judgments that he cannot be partial in our favour. In infinite love and goodness, he hath opened our understandings from one time to another, concerning our duty towards this people, and it is not a time for delay. Should we now be sensible of what he requires of us, and through a respect to the private interests of some persons, or through a regard to some friendships which do not stand on an immutable foundation, neglect to do our duty in firmness and constancy still waiting for some EXTRAORDINARY MEANS to bring about their deliverance, it may be that God may answer us, in this matter, by terrible things in righteousness."

The Society having, at intervals, condemned the importation of slaves from Africa—the buying and selling such as were imported by others—and the buying slaves to be kept in bondage, at length came to the conclusion that those who were already in slavery had a right to their liberty. Yet in 1771 it was directed that such slaves as should be found suitable for liberty were to be released from captivity, and not detained in bondage "without such reasons as shall be sufficient and satisfactory." It seems to have been discovered, however, during the two next years, that ALL SLAVE-HOLDING WAS SINFUL and that no reasons could be sufficient and satisfactory to justify a continuance in sin, and accordingly in 1776, "it was directed that all slaveholders" should be dealt with, and all slaves "whether arrived at full age or in their minority," released from a state of slavery.

It was also seen, in the deep religious exercise of that period, that "hiring slaves on wages, manifestly contributes to promote the unrighteous traffic [which] we are desirous to suppress."

In reading the history of the abolition of slavery in the Society of Friends, published by Philadelphia Yearly Meeting in 1843, the perseverance and devotedness of the few faithful labourers are not more striking than the tenacity with which the great body of its members adhered, during the several stages of the abolition of slavery, to their existing practices, and the jealousy constantly manifested lest they should be required to "do justly."

Long before the Society of Friends was clear of holding slaves, the enlightened mind of John Woolman perceived that something more than simply declining to hold slaves was required of him; he accordingly ceased to use the produce of the slaves' labour, and in his last illness was careful not to take any medicine that came "through defiled channels or oppressive hands." It appears from his account that the number of those who declined the use of slave produce was small, "even amongst people truly pious," and their "labours in Christian love on that subject" were "not very extensive," yet he declares his belief that it "may yet require the more serious consideration of the humble followers of Christ, the Prince of peace."

It is well known that from this period down to the present day, the testimony thus introduced by John Woolman has been steadily maintained by many friends throughout our religious society. Its progress, however, like that of the abolition of the slave trade and slavery amongst us, has been slow, and it has had and still has to encounter the same kind of opposition. Is it a testimony founded on true and just principles of morality, or did John Woolman, and thousands since his day, act under a delusion when they embraced it? This is a question which is daily increasing in importance. The commerce in articles produced by the labour of slaves is rapidly augmenting; and a corresponding extension of the means of production closely and inevitably follows. Can any one seriously doubt that "the market for slave produce makes slavery?" Admitting then that slavery is sinful, upon whom does its responsibility rest, if not upon the customers in the market which makes it?

Isaac E. Morse, a slaveholder of Louisiana, and a member of Congress, asserts, in the remarkable letter published in the last number of the Non-Slaveholder, that "the revenue received in New England, from the product of Slave grown articles is greater than the value of the articles themselves." Speaking for himself and the "entire South," he tells his northern brethren, that if they are sincere and honest, "there is a very easy way to get rid of slavery in the United States without interfering with us, without doing one single thing that the nicest caviller could censure, and which I believe in sober seriousness will effect your object as certain as day succeeds night, and which, though it may entail ruin and distress upon a large portion of your fellow citizens, they have no right to object to, or complain of—'ROUGH NOT, TASTE NOT, HANDLE NOT' ONE SINGLE PRODUCT OF SLAVE LABOUR."

These are wholesome truths, and important admissions, which should receive the serious attention of all who regard slavery as repugnant to Christianity. It is not easy however to perceive why the removal of a destructive evil, by means which are so entirely unobjectionable, and which the nicest caviller cannot censure, and the slaveholders have no right to object to or complain of, should entail ruin and distress upon those connected with it. Ruin and distress have never yet followed the abolition of slavery, even when the measure has been suddenly and forcibly accomplished. The probable operation of the course proposed by Isaac E. Morse is very clearly described in a small pamphlet entitled "Considerations on the use of the Productions of Slavery." The author says:

"Let us trace out the reasonable consequences of disusing the produce of slave-labour. 'Supply follows demand.' This is an undisputed axiom of commerce, and within the limits of a physical ability to furnish the supply, is as true as that 'shade follows substance.' The manner of the supply is just as much under the control of the demander as the matter, provided he is willing to pay a fair equivalent for the manner. Commerce is without a conscience of its own, yet bows to the dictation of its customer's conscience. It is then the inducement to that conscience. The consideration here involved indicates a two-fold duty—to demand that which is just in the manner of its procurement, and to avoid that which is unjustly procured. The business of the Christian's life is to struggle for the advancement of virtuous principles and to discourage the opposite. Individuals in various places appreciate this truth, and refuse to be accessory to the creation of a demand for goods produced by slave-labour. Each of such individuals has his own numerical value, besides his moral influence extending around him, and adding ones, tens and hundreds to the espousal of the doctrine that it is unjust to use those productions, and a decided impression is made on the market for slave goods. No slaveholder would add to his slaves under a decaying demand for the productions of slavery. Hence amongst the first fruits of abstinence from their use, we should expect to see some ships ceasing to be freighted for the slave-trade; some wars ceasing to be created on the African coast; some of the "thousand daily victims" ceasing to be offered to the Moloch of Slavery; some of the home nurseries for propagating men as cattle ceasing to exist; but all this unaccompanied by starvation. Men do not starve because slave-ships rot; because there are no wars in Africa; because fewer die in the middle passage and in seasoning, or because men are less encouraged to the rearing of domestic slaves.

"Thus the first impression, it is seen, would be on the outskirts of slavery, and would prevent starving and other suggested miseries to our species. The slaveholders, seeing the approach towards them of a more elevated public sentiment, would meet the change—not by starving their miserable slaves into some new submission,—but by changing their condition from chattels to men. This change would be commenced, doubtless, by a few of the most enlightened slaveholders with whom the history of the transition of the British West India slaves into the state of freemen, stripped now of all gorgon terrors, is familiar; and perceiving there is really an honest testimony abroad against slavery which refuses all participation in its fruits, and which they had previously suspected to be false because of the short-coming of the proclaimers of that testimony, they will enter themselves into the spirit of the reform, and meet the sentiment in its fulness. The example of these would spread, as did the testimony among the non-slaveholders against the use of slave produce; and commensurate to the growth with us of this testimony would be the voluntary extension by them of enlightened and happy freedom to slaves now groaning under a dark and merciless bondage."

I propose, in another communication, to notice some objections made by Friends against rejecting the products of slave-labour. A. B.

11th mo., 23d, 1846.

For the Non-Slaverholder.

ISAAC E. MORSE'S LETTER.

I have never yet seen or heard any man attempt to justify slavery, without contradicting himself and demolishing his own arguments. The letter of I. E. Morse, in your last number, was highly interesting; speaking, as I believe it does, "the voice of the entire South," or, at least, that of all intelligent slaveholders. The lesson it teaches the people of the North, is an important one; it says to them—If you really abhor slavery, if you believe it to be an evil, if you are sincere and honest in desiring its abolition, derive no more profit from commerce in slave-grown articles—"touch not, taste not, handle not" one single product of slave labour. But my present object is to point out an inconsistency into which the author has fallen. He asserted in Congress that "slavery was the greatest blessing which God Almighty himself could have ordained for the protection and safe-keeping of a large mass of human beings who were incapable of maintaining and preserving themselves;" and, in his letter, he declares this sentiment to be his "deliberate and matured opinion." The paragraph which contains this declaration, asserts that the slaves of Louisiana, "are a great deal more intelligent than the operatives in the factories of Europe!" If this be true, then the slaves of Louisiana no longer need the "ordination" of slavery for their protection and safe-keeping, but are capable of "maintaining and preserving themselves," and should, at once, be permitted to enjoy "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." C.

To the Editors of the Non-Slaverholder.

In the communication for your last number relative to the "letter to the Commissioners of the Free Church of Scotland," on the inconsistency of soliciting and receiving the money which is the product of slavery, there was inadvertently an omission of the dates both of the letter and the appeal to those who approve of it. The date of the former was, "New York, April 2, 1844," that of the latter, "June 13, 1844." The former, which contains so faithful a protest against the act of the Commissioners, was signed by the following persons, viz: Arthur Tappan, Simon S. Jocelyn, Christopher Rosh, William Shotwell, Leonard Gibbs, Lewis Tappan, Theodore S. Wright, and Seth W. Benedict.

Very respectfully, but most earnestly, are these friends, with all who approve of their letter, again entreated to consider the high duty of protesting, with equal plainness and faithfulness, against the prevalent and lamentable inconsistency of partaking of the general fruits of the system of oppression, robbery and blood. Again, for the sake of millions, now suffering the woes of degraded and outraged humanity, and for the sake of millions yet unborn, we remind the consumer that he is the supplier of the waters of this river of death. The profit which the consumer voluntarily pays furnishes the pecuniary support of the whole iniquitous system. It is this which procures the seizure of the innocent victim on the coast of Africa. It is this which transports him, amid the horrors of the middle passage, to the place where he is sold like the cattle in the market. It is this which induces the mercenary dealer in "the souls of men" to buy him, to lash him to his unrequited toil, and to close all the avenues of his soul against the appeals of his brother for mercy and liberty. The consumer of slave products, is not only accessory to all the evils of this direful abomination, but his voluntary aid is the very vitality of all other means adopted for its support. If he withholds his aid, every wheel of the infernal machine stops at once, for he is its main spring.

In view of this appalling fact, he is kindly requested to pause before he again mingles his morning and evening beverage with the blood-stained sweet. Abolitionist! Oh! stop and ask thy conscience, Am I acting consistently with my own principles? Am I not about to have communion with the works of darkness which I have repudiated? Am I not partaking of the very stolen property, the robbery of which I have condemned? Then ask thy heart, What has this guilty sweet cost thy brother? Shall we relish that which has cost our brother his liberty, and peradventure, his life? Can we relish the sweet, or wear, with satisfaction, the garment, which has been furnished by the tearing away of our brother from his wife, his children, and his home?

For the sake of the cause we advocate, let us solemnly consider whether or not we are building up the things we profess to destroy.

H. G.

THE NON-SLAVERHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, TWELFTH MONTH 1, 1846.

WAR, SLAVERY, AND CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.—One of the modes of opposing the evils here enumerated, presented to those who feel free to resort to the ballot-box for an expression of their sentiments in relation to public men and measures, is obviously the elective franchise. This privilege, if ever exerted, should be used in the chiefest degree, for the elevation to office of men fearing God and hating covetousness, and for the consequent increase of peace and righteousness in the earth. The recent opportunities our voting readers have had of making their views known in relation to some of the evils referred to, by casting their suffrages for persons opposed to them, we trust have not been overlooked or unimproved. There is another mode in which opposition to these evils may be expressed with great effect, and by the friends of reform generally. This mode exists in the exercise of the right of petition; to which should be added the exertion of whatever influence we may personally have with those in authority. The meeting of Congress, and of several of the State Legislatures, is near at hand. In some or other of these bodies the evils adverted to, will, in all probability, engage considerable attention. Petitions on these several subjects, it is expected, will be numerously presented, and we believe that in regard to all of them there is a greater opening for their reception and consideration than has heretofore been experienced. Now that there are streaks of light in the horizon, let us be up and doing our share of labour in the work of reformation. The time was, when, under the dawning light of the Sun of Righteousness, the professors of Christ's name would not be concerned in wars and fightings, or in any taking of human life. The first is notorious; the last proven by the reason which the Emperor Julian assigned for not allowing Christians to be prefects, that "their laws prohibited their adjudging capital punishments." Under this light also, slavery, such as it then was, but uncharacterised by many of its present enormities, was seen in its true colours, and last retired from its brilliant presence. Let these considerations animate us to seek, with a becoming ardor, the speedy attainment of those legitimate results of Christian principle.

THE NEW YORK CONSTITUTION.—Our accounts of the New York election, announce the adoption of the new Constitution, and the rejection of the separate proposition which accompanied it. The majority in favour of the Constitution was upwards of 131,000; and against "equal suffrage to coloured persons" 137,000. The whig majority for Governor was 11,121, so that that party could have commanded the adoption of the amendment, if the whole democracy had voted against it, which was very far from being the fact. So far as the Whigs are to be regarded as the conservative party of the country, they have committed an act of extreme folly, in not ensuring to the side of "law and order" the suffrage of their coloured fellow citizens, which, for obvious reasons, would have always been cast in that direction. We are not the friends of an indiscriminate suffrage, though we are of one undiscriminated by colour. We would commit the destinies of the nation only to the decision of intelligent voters. Mind is of no colour. But if the ignorant and intelligent are to approach the ballot-box on the same equal terms, it is then vastly important that the ignorance which has the intelligence to be preservative, should be allowed to throw its weight against the ignorance which would ostracise all that is good in society. We regard the issue of this question as indicating an aggregate of inconsideration, prejudice, and relative injustice which we could scarcely have looked for in the empire state. We feel persuaded that many of its citizens will yet bitterly repent the part they have taken in producing this issue.

EFFECTS OF THE CHANGE IN THE BRITISH SUGAR DUTIES.—We derive from the (London) "Friend" of the 1st ultimo, the following important information and suggestions.

"The recent alteration in the duties on foreign sugar, has produced its natural result. The plantations of Cuba and Brazil are pouring their produce into all parts of the kingdom, and the people of England once again gratify their palates at the expense of the unrequited toil and the undiminished sufferings of negro slaves. We hope that those who, in time past, submitted to the inconvenience, in most cases hardly worthy to be mentioned, of purchasing only the sugar of free countries, will take the same stand now; and that all others will examine the question, and see whether the like abstinence is not a duty on their part. Not long since, we advocated a similar course with regard to cotton and other imports from the Slave States of America, in all cases where it is possible to distinguish these from free labour productions, it being our opinion that there is no means so powerful for the extinction of the system, as this daily, personal, practical condemnation of it. But the use, or disuse of slave sugars, at the present time, is attended with this additional and momentous consideration, that the opening of the English market will act as an immediate stimulus to the African slave trade. On the arrival of the news from England, the Havana was illuminated, the prices of slaves rose, it is said, twenty-five per cent, and twelve slavers were to be got ready for the African coast! The infernal human trade of the United States is disgraceful, and revolting beyond the power of language to express, but it is far exceeded by the wanton waste of life, and the depth of woe and agony, which mark the capture, barter, and freight of the victims from the palm-tree villages of Africa, to what we may, perhaps without much exaggeration, term the living graves of the western world."

The city of Havana illuminated—the price of slaves raised twenty-five per cent—and twelve vessels about to be despatched to the coast of Africa, to be loaded with slaves! Why all this joy and activity? Not simply that the ports of Great Britain are opened for the admission of the slave grown sugars of Cuba, but because the people of England are about to consume great quantities of those sugars, and thus raise their price; and vastly extend their production. Will the British people do this? Will they forget that lofty sense of justice and humanity which prompted them to pay one hundred millions of dollars, as the price of emancipation in the British Colonies? Will not the Abolitionists of Great Britain seem to receive into their hands those articles which they declare it immoral on the part of government to admit into the kingdom? We rejoice to know, through our foreign correspondence, that a powerful effort is about to be made to bring the whole Anti Slavery community into a great free labour produce movement. If British Abolitionists have now nothing before them of sufficient interest to concentrate their efforts, here is a field of ample action. Let them enter, on Christian grounds, into a vast league against the consumption of slave-grown produce, and let them urge on their Government to withdraw its armed cruisers from the Coast of Africa, and apply its enormous appropriations to the encouragement of the cultivation of coffee, sugar, and other tropical productions, in its East and West India possessions.

THE "RANDOLPH SLAVES."—The public papers have so generally noticed the cruel treatment in Mercer County, Ohio, of the negroes, about four hundred in number, liberated by the will of John Randolph of Roanoke, that we have not hitherto alluded to the subject.

It now appears that the people of Mercer county, not satisfied with preventing those negroes from settling on the farms purchased for them, have determined to expel the coloured inhabitants already resident there. Some of these were among the earliest settlers, and have built houses, cultivated farms, and raised families. The following resolutions were adopted at a recent meeting of the mob, and notwithstanding the Proclamation of the Governor of Ohio, which will be found below, we cannot but fear that the unlawful intentions so boldly announced will eventually be enforced.

In the midst of these disheartening circumstances, it is encouraging to know, that strong efforts are in progress to effect a repeal of the "Black Laws" of Ohio, which are so unjust and oppressive to the coloured population.

Resolved, That we will not live among negroes, and as we have settled here first, we have fully determined that we will resist the settlement of blacks and mulattoes, in this county, to the full extent of our means, the boycott not excepted.

Resolved, That the blacks of this county be, and they are hereby respectfully requested to leave the county on or before the first day of March, 1847, and in case of their neglect or refusal to comply with this request, we pledge ourselves to remove them peaceably if we can, forcibly if we must.

Resolved, That we who are here assembled, pledge ourselves not to employ, or trade with any black or mulatto person, in any matter whatever, or to permit them to have any grinding done at our mills, after the first day of January next."

PROCLAMATION.

Executive Office, Ohio,
Columbus, Aug. 31. 1846.

Information having been filed in this Office, setting forth that persons have associated together with the intent to perpetrate, within the county of Mercer, in this State, acts of violence against a peaceable and unoffending class of individuals; therefore, for the purpose of having the laws faithfully executed, to preserve the peace and dignity of the State, and to protect the lives and property of those who are or may be illegally assailed, I, Mordecai Bartley, Governor of the State of Ohio, do hereby call upon all Judges, Justices of the Peace, Sheriffs, and all other ministerial officers of said county of Mercer, to execute the laws in such case made and provided, as faithful conservators of the peace, and thus protect persons and property, the State from insult and contumely, and relieve the Authorities of the unpleasant duty of resorting to more summary measures for the restoration of peace in the State, and justice to individuals within said county.

It is presumed that the deep interest which the judicial and ministerial officers, as well as peaceable and law-abiding citizens of the county of Mercer, will feel in preserving peace within their borders, and doing justice to all parties concerned, will induce them to co-operate in so desirable an object.

If the coloured people against whom the excitement has been raised, have violated any law, or disturbed the peace of the State, or trespassed upon the rights of others, the legal remedy should be applied, but not unlawful violence used.

In testimony whereof, I hereunto subscribe my name and affix the Great Seal of the State of Ohio, the day and date above written.

M. BARTLEY.

By the Governor:

SAM'L. GALLOWAY, Sec'y of State.

THE QUAKER OF THE OLDER TIME.—We have frequently observed the poetical contribution of our friend John G. Whittier, to the first number of this Journal, and from which we derive our motto, published in other papers as being anonymous. Recently it has so appeared in the British Friend. We request the respected editors of that periodical to give their readers the author's name.

DECISION OF JUDGE EDMONDS.—Notwithstanding the length of the decision of Judge Edmonds, we have thought it a document of such great interest and importance as to justify us in presenting it to our readers. The slave, George Kirk, secreted himself in the ship Mobile, at Savannah, and being discovered on the passage, he was confined on board, when the vessel arrived in New York, by the captain, who intended to take him back. His cries, however, aroused the attention of some persons on the wharf, and he was carried, on a writ of habeas corpus, before Judge Edmonds, who discharged him from the custody of the captain.

After his discharge, an application was made to the Mayor of New York, who issued a writ for his apprehension, and the police officers, to the number of nearly nine hundred, were put in requisition to arrest him. They were successful, and he was lodged in prison to await his trial before the Mayor; but another writ of habeas corpus brought him again before Judge Edmonds, and the decision which we publish was the result. George Kirk was soon placed by his friends beyond the reach of his claimant.

Our Prospects.—The present number brings our first volume to a conclusion. We commenced it under a conviction that we owed something to the cause of Truth and Humanity. We saw the latter deeply outraged in the heavy bondage and affliction, to which were subjected millions of our fellow-men,—denied not merely the rights and charities which belong to the condition of human beings, but reduced, as far as human agency can effect that end, to the low level of the beasts that perish. We perceived that the purpose of this deep oppression was gain; that to feed a dishonest appetite for wealth, the slave was robbed of his natural right to the productions of his toil; that buyers of those spoils were necessary to the consummation of the end which the outrage proposed; that buyers of those spoils were therefore participants in the inexpressibly atrocious wrong; that buyers of those spoils might be more enlightened, and therefore more culpable, than the immediate perpetrators of the wrong; that buyers of those spoils, when they pleased, could terminate the wrong. We thought we had a testimony to carry in Truth's behalf to the users of those spoils, who saw the iniquity of slavery, but who did not sufficiently reflect that they themselves were the promoters to its enactment. We thought it our duty to say to them, in that spirit of Christian love which all should feel and cherish, that Truth is uniform in its requirements—that it has an inflexible line—that if it be wrong to partake in the fruits of one crime, it is wrong to partake in the fruits of another crime—that if it be robbery to connive with the robber in one form of outrage, it is robbery to connive with him in all forms of it. We felt too a desire to keep alive a pity for the poor slave; to cherish in ourselves and others the impression of being bound with him; to seek all occasions by which any good might be achieved in mitigation of his wrongs.

Under the influence of such considerations, we threw to the breeze our moral banner bearing the pure inscription, "Whoso gives the motive, makes his brother's sin his own." In the faith of a truthful purpose, and in the confidence of meeting a full response in many hearts, we issued a numerous edition of our first sheet, without the assurance of a single subscriber. We have since continued to publish large editions of our respective numbers, and to give them a wide dissemination. Under these circumstances our subscription list has not supplied our past expenses, but this we hold to be a secondary consideration. Should our present subscribers continue their aid to the cause, it will enable us hereafter to send them a monthly sheet of 24 pages, beside conceding to us the possible ability of issuing a few numbers gratuitously.

Remaining a deep-felt conviction of the necessity of such a work as the Non-Slaveholder was designed to be, and encouraged by the number of friends who have come to its assistance, such as it is, we propose its continuance for another year. In no spirit of selfishness do we ask of our friends to use early renewed efforts for increasing our subscription list. We desire still further to extend the size of the publication, if the means afforded us will admit of it; and should those means exceed the cost, the surplus will be strictly applied to the cause of the oppressed.

A title page and index to the present volume will be sent with our next number.

INTELLIGENCE.

From the N. Y. Evening Post.

DECISION OF JUDGE EDMONDS IN THE MATTER OF GEORGE KIRK, THE FUGITIVE SLAVE.

When the boy was before me on a former occasion no principle of law was involved, but mainly a question of fact, arising out of the return. On the present occasion, it is quite otherwise. The question now presented, is the constitutionality, and consequently the validity of a statute of our State.

It is not from any choice on my part, that I am called upon to consider this question. If my wishes had been consulted, the case would have remained with the Mayor, until he had decided it, and even then, I should have been much better pleased, if the review of his decision had been committed to some functionary whose other duties would have allowed him more leisure than I can command to examine it. But the party had a right to bring the matter at once before me; under our statute, I was bound to allow the writ of habeas corpus, even if I had been fully convinced of the legality of the imprisonment; and the return made to the writ, necessarily raising the question to which I have alluded, it becomes my duty to consider and decide it, a duty from which I am not at liberty to shrink, and which I hope I may be able to discharge, without partaking of the excitement which has surrounded the question from the beginning.

It is conceded on the record that George is a slave, owing service to a master in Georgia; that without the consent of the owner, or without the knowledge of the officers or owners of the vessel, he concealed himself on board the brig Mobile, in the port of Savannah, for the purpose of securing a passage to New York; that his being on board was not discovered by the officers of the brig until they had been at sea two days on their return voyage, and had got without the territory of Georgia; that as soon as he was discovered, he was arrested and confined until his arrival in this port; and that on his arrival, the master of the vessel took him before the Mayor, to the end that he might obtain from the Mayor a certificate which should warrant him in returning the boy to the port of Savannah; that the owner of the slave does not demand him under the Constitution and laws of the United States, but he is demanded by the claimant, simply by virtue of his station as master of the vessel, and by virtue of a provision of our statutes.

Such are the facts of the case. The law applicable to it is to be found in § 15, 1 Rev. Stat. 659, which enacts that whenever any person of colour, owing labour or service in any other part of the United States, shall secrete himself on board of a vessel lying in any port or harbour of such State, and shall be brought into this State in such vessel, the captain or commander thereof may seize such person of colour, and take him before the Mayor or Recorder of the city of New York. The officer before whom such person shall be brought, shall inquire into the circumstances, and if it appear, upon proper testimony, that such person of colour owes service or labour in any other State, and that he did secrete himself on board of such vessel without the knowledge or consent of the captain or commander thereof, and that by so doing he subjected the captain to any penalty, such officer shall furnish a certificate thereof to such captain or commander, which shall be a sufficient warrant to him to carry such person of colour to the port or place from which he was so brought, as aforesaid.

It must constantly be borne in mind that the question before me does not grow out of, nor is it in any way connected with, an attempt on the part of the owner of the slave to enforce his rights under the Constitution of the United States and the law of Congress of 1793, but arises solely out of a State statute, which authorizes another person in no respect connected with the owner of the slave, nor acting by his authority, to transport him from our territory to the place where he had been held in bondage, and where again he may be returned to bondage.

In other words, while the Constitution of the United States gives to the party to whom the service or the labour may be due, the right to reclaim his servant, and the law of Congress extends that right to the agent or attorney of such party, it is claimed that the State Legislature has a right to interpose and extend the right to a third person, not acting for or by the authority of the owner, but merely because he was the commander of the vessel on which the slave may have concealed himself, and because by such concealment, the commander may have become liable to a penalty.

Such is the authority which the Mayor has been called upon to exercise, and which it is insisted has not been, and cannot be, conferred upon him by the State Legislature.

Two objections are raised to this claim of authority.

1. That the provision of the Revised Statutes authorizing the proceeding has been virtually repealed by an act of our Legislature, passed in 1840.

2. That if it has not been repealed, it is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, and therefore inoperative and void.

The conclusion to which I have arrived on this point renders an examination of the first unnecessary.

The section of the Revised Statutes under consideration is part of Title VII. of Chap. 20 of the first part, which is entitled, "Of the Importation into this State of persons held in Slavery, of their exportation, of their services, and prohibiting their sale;" and is a revision of the act of 1817, entitled, "An act relative to slaves and servants."

The 30th section of the act of 1817, which contains the provision which has been incorporated into this 15th section of the Revised Statutes, is preceded by a recital that "whereas persons of colour owing service or labour in other States, sometimes secrete themselves on board of vessels while such vessels are lying in the ports or harbours of other States, and thereby subject the commanders thereof to heavy fines and penalties;" And it is worthy of observation, that the act of 1817, as well as this title of the Revised Statutes, aims at prohibiting the exportation of slaves, and that while the act of 1817 abolishes Slavery after the 4th of July, 1827, the Revised Statutes declare that every person born in this State shall be free, and every person brought into this State as a slave, except as authorized by this title, shall be free.

It may well be questioned whether, as this slave was brought into this State in a manner not authorized by the Revised Statutes, he did not thereby, under our law, become ipso facto free, and whether this proceeding before the Mayor is not, therefore, in effect, a proceeding to carry a free citizen into bondage. But I do not consider that point, as it was not raised before me in the argument, was not discussed, and is not necessary to the decision of the question before me.

The broad question discussed, and which I am called upon to decide, is, whether our State Legislature have authority to pass this law.

The point has never, as far as I can learn, been decided, or even agitated in our state, and it is presented to me not only as a new one, but in the imposing form of requiring from me a decision that a law of our state is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, and therefore void. Fully aware of the diffidence with which courts should always entertain such questions, I approach this with all the caution becoming the gravity of the case, yet with a lively sense of what is due to personal liberty, and the fraternal relations existing among the members of the Union.

As I have already mentioned, the statute under consideration was first enacted in 1817, and was subsequently re-enacted and went into effect as part of the Revised Statutes, in 1830. In 1834, the Supreme Court of this state, in Jack vs. Martin, 12 Wend. 311, held that the law of Congress in regard to fugitive slaves, was supreme and paramount from necessity—that so far as the states are concerned, the power when thus exercised, is exhausted, and though the states might have desired a different legislation on the subject, they cannot amend, qualify, or in any manner alter it—that though the act of the state might not be in direct repugnance to the legislation of Congress, it does not follow that it is not in legal effect; that if they correspond in every respect, then the matter is idle and inoperative; if they differ, they must, in the nature of things, oppose each other so far as they do differ; that a fair interpretation of the terms in which the provision of the Constitution is expressed, prohibits the states from legislating upon the question involving the owner's right to this species of labour; and that while the law of Congress, thus passed, exists, the power of the states is suspended, and, for the time is as inoperative as if it had never existed.

The case of Jack vs. Martin, was carried to our Court for the correction of errors, and the judgment of the Supreme Court was affirmed. Though the reasons given for the decision in the Court of Last Resort, as reported, in 14 Wendell 507, differ from those given in the court below, the positions of the Supreme Court, as I have extracted them, were in no respect disturbed, but have ever since remained, and are now the law of the land governing the court and citizens of this State.

In 1842, the Supreme Court of the United States, in Prigg vs. Pennsylvania, 16 Peters 539, had the same question before them. It arose out of various statutes which that state as well as

New York and other northern states, had, from time to time, been enacting on the subject of slavery; and which contained among other things, provisions very like ours in regard to slaves who had absconded from other states.

Story, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, declares that the law of Congress may be truly said to cover the whole ground of the Constitution, not because it exhausts the remedies which may be applied, but because it points out fully all the modes of attaining the object which Congress have as yet deemed expedient or proper to meet the exigencies of the Constitution. And he adds:

If this be so, then it would seem upon just principles of construction that the legislation of Congress must supersede all state legislation upon the same subject, and, by necessary implication, prohibit it. For, if Congress have a constitutional power to regulate a particular subject, and they do actually regulate it in a given manner, and in a certain form, it cannot be that the State Legislatures have a right to interfere, and, as it were, by way of compliment to the legislation of Congress, to prescribe additional regulations, and what they may deem auxiliary provisions for the same purpose. In such a case, the legislation of Congress, in what it does prescribe, manifestly indicates that it does not intend that there shall be any farther legislation to act upon the subject matter. The doctrine was fully recognized by the court in Houston vs. Moore, 5 Wheat 1, where it was expressly held that where Congress have exercised a power over a particular subject given them by the Constitution, it is not competent for state legislation to add to the provisions of Congress upon that subject.

This is the supreme law of the land, which I am bound to obey, and is applicable to the case before me in this aspect, that while Congress, in the exercise of its constitutional power over fugitives from service, has given the right to retake and reconvey them to the place of service, to the party to whom the service is due, his agent or attorney, the state legislation adds to the provision of Congress on that subject, by conferring the power of re-capture and re-conveyance upon the commander of a vessel on board of which the fugitive may have concealed himself.

If it may add, may it not diminish? And if state legislation once begins, where is it to end, and what bounds are to be set to it, but state discretion? Well, indeed, did our Supreme Court repudiate the idea that the framers of the Constitution intended to leave the regulation of this subject to the states, when the provision itself obviously sprung out of their tears of partial and unjust legislation by the States in respect to it.

While this construction of the Constitution—though recent in its promulgation, yet old as the instrument itself—was conceded on all hands during the argument before me, it was contended that our statute did not fall within its destroying influence because it was only a police regulation, and, therefore, legitimately within the scope of State authority.

In 16 Peters, 625, Story J. qualifies the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, by saying that they were not to be understood in any manner to doubt, or interfere with the police power belonging to the States, in virtue of their general sovereignty. That police power extends over all subjects within the territorial limits of the States, and is distinguishable from the right and duty secured by the provision of the Constitution under consideration.

It becomes, therefore, material to inquire what is the police power here alluded to, and does our statute justly and properly fall within its scope?

In 16 Peters, the same learned Judge speaks of this power as conferring full jurisdiction on the States to arrest and restrain runaway slaves, and remove them from their borders, and otherwise to secure themselves against their depredations and evil example, as they certainly may do in cases of idlers, vagabonds, and paupers. The rights of the owners of fugitive slaves are in no just sense interfered with or regulated by such a course; and in many cases, the operations of this police power, although designed essentially for other purposes, for the protection, safety, and peace of the State, may essentially promote and aid the interests of the owners. But such regulations can never be permitted to interfere with or obstruct the just rights of the owner to reclaim his slave, or with the remedies prescribed by Congress to aid and enforce the same.

In New York vs. Milne, 2 Peters, 139, Mr. Justice Barbour, in delivering the opinion of the Court, applies this test to determine the nature of the power:—Did it belong to the State before the adoption of the Constitution? Has it been taken from the States and given to Congress? or does it fall within that immense mass of legislation which embraces everything within the territory of a State not surrendered to the General Government? And the power then under consideration was held to be of that "mass," because its place of operation was within the territory, and, therefore, within the jurisdiction of the State; because the person on whom it operates was found within the same territory and jurisdiction; because the persons for whose benefit it was passed were the people of the State; because the purpose to be attained was to secure the protection of that people, and because the means used were just, natural, and appropriate to those ends.

Complaint was made during the argument, that this police power was exceedingly vague, uncertain, and undefinable, and hence, I suppose, an inference was to be deduced that I ought to regard the claim of power with little favour at least. In the very nature of things it must be difficult, in few, or perhaps in many words, to define the power; for it comprehends an immense mass of legislation, inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws, internal commerce, roads, ferries, &c. &c.

Yet, immense as is this mass, and various as are the interests embraced in and affected by it, it seems to me that the rules laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States, as I have already quoted them, and the tests which they provide, are plain and simple, and easy to be understood, and in their application to this case entirely decided and satisfactory in the result to which they lead us.

To apply first, the rules given us in the case of Prigg, in 16 Peters:

The police power "extends over all subjects within the territorial limits of the State," yet our statute does not confine its operations within our limits, but provides, in case the fugitive is from another State, for the return of the fugitive back to the place whence he fled.

We "may remove slaves from our borders to secure ourselves against their depredations." To transport the slave to Canada or Connecticut would effect this purpose, yet that is not allowed by our statute. He must, in compliance with its command, be returned only to his place of bondage.

"The rights of the owners are not to be interfered with or regulated."

Yet what is a compulsory return of the slave, with or without his owner's consent, to the place whence he fled, but an interference with or regulation of the master's right to control his movements and govern his person?

The State regulation is "not to interfere with the remedy prescribed by Congress." Congress has limited the power of recapture to the owner, his agent or attorney, but our State law has removed that limitation. Congress has protected the rights of the owner, by securing the reclamation to him and those appointed by him, yet our statute gives to the commander of the vessel the power of transporting the slave beyond even the reach of the owner.

Such is the result of the rule furnished us by Judge Story. The application of Judge Barbour's tests will be found equally satisfactory and conclusive.

Is the power exercised in this statute one "embracing a matter within the territory of the State, not surrendered to the Government, and which can be most advantageously exercised by the State?" It cannot be most advantageously exercised by this State. It cannot, indeed, be exercised at all without the consent of the State from which the slave fled. Suppose that any slave State should forbid the return, to its territory, of a fugitive slave, could our law, commanding his return, be enforced? It could be enforced only by the national Government; and, therefore, the power has been surrendered by the States to the General Government. Such is the conclusion of our Supreme Court and the Supreme Court of the United States. Not an element, then, of Judge Barbour's definition is left to apply to this statute.

But to proceed with his tests:

We are to look at the place of its operation to see that the statute operates within the territory of New York; yet the main object of this statute plainly is, not the removal of the slave from our borders, but his return to the place whence he fled, involving, of necessity, the operation of our statute, without our territory and without our jurisdiction. Could it be more so if it provided that every vagrant arrested in our streets should be transported to and abandoned in the streets of Savannah?

We are next to look upon the person on whom it operates, to see that he is within the same territory and jurisdiction; yet this statute must, of necessity, operate both on the slave and the commander of the vessel more out of the State than in it.

We are next to look at the persons for whose benefit it was passed, to see that they are the people of our State. Yet this statute does not confine the power of reception to the commanders of vessels, being citizens—it confers it on all commanders, reside where they may. And it is far from being limited to those for whose protection and welfare, in the language of Judge Barbour, our Legislature is bound in duty to provide.

We are next to turn our attention to the purpose to be attained to see that it is to secure that very protection and provide for that very welfare. The argument is, that this statute had its origin in the desire to protect our citizens from the evil example of having slaves amongst us, yet that very statute prohibits the removal of slaves from our territory by highly penal enactments; and surely if the welfare of our citizens and their security from the evil example of Slavery were the object in view, it could be attained as well and far more easily by transporting the slave to a free State, which it prohibits, than to a slave State which it absolutely commands.

And lastly, we are to examine the means by which those ends are to be attained, so that they bear a just, natural, and appropriate relation to those ends. There is no special pleading, no refinement of reasoning that can disguise from a common understanding the fact that the whole object of the statute was, to allow the commander of the vessel to protect himself by retaking and returning the fugitive, and the means used, namely, the examination and adjudication by the Mayor, and his certificate, were natural and appropriate to that end, and to none other. If any other end had been in view—if the protection of our people at large had been aimed at—there would have been something compulsory in the law, something rendering it obligatory on the captain to afford us the desired protection. But everything is left to his discretion. If he pleases, he may retake, and, after retaking, if he pleases, he may return the slave to the place whence he fled. If the captain should chance not to be a citizen of this State, it would be difficult to discover how it could benefit this State, yet under no circumstances would it be difficult to see how it could benefit the owner to have his fugitive servant placed again within his reach. In every aspect in which I view this statute, I cannot help regarding it as intended and calculated to aid in returning a fugitive slave to his master; and it seems to me that the claimant in this case, and his counsel, have so understood the law, and have acted accordingly. Else why was the boy confined on board the vessel after her arrival here? Why does the captain plead his obligation to the laws of Georgia, when those laws compel him to return the boy to his owner? Or why, when George was making every effort, with the assistance of numerous friends, to escape from the State, did the captain invoke the aid of the police to arrest their efforts; and why does he now press this claim, but that he may do that which the Constitution and laws of the United States declares shall be done only by the party to whom the service is due, or his agent or attorney? I do not allude to these considerations for the purpose of even implying a censure upon the commander of the vessel or his owners, but solely with a view of drawing from his acts and those of his very respectable counsel, the consolation justly flowing, that he and they do, in effect and from necessity, understand our statute precisely as I do, namely, in the language of the United States Supreme Court, as by way of compliment to the legislation of Congress, prescribing additional regulations, and what they deem auxiliary provisions for the same purpose.

It must have occurred to all who have given this subject much consideration, as it has to me, to observe the extreme watchfulness with which this provision of our national Constitution has been regarded by our highest courts. It is not worth my while to pause and inquire into the cause or the propriety of this. It is enough to know that whenever any State legislation, attempting to intermeddle with the question, has come before our highest courts, it has, without ceremony, been swept from our statute book. Our statute regulating and controlling the master's right of recapture, and allowing to the alleged slave the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus, fell before the decision of our Supreme Court in Jack's case.—The laws of Pennsylvania, running through a period from 1780 to 1826, and containing a provision like that now under my review, were overturned by the Supreme Court of the United States in Prigg's case; and I only discharge my duty—obey, indeed, merely one of its plainest and most simple dictates—by declaring that the rule of law thus laid down by the highest judicial tribunal in the country, and whose decisions I am bound to respect and to enforce, is applicable to the statute in question, and being applicable renders the statute null and void, and the arrest and detention of Kirk under it improper.

It will be observed that I have omitted to discuss many considerations which were pressed upon me during the argument. The view which I have taken of the case rendered their discussion unnecessary, but I will briefly allude to one topic, because, if the danger apprehended were to ensue, it would be the only cause of regret which I should experience growing out of this case. I allude to the penalty which it is averred may fall upon the Captain in case of his return to Georgia. I cannot persuade myself that there is any cause for the fear.

The slave was concealed on board his vessel without his knowledge or consent. He was not discovered until the limits of Georgia had been passed, and to have returned then to Savannah would not only have vitiated the Captain's insurance, but have rendered him liable in an action to the boy; and since his arrival in this port, he has resorted to every means which our law allows to return him to his place of servitude.—

And if he shall be finally defeated in his attempts, it will not be from any want of effort on his part, but from a determination on the part of the authorities of this State, to avoid State usurpation, and to maintain the Constitution as it has been interpreted by the highest tribunals in the country. It cannot be that under such circumstances, he can have any thing to fear from the penal enactments of Georgia.

If, however, contrary to all just calculation, those fears should yet be realized, our regard for the individual may not warp the law from its uprightness, though it may well excite our regrets that its integrity cannot be maintained without the infliction of unmerited suffering. This boy must at all events be discharged; the law allows it, and the court demands it.

POETRY.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

THE DEATH OF THOMAS CLARKSON.

The good man's arms are folded now—

The great man's race is run—

The warm brave heart, and thought-worn brow,

Rest—for their work is done!

'Tis well! the fine gold back we give,

Ere it was changed or dim;

The curtain none can lift and live,

Falls between us and him.

It was not grief, it was not fear,

Feeling for tears too deep

Subdued us, when that white-haired seer

Serenely fell asleep.

As the word passed from lip to lip,

Silence upon us fell;

The way-worn man laid down his scrip,

Pilgrim his scallop shell.

Age moved more slowly on its way,

Less firm was manhood's tread,

And thousands bore themselves that day,

As present with the dead.

As the word passed from line to line

Of Freedom's allied host,

The answer came, "For us still shine

The footprints of the lost.

"To us his spirit sayeth still,

"Be faithful to the end!"

Not for ourselves, our sad hearts fill;—

THE SLAVE HATH LOST A FRIEND!"

When he was friendless, on his chain

Fell the great Clarkson's eye;

And in that hour, he vowed to gain

His brother's cause, or die!

He went forth, an enthusiast boy—
He fought, an earnest man—
He conquered,—and laid down in joy,
As only Christians can.

We thank Thee, Father! that on earth
Thy servant staid so long;
Thou gave his noble purpose birth,
And made his spirit strong.

Glory to Thee! his wayside seed,
In Faith and Patience sown,
Has blossomed for the bondman's need:
Glory to Thee alone!

And all o'er England's rich domain,
His spirit hath begot,
For her crushed poor, for Want, and Pain,
Friends,—and they know it not.

Beside the forge, and at the loom,
Amid the factory's din,
Where little children weave their doom,
His lineage looks in.

Around the labourer's cold hearth,
Where Want hath cast out Love,
Where Misery hath conquered Mirth,
Unseen his offspring move.

With hearts his life hath warmed, they come,
With steady souls and brave,
To lift a clear voice for the dumb,
To succour and to save.

We mourn him not! he did not go,
His great heart was not stilled,
Till all the streams that from it flow,
Had with his life been filled.

Philadelphia, 11th mo., 1846.

TO-MORROW.

From the Spanish of Lope De Vega.

BY HENRY W. LONGFELLOW.

LONG, what am I, that, with unceasing care,
Thou didst seek after me—that thou didst wait,
Wet with unhealthy dews, before my gate,
And pass the gloomy nights of winter there?
O, strange delusion, that I did not greet
Thy blest approach! and O, to Heaven how lost,
If my ingratitude's unkindly frost
Has chilled the bleeding wounds upon thy feet.
How oft my guardian angel gently cried,
"Soul, from thy casement look, and thou shalt see How he persists to knock and wait for thee!"
And, O, how often to that voice of sorrow,
"To-morrow we will open," I replied,
And when the morrow came I answered still,
"To-morrow."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE PHILADELPHIA ANTI-SLAVERY BAZAAR, WILL BE OPENED ON THE TWENTY FIRST OF THIS TWENTIETH MONTH, AT THE FRANKLIN HALL, No.
50 NORTH SIXTH STREET.

Its committee, on the approaching close of their annual labours, invite abolitionists and others, to come and see what they have been doing. They have been neither afraid to beg, nor ashamed to work in a good cause, and the munificent donations of their open-hearted, willing-hearted, British friends, together with the results of their own exertions at home, enable them to offer for sale various rare, beautiful, and valuable articles, suited to the refined taste of Philadelphia.
Among these, are engraved portraits of distinguished persons, such as Milton, Burns, Wilberforce, George Fox, William Allen, Elizabeth Fry, John Angel James, &c.

Many valuable memorials of, and from the late Thomas Jackson, including his autographs, a note, the last he ever wrote, locks of his hair in neat envelopes, portraits, and drawing of his residence.

Drawings of the residences of P. Hemans, H. More, Bunyan, Howard, T. P. Bayton, Joseph Sturge.

A host of Montgomery, autographs, paintings in water and oil colours, two volumes of Maury's drawings from the Catacth.

Paper Mache articles, useful and ornamental.
Ornaments in iron, and bronzed vases, jugs, inkstands, &c., from Coldbrook Dale, thermometers, two sets China, with anti-slavery mottoes, games, books, and architectural plays for children, and dolls; lamp and flower stands, worked in wire; a new style of lamp shades.

A great quantity of knitted work, shawls, bags, purses, infant's and children's clothing.

Free labor goods as follows: 3 pieces white shirting, 5 do. muslin, 15 do. prints, 10 dozen sewing cotton, 10 lbs. stocking yarn.

To all who do not entertain conscientious scruples against Fairs, we would say, come, and spend your money where money is needed, to keep the anti-slavery press in motion.
We believe that thousands who are opposing emancipationary movements, know not what they do. It is not because they lack feeling for the slave, or justice, but because they lack information in regard to his terrible condition, and its demoralizing, enervating, anti-Christian influence, upon those immediately connected with the atrocious system, upon themselves and their families, and upon the institutions of our own common country.

To such as have made the mistake of classing the anti-slavery fair with other fairs, we would say, the former are conducted upon the principles of strict equity. There is no trickery, no foolery, no practices permitted which could in any wise offend the feelings of sober minded persons.

By order of the Fair Committee.

Philadelphia, 12th mo., 1st, 1846.

GOODS MANUFACTURED FROM FREE LABOUR COF-FEE, for sale by Thos. S. Field & Co. No 30 N. Front street, (up stairs) Philadelphia, belonging to the Free Produce Association of Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.
"Manchester" Ginghams, two qualities, various patterns;
Table Diaper assorted widths, white and coloured; Canton Flannels unbleached and coloured; coloured Cambrics and Prints; Apron checks assorted plaids; 4-4 shirting and 5-4 sheeting; Muslin, twilled Muslin and plaid cotton Hdk's; cutter laps, very superior; white and coloured Wadding; hose and half hose, very superior and heavy; knitting Cotton various numbers.
25th mo., 20th.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER

Is published on the first of each month, at one dollar per annum for one copy, or five dollars per annum
for six copies in one order, payable in advance.
Abraham L. Pennock, Samuel Rhoads, and George
W. Taylor, are the Editors and Publishers; either of whom will receive subscriptions, payments, and communications. Letters and papers addressed to them,
or endorsed Non-Slaveholder, directed to box 777,
Philadelphia Post Office, will duly reach them.

By decision of the Post Master General, the Non-Slave-holder is subject to newspaper postage only.

PRINTED AT

Merrilow & Thompson's Book & Job Office,
No. 7 Carter's Alley.

THE
NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

"WHOSO GIVES THE MOTIVE, MAKES HIS BROTHER'S SIN HIS OWN."

EDITED AND PUBLISHED BY

ABM. L. PENNOCK, SAMUEL RHOADS, AND GEO. W. TAYLOR.

---

VOLUME II.

---

PHILADELPHIA:
MERRIHEW & THOMPSON, PRINTERS,
1847.

INDEX.

A.		Store for the Sale of Free Produce, -	41
Alexander, Letter from G. W. -	1	Proceedings in Congress, -	41
Agents, -	24	Famine in Ireland, -	43
Address of the Committee of the British and Foreign A. S. Society, on the Disuse of Slave Produce, -	33	Union Literary Institution, -	43
Address to British Shareholders in Foreign Mines, -	35	The National Era, -	44
Abolition, Immediate, not Gradual -	127, 156	Testimony against War, -	61
Anti-Slavery Society, Meeting of British and Foreign -	165	The Death Penalty, -	64
Adam Clarke on the Slave-Trade, -	205	Legislative Action—Fugitive Slaves, -	65
Allen, Life of Wm. -	174, 226	Death of Joseph John Gurney, -	65
Anti-Slavery Practice versus Anti-Slavery Profession, -	265	Address to the People of Great Britain, -	83
Address of the Committee of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society to the Friends of the Anti-Slavery Cause on the Disuse of Slave Labour Produce, -	266	Garrison and Products of Slave Labour, -	84
A Night on Mount Katahdin, -	283	British Manufacture of Free Cotton Goods, -	89
B.		Proceedings in Congress, -	90
Biblical Investigations, 25, 49, 109, 169, 194		The Missouri Compromise, -	91
Black Law Executed, -	68	The Pennsylvania Law, -	91
Baltimore Slave-Trade, -	70	Abduction, -	91
Benezet, Original Letter of A. -	181	To Correspondents and Readers, -	93
Bates, Testimony concerning Benjamin -	182	Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of Friends, -	112
Book Muslim Handkerchiefs, -	266	Bible Defence of Slavery, -	113
C.		Manual Labour School in Ohio, -	113
Cultivation of Cotton in India, -	8	War in Mexico, -	113
C. C., Letter from -	51	Capital Punishment, -	136
Capital Punishment, The Inexpediency of -	133	Wm. Kirkwood, -	137
Congressional Correspondence, -	217	The Anniversaries, -	137
Culture of Cotton in British India, -	252	Free Produce Meeting in New York, -	140
Cotton in Turkey, -	263	John Woolman, -	140
Coloured Orphan Asylum, New York, -	287	E. Heyrick's Pamphlet, -	141
D.		New England Yearly Meeting, -	153
Disuse of Slave Produce, Objections to the -	3	Ecclesiastical Testimonies, -	154
Delaware, A. S. Movement in -	46	W. L. Garrison's Resolution, -	155
D. I., Communications from -	79, 173, 219	Objections to Abstinence from Slave Produce, -	156
Deacon Giles' Dream, -	183	"On the side of their Oppressors there was Power," -	175
Daniel O'Connell, Death of -	188	Frederick Douglass, -	177
Douglass, Letter from F. -	191	Free Produce Movements in Great Britain, -	177
E.		Letter of a New Orleans Merchant, -	178
Editorials.		Free Labour Products, -	181
A Happy New Year, -	9	The Memory of the Just is Blessed, -	181
The Past and Future, -	9	Reflections on the Use of Slave Labour Produce, -	206
Report of New York Coloured Orphan Asylum, -	10	Slaveholding in the Society of Friends, -	206
Movements in Great Britain on Slave Produce Question, -	10	The Slave Power in the Free States, -	207
Evangelical Alliance, -	11	Semi-Annual Meeting of Friends' Free Produce Association, -	222
Free Coloured Population of Virginia, -	12	Slavery on the High Seas, -	222
Our Paper and its Influence, -	12	War in Mexico—the Wilmot Proviso, -	224
Meeting of Pennsylvania A. S. Society, -	13	Friends' Review, -	224
British Functionaries Abroad, -	13	Life of William Allen, -	225
Free Church of Scotland, and Boston Anti-Slavery Fair, -	14	Bunyan's Pilgrim, and Hawthorne's Rail Road, -	226
A Seasonable Warning, -	37	Important Abolition Movement, -	226
Laws of Pennsylvania Relating to Fugitive Slaves, &c. -	39	Indiana Yearly Meeting, -	243
The Black Laws of Ohio, -	40	The Slave Produce Question, and A. Ballou, -	244
Address of the London Anti-Slavery Committee, -	41	Rhode Island Anti-Slavery Society, -	247
		Free Produce Movement in Great Britain, -	247
		War in Mexico, -	248
		Proposed Annexation of Cuba, -	249
		Meeting in London in Favour of Free Produce, -	249
		The Slave Produce Question, -	266

THE
NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

VOL. II.] PHILADELPHIA, FIRST MONTH, 1847. [NO. I.

the Non-Slaveholder, received yesterday. The comments on the religious instruction of the negroes, and on the cruel and wicked conduct of Capt. Hannum in the return of a fugitive slave to bondage, appear to me peculiarly just and appropriate. I also perused with satisfaction your remarks on the unblushing letter of Isaac E. Morse in defence of Slavery. His admission that "what was formerly confined to a few insignificant, misguided fanatics—now infects the high places of the republic, is heard from the pulpits, in the Fourth of July orations, at the exhibitions of our colleges, in the councils of the nation," is a cheering fact. Truth is great and will prevail, as we have every reason to believe, looking to past and present facts, and to that blessing which has attended and will yet attend every righteous effort for its advancement. May we all be found doing our part to promote that happy consummation when the reign of truth and righteousness shall overspread the wide surface of the earth!

ESTEEMED FRIENDS,—I think it desirable that you should be informed that the Committee of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, at its last meeting, held a week since, decided to issue an Address recommending the disuse of all articles of slave produce, as far as it is practicable. The Committee was well attended, and the resolution adopted with general concurrence. I rejoice in the circumstance, having for years past entertained the opinion that Christian consistency requires that we should abstain from the use of articles procured by dishonest and unrighteous means.

It was also resolved at the same Committee, that an expostulation should be prepared, addressed to British subjects who are implicated in slaveholding, as proprietors of Brazilian or Cuban mining shares, or as owners of slave plantations in foreign colonies. You are probably aware that some persons, including members of our own Society, (I speak of that of Friends) are proprietors of mining shares, partly or wholly worked by slaves; having bought the shares, without a knowledge of the fact in the first instance. It is clear, on a little reflection, that a very serious responsibility weighs upon such persons in order to avoid being partakers of other men's sins.

Both the documents to which I have referred will probably appear in the pages of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Reporter. I am glad to perceive that the Reporter comes under your notice, and that you not unfrequently copy from its columns. The last number will, I think, be found to contain much matter of interest, including the concluding portion of the life of the venerable Clarkson. You will also, I doubt not, read with interest a short notice of the progress of the anti-slavery cause in Denmark.

I am much pleased with the 11th number of

I do not perceive any allusion in the Non-Slaveholder to the fugitive slave who escaped to New York and who regained his freedom in spite of the powerful effort made to restore him to his former state. What interest do these single cases of an escaped slave excite on behalf of an unhappy refugee, who has acquired a freedom of which he may be again, and is too often, stripped: what ought then to be the interest we should feel on behalf of the millions who are groaning under an iron bondage?

It is very satisfactory to me to perceive in a variety of American anti-slavery publications much evidence of the deep feeling which exists amongst you on behalf of the slave, and it is my earnest hope that our own religious body amongst you, may have the satisfaction of contributing in no small degree to the universal and speedy abolition of American Slavery.

With much regard, I remain

Your sincere friend,

GEORGE WM. ALEXANDER.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

WHO IS MY NEIGHBOUR?

"And Jesus answering said, A certain man went down from Jerusalem to Jericho, and fell among thieves; which stripped him of his raiment, and wounded him, and departed, leaving him half dead. And by chance there came down a certain priest that way; and when he saw him, he passed by on the other side. And likewise a Levite, when he was at the place, came and looked on him, and passed by on the other side. But a certain Samaritan, as he journeyed, came where he was; and when he saw him, he had compassion on him, and went to him, and bound up his wounds, pouring in oil and wine, and set him on his own beast, and brought him to an inn, and took care of him. And on the morrow when he departed, he took out two pence, and gave them to the host, and said unto him, Take care of him; and whatsoever thou spendest more, when I come again I will repay thee. Which now of these three, thinkest thou, was neighbour unto him that fell among the thieves? And he said, He that showed mercy on him. Then said Jesus unto him, Go, and do thou likewise." Luke x. 30-37.

In this instructive parable we may observe that several individuals are brought into view. First, "a certain man went down from Jerusalem toward Jericho." No doubt he was a Jew, and would naturally look to those of his own nation for assistance in his distress. He had fallen among thieves, by whom he was stripped of his raiment, and wounded and left half dead. When the priest came near, the poor wounded man, if he were aware of his presence and of his official character, must have felt that help was at hand. Surely he, upon whose forehead were emblazoned the words, "Holiness to the Lord," (Exod. 28: 36, 38.) would feel it to be his duty to help a brother in distress. It seems, however, that his sense of duty was not strong enough to overcome his disinclination to put himself to some little inconvenience; and so he passed by on the other side. Next came the Levite. Again must the smitten spirit of him who lay by the wayside half dead, have been revived. Was it not reasonable that one of those whom the Lord had "taken from among the children of Israel," and hallowed instead of the first born, (Num. 3: 12, 13,) who were "given as a gift for the Lord, to do the service of the tabernacle of the congregation," (Num. 18: 6,) whose every want was provided for so abundantly, should look with pity upon a suffering brother? But no such emotion ruled his heart. True, he "came and looked on him," but then "passed by on the other side." Deploable indeed must have been the situation of the poor naked and wounded traveller, had all who passed that way been alike unkindly of him. "But a certain Samaritan, as he journeyed, came where he was." Is it likely, that he, who found himself deserted in the hour of need, by those of his own nation, of whom he had a right to expect assistance, would entertain the prospect of being relieved by the despised Samaritan? We are here instructed, that our sympathies are not to be confined to our own people. The kind Samaritan, "when he saw him, had compassion on him, and went to him, and bound up his wounds, pouring in oil and wine, and set him on his own beast, and brought him to an inn, and took care of him." It does not appear that he hesitated for a moment, or stopped to inquire, is not this one of the nation of the Jews who are at enmity with the Samaritans, and who will have no dealings with us? But, actuated by compassion for a man in distress, he at once performed those offices of kindness which constituted him "neighbour unto him that fell among the thieves." Not satisfied with taking him to the inn, he did not depart till he had paid the host for taking care of him, and even pledged his word to pay more if required, when he came again. How natural would it have been to reason thus: I have relieved this man's present and pressing wants, I have rescued him from impending death and brought him to a place of safety and comfort; why should I concern myself more? Let others do their part. But the good Samaritan did not stop with any half-way measures. Carrying out the precept, "Love thy neighbour as thyself," he ceased not until he had done what he could to relieve his neighbour and put him in a condition to take care of himself.

Now, in many respects the situation of the slave is similar to that of the man who fell among thieves: with this difference, however, that the slave is continually robbed of his earnings, deprived of his liberty, and in a great measure shut out from the avenues of knowledge, important as it is deemed for our well-being here, and as an auxiliary to a preparation for an hereafter; while, in the latter case, the thieves merely took such property belonging to the traveller as they found with him; wounding him, it is true, and leaving him to perish if he might, but still in possession of life and liberty to avail himself of the help of others. When, therefore we remind our fellow-believers in the Christian religion that the slave demands our help, we merely ask them to act the part of the good Samaritan. Seeing that the assistance of many is necessary to extricate so many from the sad and distressed condition in which they are forcibly held by others, and in which their offspring are doomed to lie in sorrow after them, may we not properly call upon all participants of the Gospel of Christ to come to the rescue of those whom He in the great judgment day will not be ashamed to call his brethren. Let none avert their Christian sympathy, and pass by on the other side. When we call upon Christians, as the friends of the distressed, to withhold their aid from this system of robbery and oppression, to withdraw the support which they furnish, by feeding and clothing themselves at the market supplied by the unpaid toil of the slave, let us not be told to attend to our scruples. "Attend to thy scruples," says one; "I respect thy scruples, and desire that all may attend to their persuasions of duty." Very well; but would such an exhortation given by the priest and the Levite to the good Samaritan have excused them from performing a similar part? It is instructive to remember the impressive words of the Saviour: "For I was an hungred and ye gave me no meat: I was thirsty and ye gave me no drink, &c." If, then, one cannot feel excused from performing an act of mercy or kindness to his fellow when in need, is it not of still more awful consequence to be daily lending our aid in oppressing our fellow-men, by giving the motive to those who deprive them of liberty, who extort their labour at pleasure and determine for them how little they shall be permitted to enjoy of its fruit; who tear asunder man and wife, in violation of the express command of Christ; who traffic in men, women and children, as if they had no souls. Reprehensible as was the conduct of the priest and Levite, depriving themselves of the noble character of "Neighbour to him who fell among thieves," few will deny, that they would have added to the crime of omission a more serious one of commission, had they overtaken the thieves and bought from them the clothing and other property taken from the traveller, and made a commercial arrangement with them to buy goods so obtained in future.

Let us not ask for the blaze of noon-day to light us out of bed; but up and be doing. Use the light which thou hast, and more will be given when needed. "As the day is, so shall thy strength be." Be ashamed to ask or wait for a special direction to save a drowning man, or to pull a child out of the fire. Nay! how dost thou dare to lend thy hand to thrust them in, or keep them there?

Who is neighbour to the slave? Reflect, reader! and answer for thyself. W.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

OBJECTIONS AGAINST A DISUSE OF SLAVE PRODUCE.

The advocate of abstinence from the productions of slavery, is often met with the objection, that, so far as this measure would operate at all it would bring ruin upon the slaveholder, and misery and starvation upon the slave. "I believe it right for me," said a Friend, "to purchase and use the productions of slave labour, in order to enable the master to feed his slaves." Here was a full admission that the consumers of slave produce are the supporters of slavery. This Friend seemed also to overlook the important consideration, whether his practice was right or wrong, and to act on the false principle that "the end justifies the means."

Several Friends were engaged, not long since, in conversation on the subject of slavery, and reference was made to a sentiment expressed by the Editor of The Friend, in 1829, Vol. 3, p. 68. "Once establish the practicability of an adequate supply for the demand of sugar and coffee, free of slave labour, and it appears to us, the downfall of the whole slave system must inevitably follow; for we cannot doubt the general disposition to give the product of free labour the preference." One of the Friends said he did not believe that such a result would follow. Another remarked, that so far as the opinion applied to countries where coffee and sugar are the staple products—Cuba, for instance—the effect would undoubtedly be the abolition of slavery. "Supposing this to be the case," replied the former, "what would be the consequence? Ruin and misery to the slaves!"

The same sentiment has been frequently avowed by Friends, in the hearing of the writer, and strongly urged against a disuse of slave labour products. But may not this question be appropriately put to such individuals: is it right to test the truth of a religious principle by our opinions of the probable consequences of its operation? It is very obvious, that on this ground, there could be no fixed principles of action. It is equally clear, that, if it be right to refuse to contribute to the "gain of oppression" by purchasing its fruits, no evil consequences apparently resulting from such a refusal could make it wrong.

"But to assert that the slaves must starve if we do not purchase the products of their labour, is assuming a fact without proof and against probability. Will the diminution of demand for these products give them more or less time to raise the food necessary to their own existence? Cut off wholly the demand for these productions, will it cut off the right arm of the slave—that power of labour which his Creator gave him by which to raise his daily food? Will the master, from sheer depravity, compel his slaves to be idle and to slave, because others will not buy of him the productions of extorted labour?

"But suppose the slave would starve unless we contributed to his support: the question then arises in what way shall we so contribute as to make justice and benevolence coincident? To answer this, let us take a sufficiently parallel case. A man engaged in a piratical trade, sustains by it his wife and an innocent family of children. He applies to us to buy of him his ill-gotten wares, which we refuse to do on principle. He then urges that those who are dependent on him must starve, unless he can take back with him the means of supplying them with food. The appeal is made to us in such sincerity as to lead us to inquire how we can make our sense of immutable justice, and our inclination to succour the innocent and helpless, to act together consistently. What would be our necessary conclusion? Obviously this: to continue to reject the goods, and yet to give gratuitously the aid which we should deem due to the occasion."

The objection that both the slaveholder and the slaves would be injured by discontinuing the traffic and the use of the products of slavery, reminds me of the arguments, long and successfully employed, against the abolition of the slave-trade, by the West India planters, the Liverpool and Bristol slave merchants, and others who thought their interest would be affected by the change. They constantly asserted that the success of Wilberforce and his friends, would bring "ruin and bloodshed to the Colonies, destruction to the masters, and wretchedness, tenfold worse than slavery, to the slaves." The committee in London for effecting the abolition of the slave-trade, said in their Report for 1799, "In the progress of this business a powerful combination of interests has been excited against us. The African trader, the planter and the West Indian merchant, have united their forces to defend the fortress in which their supposed treasures lie. Vague calculations, and false alarms arising from them, have been thrown out to the public, attempting to show that the constitution, and even the existence of this free and opulent nation, depend on its depriving the inhabitants of a foreign country of those rights and that liberty which we ourselves so highly and so justly prize."

The selfish spirit and false views which are now in various ways opposing the abolition of slavery, appear in strong colours in the following remarks of Boswell, the biographer of Dr. Johnson:—"I beg leave to enter my most solemn protest against Dr. Johnson's general doctrine with respect to the slave-trade. I will resolutely say, that his unfavourable notion of it was owing to prejudice and imperfect or false information. The wild and dangerous attempt which has for some time been persisted in to obtain an act of our Legislature to abolish so very important and necessary a branch of commercial interest, must have been crushed at once, had not the insignificance of the zealots who vainly took the lead in it, made the vast body of planters, merchants and others, whose immense properties are involved in that trade, reasonably enough suppose that there could be no danger. The encouragement which the attempt has received excites my wonder and indignation; and though some men of superior abilities have supported it, (whether from a love of temporary popularity when prosperous, or a love of general mischief when desperate,) my opinion is unshaken. To abolish a statute which, in all ages, God has sanctioned and man continued, would not only be robbery to an innumerable class of our fellow subjects, but it would be extreme cruelty to African savages; a portion of whom it saves from massacre or intolerable bondage in their own country, and introduces into a much happier state of life; especially now, when their passage to the West Indies, and their treatment there, is humanely regulated. To abolish that trade, would be to shut the gates of mercy on mankind."

The extraordinary opposition manifested by many Friends against abstaining from the purchase and use of the products of slave labour, and against any associated action, either within or without our religious Society, for procuring a supply of free produce, is not only in perfect accordance with the course pursued by those whose prejudices and interests were connected with the existence of the slave-trade, but is directly opposed to their own principles and profession as Friends.

The Rules of Discipline of our religious Society exhort our members "to be no way accessory to this enormous national evil, [the slave-trade,] but to discourage it by all the justifiable means in their power;" not to do "anything whereby [the slaves'] bondage may be prolonged;" nor to be "in any wise concerned in purchasing, disposing of, or holding mankind as slaves, or by any means encourage or countenance a traffic in slaves." If we allow the slaveholders to be judges—and in this case it must, I think, be admitted that they are competent for the office—the decision has already been given, that to consume the products of slave labour is to be "accessory" to the slave-trade; and that the consumption of those products "encourages and countenances a traffic in slaves," holds mankind as slaves, "and prolongs their bondage." How remarkably is all this illustrated by recent circumstances in Cuba! The British parliament passes an act which introduces the slave-made sugars of Cuba and Brazil to the consumption of the people of Great Britain—the news arrives in Havana—the planters at once perceive that the demand for their sugars will be vastly increased, and of course, they must get more slaves—the price of these rises 25 per cent.—the slave-traders illuminate their barnacoons, and immediately despatch twelve slave ships to the coast of Africa! These facts contain a volume of arguments and should carry conviction to the heart of every consumer of slave products, that "THE SUGAR OF CUBA COMES TO US DRENCHED WITH HUMAN BLOOD." So, says Dr. Channing, "we ought to see it, and turn from it with loathing. The guilt which produces it ought to be put down by the spontaneous instinctive horror of the civilized world."

It is often denied that the exhortations of our Discipline, relative to an entire disconnection from the slave-trade and slavery, are applicable to the traffic in, and use of the products of slave labour. Let us briefly examine this sentiment. It seems that up to the year 1834, when our Discipline was revised, it interdicted specific acts connected with slavery: then a broad principle was adopted, prohibiting our members from the use of "ANY MEANS" which "encourage or countenance a traffic in slaves." It is, therefore, the latter as well as the spirit of the Discipline, that if there is ANY act done by a member which countenances or encourages a traffic in slaves, that act is to be the subject of religious treatment. Can any one doubt that the commerce, manufacture and use of slave products are means by which such traffic is encouraged and countenanced? If they be such means, they are clearly condemned by the Discipline. It is no answer to this view of the case, to say that the special act of using slave produce was not in the contemplation of the revising committee. They specified no act under this rule, and we are to believe they were led into this language for the purpose of uttering a general principle, existing in the TAPRU, to the test of which all our actions and practices are to be brought.

To elucidate this position still further, I may advert to the paragraph of our Discipline which says:—"We fervently desire that the members of our religious Society may carefully avoid engaging in any trade or business promotive of war; sharing or partaking of the spoils of war by purchasing or selling prize goods, &c." In what degree slavery itself is war, and how far the support of slavery is "promotive of war," are interesting and important inquiries, to which I will probably recur at another time. For my present purpose it is only necessary to remark, that, excepting those cruel attacks of tribe against tribe in Africa, to procure slaves for the American market, "wars are not entered into simply for the sake of the prize goods which may be taken; but slavery and the slave-trade exist solely for the sake of the productions of the slaves' labour. In a higher sense, then, the duty of abstinence from these productions is obvious. We hold it is a violation of our testimony against war to use prize goods; why is it not, in a greater degree a violation of our testimony against slavery to use the goods which are its avails? We would be startled by the proposition that a Friend was 'in no wise' concerned in supporting war, or in countenancing and encouraging the evil, whilst he freely used its productions. Shall we be less startled at the proposition that he is not 'in any wise' concerned in purchasing, disposing of or holding mankind as slaves,' and does 'by no means encourage or countenance a traffic in slaves,' whilst he freely uses, buys and sells that, for the procuring of which slaves are held, and the traffic in slaves exists?"

A. B.

ASSOCIATED ACTION.

TENTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE ASSOCIATION FOR THE BENEFIT OF COLORED ORPHANS.

The Managers of the COLORED ORPHAN ASYLUM offer their Tenth Annual Report, under circumstances not materially different from those which characterized the preceding year. For the maintenance of the Institution they are still dependent on subscriptions and voluntary contributions, made from time to time by humane individuals, who feel a special interest in their undertaking. For ability to employ these means, so as essentially to benefit and bless the children under their charge, they look to the Great Source of all good; with the hope that he will not only crown their present labours with success, but render their future efforts more single in purpose, and more far-reaching in their results. Though embarrassed by the difficulties which inadequate pecuniary resources continue to present, they feel that there are some cheering tokens, which forbid discouragement, and many reasons, in the retrospect of their history, for devout and grateful acknowledgment.

The receipts of the past year have been larger than those of the preceding one, but the Association is still encumbered with a debt. With the ample accommodations of their building, they have not felt themselves justifiable in excluding those who have a decided claim to the benefits of the Institution.

The statistics are as follows:

Admitted since the opening of the Asylum, (310)
Number of children at date of last Report, 139
Admitted during the present year, 47
Total, 186
Present number, 158
Indentured, 6
Returned to surviving parents or friends, 15
Deaths, 7
Total, 186

Although the number of deaths exceeds that in the last Report, the fact is not to be ascribed to any unfavorable change in the health of the household. Its general condition in this respect has been remarkably good. The children who have died, were the subjects of lingering disease, the seeds of which it is believed most of them brought with them into the Institution. With only one exception, they were the victims of prolonged consumptive complaints. The gratuitous services of Dr. JAMES McCUSK SMITH, as Physician, should be gratefully acknowledged. And the Managers have satisfaction in believing, that they have been blessed with success.

The schools have continued to flourish under the charge of the same approved teachers, in the different departments. The instruction, as heretofore, is little more than elementary; but it is believed is adapted to fulfil the intention of qualifying its subjects to be practically useful and exemplary members of Society.

The two young teachers, mentioned in the last Report, as taken from among the children of the Asylum, in which they have received their entire education, are becoming more capable and useful, and the general aptness and improvement of the children, is a standing refutation of the notion of their natural incapacity. Favorable reports have been received from most of those who have been bound out, and the annual letters from them are agreeable and encouraging testimonials. The Managers have ever insisted, that no education is really and permanently good, which does not serve to render the sense of moral obligation more powerful, and to enlighten and refine the moral perceptions. The principles which they desire to impart, are such as must ever make men more amenable to the civil authority, and more conscientious in the discharge of every social duty. If faithfully and intelligently acted upon, they will clothe every condition of life with the spirit of contentment and peace, and may be safely left to expand in the widest results, that the providence of God will allow.

System and good order continue to characterize the management of the house, and some important additions have been made to its comforts and conveniences. Among these it may be mentioned, that the arrangements of the Infirmary have been rendered more appropriate and conducive to the health and comfort of the invalids.

The Nursery School, which was recently established at the presentation of the last Report, has been very successful and interesting in its operation, and contains eighteen infantile inmates of the Asylum.

The larger children are to a very considerable extent made useful, in the house, and the more laborious part of the work, such as sweeping, scrubbing, washing, &c., are accomplished principally by their hands.

The Managers would refer to the Superintendent's Report of the products of the Garden, which has been a peculiar source of profit and interest, and has yielded an abundant supply of vegetables during the past season.

The Board feel themselves again compelled to advert to the subject of their funds. Their expectations are perhaps too easily exaggerated by hope, but they cannot believe that they will be reduced to the necessity of contracting their operations. Can it be, that in this community of churches and Christian observances, where wealth is so profusely lavished, the means should be withheld, or scantily furnished, of relieving the wants of neglected suffering childhood, and of infusing into the youthful mind and heart, useful knowledge and Christian principles? The support they have hitherto received has ever been gratefully appreciated by the Managers, but it has not yet been adequate for the full exercise of the forethought required, to provide advantageously and economically, the necessary supplies for the establishment. There is enough properly to occupy the attention of the Managers in supervising the details of the Institution, if the Association were entirely unembarrassed in regard to matters of finance. It would be far more agreeable to themselves, and they believe more beneficial to the children under their care, if instead of being occupied so frequently as at present in the solicitation of funds, they were more appropriately and efficiently employed in conducting the plans, which philanthropy has suggested, and modern intelligence decided, to be best adapted to effect the purposes of such an Institution.

The Managers do not think it necessary to argue their cause with those, who are liberal and comprehensive in their views of Christian obligation. They only ask of such, amid the innumerable existing instrumentalities for the moral and physical improvement of mankind, of which the Gospel is the source and centre, to assign to this its appropriate place. They believe that the work is not of slight importance, nor merely of a temporary or private bearing. It is one of public interest, and so far as its results correspond with the principles on which it was established, will be a public blessing. If its effect on those brought under its influence, should be in any degree commensurate with these, the Managers will feel that however their wishes may for a time be baffled or limited, their efforts have not entirely fallen short of the success which has been so long and so earnestly desired.

New York, 11th Month, 27th, 1846.

From the Anti-Slavery Reporter.

SUPPRESSION OF THE SLAVE-TRADE.

The following important communication has been made by the Committee of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, to the First Lord of the Treasury.

"The suppression of the African slave-trade has long been ardently desired and earnestly pursued by the people of this country. Almost every means which private philanthropy or public benevolence could suggest, and which promised to realize that great object, have been tried. Successive Governments, with but few intervals of intermission, have for the last forty years exhausted the arts of diplomacy; and have employed a large naval force, in various parts of the world, to achieve the same end; but all efforts, whether public or private, have hitherto failed to extinguish the inhuman traffic; and must continue to fail so long as Slavery exists, and the demand for slaves, resulting from it, continues.

After twenty-one years of active and laborious efforts the African Institution left it on record, as the fruit of its experience, that 'It is in Slavery that the Slave-trade has its origin; it is the market provided by the slave-holder, which furnishes the direct incentive to all the crimes of a trade in slaves; to the murders and conflagrations which attend their capture; to the condensed horrors of the middle passage which follow it; and to the misery and desolation of a continent.' The fact, thus enunciated, indicates the true point of attack—Slavery must be abolished before the slave-trade can be suppressed.

In conformity with this view of the subject, the constitution of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society lays it down as a fundamental principle, 'That so long as slavery exists, there is no reasonable prospect of the annihilation of the slave-trade; and of extinguishing the sale and barter of human beings;' and, 'that the extinction of slavery and the slave-trade will be attained most effectually by the employment of those means which are of a moral, religious, and pacific character.' To the peaceful extinction of slavery, the efforts of its executive Committee have been exclusively confined; and they now repeat their conviction, so often stated in memorials laid before Government, that the attempt to suppress the slave-trade by an armed force is not only vain in itself, but mischievous in its results."

The Committee then adduce various statistics to show the ground of their conviction.

"It is then incontrovertible that the coercive principle as applied to the suppression of the slave-trade has failed, that it costs this country an immense amount of treasure—that it wastes the health and lives of British seamen—that it aggravates the horrors, without sensibly mitigating the extent, of the traffic—and that some other means must be found, if ever this scourge of the human race be removed.

No hope can reasonably be indulged that the Spanish and Brazilian governments will fulfil their engagements for the suppression of the slave-trade. Their bad faith stands conspicuous before the world. It is vain, therefore, to expect their cordial and zealous co-operation in this great work. So long as slavery exists in any part of their dominions, the African slave-trade will be viewed as a necessity, and though not openly justified, will be secretly fostered and encouraged."

"What then, the Committee respectfully ask, is to be done? The Government having abandoned the policy of excluding the slave-produced sugars of the Spanish colonies and Brazil from the British markets; and opened the ports to their reception in common with the free products of free countries—a measure which they doubt not will greatly stimulate the slave-trade, and strengthen the system of slavery—there appears to them but the following means left to the Government of attacking it with success, and which they respectfully submit to its grave consideration.

First.—The Committee earnestly trust that Her

Majesty's Government will recall the cruelties from the coast of Africa, and abandon a scheme of coercive suppression which has been found, in operation, powerless for good, and productive of many and great evils. In recommending this course, the Committee feel that it is equally called for by justice and benevolence. A large annual expenditure of money and of life on the coast of Africa cannot be justified, when no end is really secured, but that of giving intensity to the miseries of the African slaves. The Spanish colonies and Brazil will continue to feed their plantations with new victims, in proportion to the increasing demands of commerce; and this country, it is now evident, cannot prevent them. To withdraw, then, from a useless conflict is necessary, and cannot be dishonourable. Should the Government, in view of all the facts of the case, resolve upon this step, the Committee would urgently recommend, that the funds that will be saved thereby, may be applied to the development of the free produce of British India. If, in any part of the British empire, the means of competing with slave-labour produce in the markets of the world, can be found, it will be found there. Possessed of boundless resources, both of soil and labour, all that is required is, that its means of internal transit should be perfected, the irrigation of its cultivable lands secured; its labour freed from all unjust restrictions; and that those great public works, the importance of which is universally admitted, should be prosecuted, in order to secure to the capitalist and to the farmer the fair reward of their risks and their toil. Were these things attended to without unnecessary delay, there would be no necessity for transporting, at an enormous cost, the laborers of India to the British colonies for the cultivation of sugar. The delta of the Godavery and the valley of the Ganges, would supply that article in the greatest abundance, and at the smallest cost. To carry capital to the plantations in British India is, in the judgment of the Committee, wiser than to transport laborers from British India to the plantations in Jamaica, British Guiana, and Trinidad; or, to use your lordship's words in your despatch to Governor Light, on immigration, dated 15th February, 1840, 'it is mere matter of calculation to the capitalist what sugar will cost him to raise in Hindostan, to bring to England, and clear of duty; and, whether all this done, he can compete successfully with the Demerara planter. If he can, the sugar business will rise in Bengal, and the Coolie remain at home; the plantation will be found for the labourer, and not the labourer go to the plantation.'

Secondly.—The Committee respectfully suggest that Her Majesty's Government should require the liberation of all slaves introduced into the Spanish colonies and Brazil, contrary to the faith of treaties; and who are entitled by the law of those countries, as well as by treaty, to their liberty, without delay and without restriction. This would strike a blow at the root of the evil. The negotiations which Lord Palmerston formerly opened with the Spanish government on this subject, and which it is evident his lordship intended to apply to the Brazilians also, produced the most salutary effects. Though these negotiations were suspended during the period of Lord Aberdeen's tenure of office, they were never formally abandoned; and, it is now hoped, they will be renewed, and prosecuted with the vigour which their importance demands. Great Britain is, the Committee affirm, the guardian of the freedom of the vast multitudes of Africans who have been illegally introduced into the Spanish colonies and Brazil; and by exhibiting herself as such, in the eyes of the world, as she ought to do, she will do more to break up the atrocious system of slavery, and its horrible adjunct, the slave-trade, than perhaps by any other means now within her power.

Thirdly.—The Committee would further suggest, that measures should be adopted in relation to Africa, which should facilitate the operations of free labour on that continent. At present, even the British settlements do not enjoy the same commercial advantages with this country, as foreign states, in respect to the produce which they do or can raise. This anomaly in our commercial code, the Committee trust, will be remedied as early as possible; and that every kind of produce from the British African settlements will be admitted to the home markets on the same duties as those from the British colonies, and from British India.

The Government, the Committee are persuaded, possess the means, and they most earnestly hope they will be inclined to use them, for the overthrow of slavery, and the establishment of freedom throughout the world.

From the Manchester Examiner.

CULTIVATION OF COTTON IN INDIA.

Towards the close of last month, the Manchester Commercial Association addressed a letter to the Directors of the East India Company on the cultivation of the cotton plant in India. In that letter they drew attention to the increased consumption of cotton in this country, and expressed their fears that, owing to the diversion of land and labour to other products, the production of the article in America would rather diminish than increase. In their opinion, "a crisis in the cotton trade appears to impend," and they are, therefore, extremely anxious that the Court of Directors should, by energetic, liberal, and comprehensive measures, clear the ground in India for the free exercise of British enterprise and intelligence in the culture of that most necessary article to this country, and especially to Manchester and the surrounding district. The association point out the prominent obstacles to increased and remunerative productions, which are—the government assessment, or land tax, amounting in two presidencies to seventy-five per cent on the produce; the want of a regular local market for the ryot; the badness of the existing roads; the pressure of local transit dues; dishonest packing, and the ignorant or careless use of the saw-gin. The experiments of the East India Company have, they think, proved that American cotton can be grown in India, some of the earliest sown fields having this season produced 700lbs. per acre; and they contend, on the authority of experienced parties, that the cultivation "ought now to be transferred to the native ryot and merchant, who are prepared to take it up, and who could produce it, at least, fifty per cent cheaper than the Company." In reply to this letter, the Commercial Association have received the following communication:—

"East India House, November 17, 1846.

"Sir—I am commanded by the Court of Directors of the East India Company to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, dated the 20th ultimo, stating that fears are entertained that the diversion of labour in America from cotton cultivation, for the purpose of increasing the production of sugar and other articles of food, will bring about a crisis in the cotton trade seriously affecting the manufacturer and operative in the northern districts of England, and urging, on this and various other grounds, the great importance of extending and improving the cultivation of the cotton plant in India by the removal of all obstacles that present themselves to an increased and remunerative production, by the establishment of local markets, and the construction of roads; and further pointing out the frauds that continue to be practised by the natives in India, for the purpose of increasing the weight of the cotton; likewise the injury to the staple by an unskilful use of the saw-gin; and also requesting on the part of the Manchester Commercial Association, certain information regarding the quantity of cotton ordered by the Court of Directors to be forwarded to England, the arrival of which, you state, is expected with much interest.

"In reply, I am commanded to acquaint you, that the interest the Court of Directors have for many years manifested in the important subject to which you have drawn their attention has in no degree abated, and that there is reason to conclude that the exertions of the governments of India to improve and extend the cultivation of the cotton plant, and to introduce machinery for rapidly and effectively cleaning the cotton, are likely to be attended with the best results.

"I am commanded to add, that in order to test the success of the experiments which have been undertaken, the Court have given directions for the shipment to England of cotton to the extent of 5,000 or 6,000 bales, if procurable, from each presidency, in the expectation that the attention of capitalists in this country and in India will be thereby drawn to the subject, and that they will be induced to take advantage of the important improvements in the cultivation and preparation of East India cotton, effected through the measures which have been introduced for that object, at considerable expense, by the East India Company.

"I am, sir, your most obedient humble servant,
(Signed) JAMES A. MELVILLE.
James A. Turner, Esq.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, FIRST MONTH 1, 1847.

A HAPPY NEW YEAR!—In no spirit of levity, and with no affectation of an unfeeling sentiment, do we approach our readers with this usual greeting of the season. Standing as on the brink of that portion of existence from next to which a Year has just slid into eternity—ourselves spared to fulfil the uncompleted duties of Time, the occasion is well calculated to inspire us with truthful soberness. To be and do good—to love God and our neighbour—is to be happy; and to be this, is to have a happy new year. Co-labourers with us in the cause of the oppressed, we wish you the enjoyment of such a year!

THE PAST AND FUTURE.—The year which has just left us will be memorable for its events. In science, it has verified the received theory of the heavenly bodies, confirmed the formula by which their motion was computed, and added, in doing so, a new world to our solar system. It has perfected the means of an intercourse, between distant places, quick as the flowing of mind, and has brought into existence a new agency of Death, which will probably make the cotton plant, in after time, as destructive of life to the white man, as, in the past, it has been to the black. In the arts, it has added new and valuable inventions. In the government and policy of nations, it has united ill-gotten Texas to our blood-stained constellation of States. It has commenced, for the yet further extension and protection of the system of Slavery, a cruel, bloody and unnatural war upon our sister republic of Mexico. It has opened a British market, with twenty millions of customers, to the slave-raised productions of Cuba and Brazil—adding tens of thousands of victims to the number of annual sufferers under that system of robbery and murder which belongs to the mode of these productions. It has opened, in effect, a new market in Africa to supply the fresh demand for men necessary to this virtual, additional, CANNIBALISM. The triumphs of Science have been great, the sufferings of Humanity greater; but there is a Power which can stay the elements of confusion and wrong, and we look to the future for a certain, speedy, illustration of it.

Fully cherishing this faith, we feel that we are not the less called to seek, by moral, self-denying, peaceful means, the subjugation of those elements in ourselves and others. It is through these means that He who is THE TRUTH delights to operate.

TENTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE ASSOCIATION FOR THE BENEFIT OF COLOURED ORPHANS IN NEW YORK. We were much gratified by a visit, not long since, to the Institution which is the subject of this report. As we passed through its various departments and observed the order and neatness of their arrangements; the kindness and attention bestowed upon the sick; the efficient methods of instruction in the school rooms, and the promptness, intelligence and acquirements manifested by the children during the exercises, we were more than ever impressed with the high importance of this humane and interesting establishment. How beautiful it was to behold a hundred and fifty little children of both sexes—the despised descendants of outraged and cruelly oppressed ancestors—thus rescued from the depths of misery and degradation, and trained for paths of usefulness and happiness. Deeply was our heart affected when, in concert, they repeated,

"We are a band of orphans, we have no home or parents." The appeals of the devoted and indefatigable managers will, we trust, find a liberal response from those who possess the means of aiding them, and appreciate the claims of an oppressed, despised and afflicted race.

Donations are received by the Secretary, Anna H. Shotwell, 195 Third Avenue, and the Treasurer, Mary Murray, 96 East Fourteenth Street, New York.

MOVEMENTS IN GREAT BRITAIN ON THE DISUSE OF SLAVE PRODUCE. We give below from the London A. S. Reporter a letter from a well known friend of the slave, the Treasurer of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, suggesting that a meeting shall be held at an early day for the adoption of some efficient measures to promote the use of free grown produce. This is an important and deeply interesting movement, in the success of which we should rejoice.

We have also the highly encouraging information that the Committee of the British and Foreign A. S. Society, have unanimously resolved to issue an address recommending the use of Free Labour Produce. In connection with this subject, we have placed under the head of Associated Action, some extracts from a communication addressed by that committee to the Prime Minister, soliciting the Government to recall the cruisers from the Coast of Africa, and apply the funds that will be saved thereby to the development of the free produce of British India; and also, that measures may be adopted to facilitate the operations of free labour in Africa.

These movements indicate the progress of sound and consistent views in relation to the individual responsibilities of those who deal in or consume the productions of slavery, and we confess that they not only inspire us to pursue our humble labours with renewed energy, but animate us with the hope, that the days of slavery will, ere long, be numbered.

We hope to receive the address of the Committee, and other interesting information in time for publication in our next number.

"To the Editor of the Anti-Slavery Reporter."

"It is well known to those who have taken an active part in the origin and subsequent proceedings of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, that amongst the means to be employed by the Society is the following: 'To recommend the use of free-grown produce (as far as practicable) in preference to slave-grown, and to promote the adoption of fiscal regulations in favour of free labour.'

"I am not about to enter at present into a lengthened argument in favour of the conduct thus recommended. If it be true that the receiver is as bad as the thief, it follows clearly, in my opinion, that we are not at liberty to purchase needlessly the produce of a system involving not only wholesale robbery, but the commission of almost every wrong by which humanity is outraged and the just and benign precepts of the gospel are trampled under foot. But not only on the ground of high and sacred principles are we bound thus to act. If we look to the effect of the large demand for slave produce which has too long existed in this and other countries, we shall find that it has furnished, and still furnishes, the motive for the continuation and extension of slavery on a stupendous scale in the United States of America. In a similar manner, the demand in foreign countries for the staple articles of Brazil and the Spanish Islands of Cuba and Porto Rico, occasioned a great addition to the slave population of those regions procured by means of the African slave-trade.

"We deeply lament that Great Britain is henceforth to afford a fresh motive for the prosecution of trade in men—that nefarious traffic—by becoming larger purchasers than heretofore of slave sugar; an event that has been hailed, as we are informed, by an illumination in the great slave mart of Cuba—the Havana. It is painful to dwell on these facts; but is it not time seriously to consider whether it is not a duty incumbent on the Abolitionists of Great Britain, and on those of other countries, to refuse any longer to contribute to the gain of oppression by the purchase of its fruits; whilst at the same time they use every other means in their power to promote the speedy downfall of a system hateful in the sight of a holy God, and of every enlightened Christian. It is the desire of the writer that a meeting should be held at an early day, consisting of the friends of the slave from various parts of Great Britain, to consider the propriety and practicability of carrying out to a far greater extent than has hitherto been done, the views briefly advocated in this letter, on which I shall be glad to receive communications from any of the readers of the Reporter, directly, or through the medium of its columns.

I remain, respectfully, thy friend,
GEO. WM. ALEXANDER,
Stoke Newington, 10mo. 31st, 1846."

THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.—A Convention of about twelve hundred ministers of various denominations from America, and several countries of Europe, was held in London, in the Eighth month last, for the purpose of forming an "Evangelical Alliance;" the design of which, as described by one of its members, is the "cultivation and extension of love, practical love, among the people of God; of union in heart, union in prayer, union in action."

In their deliberation on the terms of membership, it was proposed that slaveholders should be excluded; but through the opposition of the American ministers, this proposition was rejected, and it was left to the several branches on the continent of Europe and America to adopt, respectively, "such organization as in their judgment may be most in accordance with their peculiar circumstances." The final and complete organization of the General Alliance, was, consequently, deferred till another general conference. In the mean time, the several branch organizations are to be formed, and if, says a distinguished member of the Convention, they are found to introduce slaveholders into the communion of the Alliance, "the repudiation of the deed will then become our duty, and separation from those by whom the pollution has been wilfully contracted." The action of the Convention, however, gave great satisfaction to many of its members, who regarded it as an agreement "to hold the interests and rights of the bleeding slave in abeyance for years to come."

The British District Organization of the Evangelical Alliance, has recently been formed in Manchester. It was composed of about five hundred members of the leading denominations of Great Britain; and of that number only five dissented from a resolution which was adopted, "that no holder of a slave shall be deemed eligible to membership."

"This most gratifying fact," says the London A. S. Reporter, "cannot fail to tell with amazing force on the truly Christian sections of the church in the United States. We fully expect that the decision thus reached by the British Organization, will not only influence all who sanctioned it by their vote in their private intercourse with Americans, and other foreigners who may be implicated in the sin of slaveholding, but will lead them to use every legitimate effort in public, to promote the entire and universal abolition of slavery. We confess that we argue great things from this decision—a decision not hastily adopted—a decision which we believe was conscientiously arrived at, and which, while it will strike terror into the hearts of slaveholders, will pour the balm and oil into the bleeding wounds of the poor oppressed slave. That the decision will strengthen the Anti-Slavery cause in the United States, we have no doubt."

WESTERN FREE PRODUCE CONVENTION. We have before us the proceedings of a meeting held at Salem, Indiana, on the 28th and 29th of the Tenth month last, for the purpose of devising ways and means for the promotion of abstinence from the products of slave labour, and for procuring a supply of free goods.

The meeting was organized by the appointment of a President and Secretary, and then proceeded to consider various important suggestions relating to the purpose of the Convention, which were judiciously resolved.

Among the measures adopted was the formation of a Society, under the title of the "Western Free Produce Association," having for the preamble to its Constitution, the following declaration.

"Whereas, we are convinced that Slavery receives its primary support from those who purchase the proceeds of the slave's toil, all other supports being mere guards to protect the slaveholder in the business of extorting these proceeds by brute force in order to obtain the money they demand in market; and as Slavery is an evil of the utmost magnitude, we deem it a duty of the greatest importance to withdraw as much as practicable this support and main spring from the system, and to induce the purchase and consumption of articles produced by free labour only. In order that measures and operations may be more effectually put in train to secure a supply of such articles throughout the country, and in order also that we may press the examination of the subject more earnestly upon the minds of the people, we hereby form ourselves into an Association, and agree to be governed by the following Constitution."

The Constitution establishes the name and reaffirms the principles and purposes of the Association, designates the officers and their duties, appoints annual meetings, and the manner of altering the Constitution, and recognizes as members all who acknowledge the principles and attend the meetings of the Association.

From the several resolutions adopted, which indicate a full determination to make the Association a highly efficient one, we select the following in reference to the establishment of a free labour store at Cincinnati.

Resolved, That it is important that a wholesale Free Labour Store be opened in Cincinnati in order that a due supply of free labour goods may be conveniently obtained throughout the western country.

Resolved, That books be opened for the purpose of obtaining the sum of 3000 or more dollars to be loaned by individuals without interest for five years, in shapes of five dollars each, to some person or persons suitable to undertake the establishment of such a store.

Resolved, That ten agents be appointed to act as financiers throughout the west, open the books, as contemplated in the above resolution, obtain the money if practicable, and loan the money as contemplated, and make report to the anniversary of the association next year."

The carrying out of these resolutions devolves on the Executive Committee, assisted by the ten agents appointed under the last resolution. We wish to the efforts of the committee and their assistants, all the success which the goodness of the cause in which they are embarked, should entitle them to expect.

THE FREE COLOURED POPULATION OF VIRGINIA.—We published, in our last number, some resolutions passed by a mob meeting in Mercer Co., Ohio, threatening to expel the coloured citizens from the county by force of arms. It seems that the Governor of Virginia has proposed to remove the free coloured people from that state—under cover of law. The injustice would be the same in both cases. The enactment of a law to accomplish an infringement of the inalienable rights of any class of citizens, can never change the character of the act itself. We view with alarm and abhorrence the atrocious proposition contained in the following extract from the message of the Governor of Virginia to the Legislature. Can it be that the Representatives from the Western Counties will so degrade themselves and their state as to sanction this outrageous plan?

"I regard our free negro population as one of our greatest evils, and to get rid of it as one of our highest duties. Great as may be the apparent difficulty of accomplishing this desirable measure, it would dwindle into insignificance under a bold and decided treatment. But all I now propose is the passing of a law providing that each county, at our next annual election, shall have the right to vote upon the question of removing the free negroes, within their respective limits, beyond the Commonwealth; that all counties voting affirmatively shall communicate the fact to the Executive, who shall be required to remove the free negroes within such counties, after six or twelve months notice; and that such population shall not thereafter be permitted to reside therein."

OUR PAPER AND ITS INFLUENCE.—As indications of the progress of the righteous testimony which we are endeavouring, however feebly, to advocate, it gives us much pleasure and encouragement to receive, from various quarters, communications similar to one recently received from England, from which we take the liberty of making the following extract. We hope the time will come when Friends will deserve the good opinion expressed by the writer.

"I have perused the Non-Slaveholder with much pleasure from its commencement; and by the reading of it my views have been strengthened of the wickedness of the country in being the means of employing two and a half millions of slaves to grow cotton for our consumption. I think that Friends in America, and particularly in your city, must have much difficulty in bearing a testimony against the use of slave produce. To us, now, in England, it is comparatively an easy matter to bear a testimony against it: I am sorry, however, to say that, as regards the great body of people in this country, they 'do not heed the afflictions of Joseph,' by their making such free use of the recently imported sugars from Cuba, Porto Rico and Brazil.

"I have felt it very much upon me to encourage you to persevere in the good work and labour—indeed, all on your side of the Atlantic. It does seem, indeed, such a practical means of opposition to slavery. I think you can hardly estimate the good the 'Non-Slaveholder' will do in drawing the attention of Friends to the subject. Friends have only to be simply informed of the fact of their direct connection with slavery when using its products, and they will, I am sure, even at a sacrifice, abandon their use."

A further approval of our efforts, as also information of the latest movement of our British friends in behalf of abstinence from the productions of slavery, will be found in a letter, just at hand from our friend G. W. Alexander, which we present to our readers under the head of Communications.

MEETING OF THE PENNSYLVANIA ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY.—We have been furnished with the following resolutions, which were adopted at a late meeting of this Society. It may, we hope, be regarded as some evidence of an increasing desire to act consistently, that these resolutions were adopted without opposition. It is, however, one thing to resolve to do right, and another to do right. The members of the American Anti-Slavery Society pledged themselves, in the Declaration of Sentiments issued by their first Convention, to "encourage the labour of freemen, rather than that of slaves, by giving a preference to their productions." But this important measure has not only been neglected by abolitionists generally, but is even opposed by some of the most earnest advocates of emancipation. Adopting the motto,—"No union with Slaveholders," they urge an individual withdrawal from all political and ecclesiastical connection with slaveholders, and seem to imagine this will fulfil their whole duty in the matter—forgetting that the commercial union with slavery is its main pillar. What would they think of a shopkeeper who should put "No union with Thieves," over his door, and yet purchase their stolen goods—telling the thieves how wicked they are to rob their neighbours, and yet encouraging them by his acts to bring him more goods! This case is precisely parallel with that of the abolitionist who adopts the motto—"No union with Slaveholders," and yet purchases the fruits of their robbery. When abolitionists return to the first principles of their organization, and prove their sincerity by consistent and self-denying action, we may hope for the full accomplishment of our object.

Resolved, That while we disclaim Ecclesiastical and Political Union with slaveholders, consistency, as well as adherence to principle, requires that we break the commercial bond which binds us in the unholy league with oppression—that we cease to build our 'house by unrighteousness, and our chambers by wrong,'—that we deny ourselves the blood-stained fruits of slavery, and that we 'have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness.'

Resolved, That the example set by the late lamented Henry Chapman & Son, of Boston, in so far 'despising the gain of oppression,' as to discontinue a lucrative connection in business with the south, is worthy of all imitation, and that as 'the memory of the just is blessed,' so will their light 'shine brighter and brighter to the perfect day' of universal freedom; revealing to those who have not yet perceived it, the duty which rests on them to bear a like practical testimony against slaveholding."

BRITISH FUNCTIONARIES ABROAD.—By an act of Parliament, British subjects, wherever they may reside, are prohibited from holding slaves. To carry out the spirit of this law, the following order has been promulgated:—similar to the rule of our Discipline, which prohibits our members from acting as executors or administrators to estates where slaves are bequeathed.

Notice to British Subjects.—The undersigned has received instructions to publish, for the information of all British subjects, that Her Majesty's Government have come to the determination of prohibiting all British functionaries, residing in slaveholding countries, from administering to the estates of deceased persons, in cases in which slaves form part of the property of the deceased.

CHARLES DUNKIN WAKE,

H. B. M. Consul for the N. and S. Carolinas.
December 10, 1846.

THE FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND AND THE BOSTON ANTI-SLAVERY FAIR.—There are many on both sides of the Atlantic who, themselves freely using the products of the slave's stolen labour, demand, in no measured terms, of the Free Church of Scotland, a return of the money it received, in aid of its religious operations, from American slaveholders—alleging it to be the price of blood, and that, therefore, it ought not to enter into the treasury of the Lord.

We are reminded, by the circumstances which belong to this case, of a scene which was once exhibited in Judea, in which the scribes and pharisees, more celebrated for imposing restrictions on others than for caring to carry them out in their own practice, brought to our Saviour a woman guilty of an offence, held to be capital under the Mosiac law, saying—"Moses in the law commanded us, that such should be stoned; but what sayest thou?" "Jesus stooped down, and with his finger wrote on the ground, as though he heard them not. So when they continued asking him, he lifted up himself, and said unto them, "He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her." And again he stooped down, and wrote on the ground. And they which heard it, being convicted by their own conscience, went out one by one, beginning at the eldest, even unto the last."

We would in no degree impair the high obligation which we consider rests on the Free Church of Scotland, to return the ill-gotten contribution which, in an hour of greatly obscured vision, it consented to accept; still there is a lesson of deep instruction in the above reminiscence, to those who, condemning the reception by the church of the slaveholder's money, do themselves wear the clothes, and use the food, and trade in the productions which have been wrung from the slave's unrequited toil, and for which they have paid to the slaveholder the very money they now denounce as the price of blood, and which was only made such by their own act!

We have seen, with much regret, an advertisement of the anti-slavery women of Boston, asking for the presentation of "twenty pieces of American bleached cottons," for the decoration of their splendid Fair; and which we expect was furnished to them. Twenty pieces of American cottons—bleached, did they require? Alas! no alchemy could remove the blood of the slave which was upon them. TWENTY PIECES—a truly significant number! It was for TWENTY PIECES of silver that Joseph was sold by his brethren into Egypt. It is for TWENTY PIECES of American cottons that the robbery of our brother of his rights, and his happiness, and the fruits of his toil, is assented to!

Our hearts fell within us as we read that advertisement in the Liberator. Memory carried us back to the time when a young man, fresh from the prison-house in Baltimore, and glowing with the love of liberty and truth, proclaimed in most touching language, in our city of Philadelphia the wrongfulness of southern slavery; and the equal wrongfulness of using the fruits of that vile oppression. There were those who then listened to his glowing yet truthful eloquence, into whom the words of this doctrine sank deep, and by whom they are cherished to this day.

Memory recalled to our view an assemblage of men from different parts of this union, convened "with one accord in one place," to consult on the slave's wrongs and devise a remedy. At this convention the American Anti-Slavery Society was organized, and a Declaration put forth to the world, stating its purposes and modes of operation. This Declaration, "done at Philadelphia the 6th day of December, A. D. 1833," pledged its signers and the body then organized—"come what may to our persons, our interests, or our reputation"—to abide consistently with its principles. Among these principles, it is set forth that every man is entitled to the products of his own labour, and among the means for their enforcement it is declared—"we shall encourage the labor of freemen rather than that of slaves, by giving a preference to their productions."

Memory, too, carried us back to a very eventful period in Boston, when it was no light matter to be an abolitionist, and when one of that number, being threatened with an exposure of his mission in the south, to the injury of his southern trade, replied—"your intimation of loss in business comes too late—one of the first things I did when I became an abolitionist, was to give up my trade in cotton."

Where now is that young man, who once so splendidly advocated the principle of abstinence? Alas! nobly as he may feel that he is acting in other relations for the slave—touching this testimony, he "hath mixed himself among the people,—strangers have devoured his strength, and he knoweth it not; yea, grey hairs are here and there upon him, yet he knoweth it not."

Where now is that Society, in regard to its promise "to the friends of liberty throughout the world," "to encourage the labor of freemen,—by giving a preference to their productions?" Alas! it has treated this pledge as but a rhetorical flourish—it has done no act for its redemption—it has sold Joseph into Egypt for twenty pieces of silver,—the price of the difference of the cost, in treasure or convenience, between the productions of the slave's stolen toil, and the freeman's compensated labor.

And, on whom of his compatriots has fallen the mantle of Henry G. Chapman?—

SELECTIONS.

From the Anti-Slavery Reporter.

THOMAS CLARKSON.

This distinguished philanthropist, was son of the Rev. W. Clarkson, formerly Master of the Grammar School at Wisbech. He was born in that town on the 26th of March, 1760, and received the rudiments of education under the care of his father. At twelve years of age he was removed to St. Paul's School, London, and subsequently graduated at St. John's, Cambridge. He was designed for the Church, in which he took deacon's orders, but subsequently abandoned the intention, and devoted himself to that great work, the abolition of the slave-trade, with which his name will ever be honourably associated.

It was in the year 1785, when Mr. Clarkson was twenty-five years of age, that his attention was first specially directed to the slave-trade. In that year, the enlightened Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge University, Dr. Peckhard, gave out two subjects for Latin dissertations, the prizes to be competed for by the middle and senior bachelors of arts. To the latter he proposed the following theme: Anne licet Inventis in Servitute dare? or, "Is it right to make slaves of others against their wills?"

During the preceding year, Mr. Clarkson obtained a prize for the best Latin dissertation; and fearing that his reputation would be lowered in the estimation of his college, he determined upon a resolute effort to obtain the prize proposed by Dr. Peckard. Under the influence of this literary ambition he commenced his inquiries; but he soon found himself at a loss for materials on which to form an enlightened judgment on the African slave-trade, to which he considered the thesis to point. He therefore repaired to London where he obtained ANTHONY BENEZER's Historical Account of Guinea. "In this precious book," he says, "I found almost all I wanted. I obtained by means of it, a knowledge of, and access to, the great authorities of Adamson, Moore, Barbot, Smith, Bosmon, and others." With this rich prize he began his work, which, as it grew upon his hands, produced a great revolution in his thoughts and feelings. The contemplation of the horrid facts which it revealed, soon dispelled the dream of literary distinction with which he had delighted himself, and induced him to produce a work of solid utility, rather than of brilliant execution. It would do injustice to the subject to substitute any other narrative than his own unaffected and touching one, of the change produced in him by the study of his subject. Mr. Clarkson says,—

"No person can tell the severe trial which the writing of it proved to me. I had expected pleasure from the invention of the arguments, from the arrangement of them, from putting of them together, and from thought in the interim that I was engaged in an innocent contest for literary honour. But all my pleasure was damped by the facts which were now continually before me. It was but one gloomy subject from morning to night. In the daytime I was uneasy. In the night I had little rest. I sometimes never closed my eyelids for grief. It became now not so much a trial for academical reputation, as for the production of a work which might be useful to injured Africa. And keeping this in my mind ever after the perusal of Benezer, I always slept with a candle in my room, that I might rise out of bed and put down such thoughts as might occur to me in the night, if I judged them valuable; conceiving that no argument of any moment should be lost in so great a cause. Having at length finished this painful task, I sent my essay to the Vice-Chancellor, and soon afterwards found myself honoured, as before, with the first prize."

The impressions of Mr. Clarkson were still further deepened on the occasion of his reading his essay in the Senate House, according to custom. On this remarkable period in his history, he observes:—

"As it is usual to read these essays publicly in the Senate House soon after the prize is adjudged, I was called to Cambridge for this purpose; I went and performed my office. On returning, however, to London, the subject of it almost wholly engrossed my thoughts. I became at times very seriously affected while upon the road. I stopped my horse occasionally, and dismounted and walked; I frequently tried to persuade myself in these intervals, that the contents of my essay could not be true. The more, however, I reflected upon them, or rather upon the authorities on which they were founded, the more I gave them credit. Coming in sight of Wades Mill, in Hertfordshire, I sat down disconsolate on the turf by the roadside, and held my horse. Here a thought came into my mind, that if the contents of the essay were true, it was time some person should see these calamities to their end. Agitated in this manner, I reached home. This was in the summer of 1785."

From this time Mr. Clarkson's attention was absorbed by the question of duty. He feared that he was disqualified by his youth and inexperience for the great work to which his mind and heart were evidently directed. One thing, however, he felt was within his power. He could translate his Latin Dissertation; and that might have a tendency to abolish the slave-trade. Upon this he resolved, and commenced the work in November, 1785. By the middle of January, 1786, he had finished half of it, and enriched it with considerable additions. Having advanced to this point in his labours, he sought out a publisher. For this purpose he applied to Mr. Cadell, in the Strand, but the way in which he met the proposition did not harmonize with Mr. Clarkson's intentions, and he left him to attend an engagement in the city. What subsequently transpired, he refers to in the following terms:—

"In going past the Royal Exchange, Mr. Joseph Hancock, one of the religious Society of Quakers, and with whose family my own had been long united in friendship, suddenly met me. He first greeted me by saying that I was the person whom he was wishing to see. He then asked me why I had not published my prize essay. I asked him in return what had made him think of that subject in particular? He replied, that his own Society had long taken it up as a religious body, and individuals among them were wishing to find me out. I asked him who. He answered, James Phillips, a book-seller, in George-yard, Lombard-street; and William Dillwyn, Walthamstow, and others. Having but little time to spare, I asked him to introduce me to one of them. In a few minutes he took me to James Phillips, (who was then the only one of them in town,) by whose conversation I was so much interested and encouraged, that without any further hesitation I offered him the publication of my work."

Shortly after this he saw William Dillwyn at Walthamstow, and from him learned many important facts relating to the slave-trade and slavery as they existed in the United States, and of the measures which had been taken for their abolition. "How surprised was I," says Mr. Clarkson, "to hear in the course of his conversation, of the labours of Granville Sharpe, of the writings of Ramsay, and of the controversy in which the latter was engaged, of all of which I had hitherto known nothing! How surprised was I to learn that William Dillwyn himself had, two years before, associated himself with five others for the purpose of enlightening the public mind upon this great subject! How astonished was I to find that a society had been formed in America for the same object; with some of the principal members of which he was intimately acquainted! And how still more astonished at the inference which instantly rushed upon my mind, that he was capable of being made the great medium of connection between them all. These thoughts overpowered me. My mind was overwhelmed with the thoughts, that I had been providentially directed to this house; that the finger of Providence was beginning to be discernible; that the day-star of African liberty was rising, and that probably I might be permitted to become an humble instrument in promoting it." The parties connected with William Dillwyn, in the object referred to, were George Harrison, Samuel Hoare, Thomas Knowles, M. D., John Lloyd, and Joseph Woods. The first meeting they held was on the 7th of July, 1785. At this "they assembled to consider what steps they should take for the relief and liberation of the negro slaves in the West Indies, and for the discouragement of the slave-trade on the coast of Africa." They laboured privately, through the medium of the London and provincial press, and by the publication of books, the first of which, Thoughts on the Slavery of the Negroes, was written by Joseph Woods, a member of the committee. Mr. Clarkson was afterwards introduced to that eminent philanthropist, Granville Sharpe, the father of British Abolitionists, with whom he had many interesting interviews, and whom he discovered to be a distant relation by his mother's side.

In the month of June, 1786, his Dissertation, in its English form, was ushered into the world under the title of An Essay on the Slavery and Commerce of the Human Species, particularly the African. He then commenced its circulation, and sought and found friends, in many directions, who greatly aided him in giving it a wide diffusion. Among those to whom he was introduced was Sir Charles and Lady Middleton, at Teston Park. Lady Middleton was deeply interested in the question, and urged on her husband the duty of publicly advocating the African cause. It was on one of his visits to Sir C. Middleton, that Mr. Clarkson made the declaration—"I am ready to devote myself to the cause." On reflecting, however, on the declaration that he had made, and the various difficulties he would have to encounter, he became uneasy. He thought of the magnitude of the work—of the funds that would be required to prosecute it successfully—that whoever undertook it must make it the business of his life; but after a calm review of all the circumstances of the case, he felt "that if a man thought properly, he ought to rejoice that he was called into existence, if he were permitted only to become an instrument in forwarding it in any part of its progress." Yet when he thought of his profession and his prospects, he was staggered at the sacrifice he must make. Describing the conflict in his mind Mr. Clarkson says:—

"I had been designed for the church; I had already advanced as far as deacon's orders in it; my prospects there, on account of my connections, were brilliant—and that appearing to desert my profession, my family would be dissatisfied, if not unhappy. These thoughts pressed upon me, and rendered the conflict difficult. But the sacrifice of my prospects staggered me, I own, the most. I had ambition—I had a thirst after worldly interests and honours, and I could not extinguish it at once. At length I yielded—not because I saw any reasonable prospect of success in my new undertaking, but in obedience, I believe, to a higher power." And, he adds, "I can say, that both at the moment of this resolution, and for some time afterwards, I had more sublime and happy feelings than at any former period of my life."

This was the mental and moral discipline Mr. Clarkson passed through to fit him for his part in the great work of slave-trade abolition. He communicated, personally, the resolution he had taken to the friends in London, and with them concerted the means for giving it effect. He was determined to proceed at once to the circulation of his Essay among the members of the legislature, to wait personally upon several of them,—and to proceed, as opportunity afforded, in enlarging his knowledge of the subject. Among those whom he visited was Mr. Wilberforce, who stated at his first interview, "that the subject had often employed his thoughts, and that it was near his heart."

This memorable interview with Mr. Wilberforce led to others, and finally to that illustrious man engaging to bring forward the measure in Parliament when better prepared for it, and provided no more proper person could be found. This resolution Mr. Clarkson was permitted to announce to his friends in London, who forthwith resolved to form a committee for the purpose of effecting the abolition of the slave-trade. On the 22nd of May, 1787, the following persons met for that purpose—viz., Granville Sharpe, Joseph Woods, Samuel Hoare, Jun., William Dillwyn, George Harrison, James Phillips, Richard Phillips, Thomas Clarkson, Philip Sanson, John Lloyd, Joseph Hooper, and John Barton, all of whom were members of the Society of Friends with the exception of Granville Sharpe, Thomas Clarkson, and Philip Sanson. At their first meeting, after taking the slave-trade into consideration, they resolved "that the slave-trade was both impolitic and unjust." Thus was laid the foundation of that mighty struggle for human rights which has, under the divine blessing, led to such glorious results. From this time the labours of these worthy men were unwearying, both in obtaining and diffusing correct information relative to the hateful traffic in human beings, and their treatment on the plantations in America and the West Indies. All the youthful ardour, the active industry, the persevering effort, and the indomitable courage of Thomas Clarkson, were called into requisition, and nobly did he fulfil the mission confided to his care. "For seven years," he says, "I had a correspondence to maintain with four hundred persons. I had some work or other annually to write for the cause. During this time I had travelled more than 35,000 miles in search of evidence, performing a great part of these journeys in the night. All this time my mind had been incessantly on the stretch upon one subject only, for I had no leisure to attend to my own concerns. The various instances of barbarity that had frequently come under my notice had vexed, harassed, and afflicted me. The wounds thus inflicted had been deepened by the cruel disappointment I had so often experienced by the reiterated refusal of persons to give their testimony after I had travelled hundreds of miles in quest of them." It was no wonder that with this pressure his health gave way, and that for eight or nine years he was compelled to seclude himself from active employment.

When in London, he was a diligent attendant on the committee, and was constantly occupied in forwarding, both in public and in private, the great cause he had so much at heart. It appears, however, that generally he was absent three months in every year, travelling throughout the kingdom, searching for and forming that great body of evidence which proved of such signal service, in exposing the extent and the atrocities of the slave-trade, and in promoting petitions to Parliament.

Among the first religious bodies to notice the existence of the committee, was the Society of Friends. Faithful to their convictions of duty, they were led to express, in their yearly epistle, their thankfulness that among many, not of their body, there was a growing attention to the subject of negro slavery and the slave-trade. They were followed by the General Baptists, who stated that they approved their proceedings, and would countenance the object of their institution. The Baptists were followed by the Dissenting ministers of Devon and Cornwall, who expressed their high approbation of the conduct of the committee, and offered their services in the promotion of this great work of humanity and religion.

The first individual of importance that addressed the committee was Mr. William Smith, then a member for Norwich, who encouraged them in their work, and promised his co-operation. This excellent man, throughout the whole course of his parliamentary career, rendered the African cause the most essential service. He was the intimate friend of Mr. Wilberforce, and sustained him in his splendid parliamentary efforts for the abolition of the slave-trade. In the year 1791, Mr. Smith, Mr. Wilberforce, Lord Muncaster, and Mr. Burgh, were elected members of the committee. Among the distinguished men who were added to the honorary corresponding members of the Society were General Lafayette, M. Brissot, Benjamin Franklin, and John Jay.

The first report of the committee was published on the 15th of January, 1788. Adverting to the labours of Mr. Clarkson, they say, "To the abilities and unremitting assiduity of the Rev. Thomas Clarkson in these researches, the Society are much indebted." And to him they were eminently due.

It would be impossible to compress within the space allowed us the various incidents which stimulated the exercises of the committee from this period until the accomplishment of this work. It may be sufficient to say that, until providentially laid aside by ill-health, Mr. Clarkson was its grand moving spirit, and that on his recovery, he resumed, with his characteristic ardour, the great object of his life, until it was finished.

[A history of the efforts to abolish the slave trade, during a period of twenty years, we here omit.]

The eventful session of 1807 at length commenced. Contrary to the practice hitherto adopted,

Lord Grenville thought it advisable, that the question should be first agitated in the Lords. Accordingly, on the 2d of January, he presented a bill called, an Act for the Abolition of the Slave-trade; but he then only proposed that it should be printed, and lie on the table, that it might be duly considered. On the 4th, no less than four counsel were heard against it. On the 5th, the debate commenced. Lord Grenville opened the discussion by a very luminous speech. He was supported by the Duke of Gloucester, the Bishop of Durham, (Dr. Barrington,) the Earls of Moira, Selkirk, and Roslyn, and Lords Holland, King, and Hood. The opponents of the measure were the Duke of Clarence, the Earls of Westmoreland and St. Vincent, and the Lords Sidmouth, Eldon, and Hawkesbury. The bill was finally carried by 100 votes and proxies against 36. On the 10th of February, it was brought down to the House of Commons. On the 20th, counsel were heard against it, after which, by agreement, the second reading took place. On the 23d, on the question of commitment, Viscount Howick (afterwards Earl Grey) delivered an eloquent speech in its favour, and was ably supported, among others, by Mr. Wilberforce, Mr. Stephen Lushington (now Judge of the Admiralty,) Lord Milton (now Earl Fitzwilliam,) and Sir S. Romilly. On the division, there appeared, for the motion 283, against it, only 16. Many of the old opponents, unable to resist the moral power of the question, either voted for it, or remained away. Such was the ultimate triumph of humanity and truth over self-interest and tyranny. On the 27th the bill went through Committee, and to the disgrace of Mr. Windham, he was found among its opponents. On the 6th of March, the Committee of the House met again, when Sir C. Pole moved that the year 1812 be substituted for the year 1807. This amendment produced a long debate; in which Sir Philip Francis, Mr. Whitbread, Mr. Canning, and others took a leading part. The amendment was negatived by a majority of 125 against 17. The bill enacted, that no vessel should clear out for slaves from any port within the British dominions after the 1st of May, 1807, and that no slave should be landed in the colonies after the 1st of March, 1808. The bill was read a third time and passed without a division, on the 16th day of March. On Wednesday the 18th, Lord Howick, accompanied by Mr. Wilberforce and others, carried the bill to the Lords. On receiving it Lord Grenville moved that it should be printed and taken into consideration on the following Monday. In the meantime, the greatest anxiety was felt throughout the country for the fate of the measure; the king (George the Third) having signified his intention of displacing the ministry on account of the introduction into the Commons of the Roman Catholic Officer's Bill. The bill for the Abolition of the Slave-trade, being an amended one, was to be again argued in the Lords, and to receive the royal assent. All these operations required time. On the 23d the Lords met. The bill was immediately brought forward. It was opposed by the Earl of Westmoreland and the Marquis of Sligo, and supported by the Duke of Norfolk and the Bishop of Llandaff (Dr. Watson;) but here an omission of four words was discovered, namely, "country, territory, or place," which if not rectified might defeat the purposes of the measure. An amendment was immediately proposed and carried. Thus the bill received the last sanction of the Peers; Lord Grenville designating it as "the most glorious measure that had ever been adopted by any legislative body in the world." The amendment just mentioned caused the bill to be sent back to the Commons. On the 24th, Lord Howick moved its adoption, which was agreed to. The bill was carried back to the Lords, as approved of, the same day.

"But," to use Mr. Clarkson's language, "though the bill had now passed both Houses, there was an awful fear throughout the kingdom lest it should not receive the royal assent before the ministry was dissolved. This event took place the next day: for on Wednesday, the 25th, at half past eleven in the morning, His Majesty's message was delivered to the different members of it, that they were then to wait upon him to deliver up the seals of their office. It then appeared that a commission for the royal assent to this Bill, among others, had been obtained. The commission was immediately opened by the Lord Chancellor (Erskine,) who was accompanied by Lords Holland and Ancland; and as the clock struck twelve, just when the sun was in its meridian splendour to witness this august act, it was completed. The ceremony being over, the seals of the respective offices were delivered up; so that the execution of this commission was the last act of the administration of Lord Grenville; an administration which, on account of its virtuous exertions in behalf of the oppressed African race, will pass to posterity, living through successive generations, in the love and gratitude of the most virtuous of mankind."

We have glanced at these particulars for the purpose of recalling attention to the extraordinary labours of our venerable friend in the memorable struggle for African freedom. That he preceded Mr. Wilberforce in active exertion there can be no doubt. Though less public and brilliant than the exertions of that truly great man, those of Mr. Clarkson were not less efficient. The fact is, that neither could do without the other. In their separate departments of labour, they were unrivalled; nor could either have done without the committee; this all felt. To attempt, therefore, to exalt any one party at the expense of another, would be equally unjust and absurd. To bestow praise on all, is due to the memory of all engaged in that glorious service.

In May, 1807, the African Institution was formed. Its objects may be briefly stated to have been to watch over the operation of the new law, to promote the abolition of the foreign African slave-trade, and to promote the civilization of Africa. As might be expected, Mr. Wilberforce, Thomas Clarkson, and the other active and zealous friends of the African cause, were numbered among its office-bearers. In 1818, Mr. Clarkson visited Aix-la-Chapelle, where the great European powers were then holding a congress. On that occasion he had an interview with the Russian Emperor Alexander, who not only engaged to abolish the slave-trade so far as his own dominions were concerned, but to use his influence with other potentates for the same purpose. The African Institution terminated its labours in 1839, without having fully accomplished either of its objects.

The act for the abolition of the slave-trade was found defective in its penalties. Mr. (now Lord) Brougham moved an address to the crown for more vigorous measures against the traffic, both British and Foreign, which he carried through Parliament in 1811, by which slave-trading was declared to be a felony punishable with transportation. A subsequent act declared it to be both felony and piracy, and punishable with death. The latter penalty, however, has been repealed, and transportation now remains as the punishment in force against the slave-trade. In 1824, the acts for the suppression of the slave-trade were consolidated, and carried through the legislature by Dr. Lushington, whose labours in the cause deservedly place him in the first rank of its advocates. A subsequent act extends the provisions of the act of 1824 to British subjects residing in foreign countries as well as in any part of the British dominions. It may therefore be said, that the law against the slave-trade is now as perfect as it can be made.

The foreign African slave-trade, notwithstanding all the efforts to suppress it, still continues to desolate Africa, and to feed the Spanish colonies and the empire of Brazil with innumerable victims. The fact is, the slave trade has its root in the system of slavery, and until that be abolished, it is in vain to expect the cessation of the traffic. The members of the African Institution became convinced of this long before it terminated its labours; and some of them, it may be said its most active men, formed the London Society for the gradual abolition of slavery in the British colonies. To this society Mr. Wilberforce, Mr. Clarkson, Mr. Buxton, Dr. Lushington, Mr. James Stephen, Mr. Zachary Macaulay, Mr. William Allen, and others gave their most zealous support. In 1831, the society was aided in its object by the Agency Anti-Slavery Society, instituted for the immediate and entire abolition of slavery in the British colonies. The active labours of the two societies, and their auxiliaries throughout Great Britain and Ireland, accelerated by the dogged opposition of the West India party to all measures of reform, and the events which took place in several colonies, brought the nation to the decision that slavery must cease. An Act was therefore passed by the Imperial Legislature in 1833, which decreed the abolition of slavery in the colonies on the 1st August, 1834. It was, however, but a partial measure: it left the great bulk of the slaves in the power of their masters, as apprentices, until the 1st of August, 1840. The sufferings they endured in this condition, coupled with its manifest injustice and impolicy, again called the Anti-Slavery Associations into operation, and the zeal with which they prosecuted their labours led to the termination of the apprenticeship, amidst the unfeigned rejoicing of the friends of human freedom. Subsequently to this triumph, the Abolitionists of this country gave a wider range to their sympathies and efforts. They formed the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, for the universal extinction of slavery and the slave-trade. Of this society, Thomas Clarkson was the honoured president; and since its formation he was permitted to see the abolition of slavery in British India, in the British settlements in the East, and in Africa; so that, at the time of his decease, he could exultingly say there was no part of the earth's surface in which it was lawful for a British subject to buy or sell a slave, and no part of the British dominions in which it was lawful to hold or use a man as a slave.

Thomas Clarkson did not live in vain. He has left his impress on multitudes of living men, who sympathize with his principles, and are engaged in following up his efforts to free the whole human race from the scourge of slavery, and Africa from the curse of the slave-trade. Up to nearly the last moments of consciousness, when feeble both in mind and body, he did not cease to occupy himself with the abolition cause. His last public appearances were at the opening of the great Anti-Slavery Convention in June, 1840, at which he was welcomed with the respect due to his years and to his labours, by the representatives of the friends of African freedom, from all parts of Great Britain, the United States, France, Holland, the West Indies, and Haiti. His address on the occasion was both dignified and encouraging. It gave an admirable tone to all its after-sittings. At the close of its proceedings, a great public meeting was held at Exeter Hall, the Duke of Sussex in the chair, supported by M. Guizot, the French ambassador, and other distinguished personages. There he again presented himself for the last time, publicly. The whole assembly was hushed into silence during his stay, in consequence of his infirm state of health. The scene was grand, impressive, and affecting; such only as could be produced by the presence of such a man. On that occasion he wrote to an old coadjutor:—

"Much remains to be done;—but take courage—be not dismayed—go on: my heart beats as warmly in this sacred cause now, in the eighty-first year of my age, as it did at the age of twenty-four, and I can say, farther, with truth, that if I had another life given me to live, I would devote it to the same object."

Thomas Clarkson was the last link which united the Abolitionists of the present times with those of the past. May his spirit, and courage, and perseverance characterize those who have entered into his labours, until the great work of human freedom shall be successfully and forever consummated.

THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

The proceedings of the Evangelical Alliance, and the discussions to which it has given rise, have developed the existence among us of not a few men, occupying important stations in the Christian ministry and in society, who not only hold that it may be lawful and even righteous, under given circumstances, to hold their fellow-creatures in slavery; but who justify the institution itself on the ground that it existed among the patriarchs, that it was allowed under the Mosaic dispensation, and that it is not forbidden by Christ and his apostles. These developments are truly alarming; and they become the more so when it is considered that these men possess great influence in the church and in the world; that many of them are learned theologians, and that all of them are supposed to be pious, and some eminently so. Of course, if these men lived in a country where slavery was sanctioned by law, they would have no objection to sustain the relation of slave-holders. In their estimation it would be perfectly innocent to do so, and might even be virtuous. But these developments are not only alarming, they are manifestly dangerous. They who maintain the views referred to, are not infidels nor heresiarchs. According to their own protestations, they are orthodox and evangelical; and in the estimation of others, godly and conscientious men. Among them will be found ministers and members of the Established Church; ministers and members of the Free Church of Scotland; ministers and members of the Wesleyan Society; and, in fact, of the several leading denominations represented during the sittings of the Alliance. We deeply grieve to say this. We are pained to the heart that British Christianity should still be tainted by this corrupt and corrupting leaven. It weakens every effort to rescue the enslaved from his deep degradation and unparalleled sufferings. It closes up the sympathies of multitudes against the wrongs done to the slave; the wrongs done to his nature, to his rights, to his relations, to his prospects on earth, and to his destiny in the eternal world. When the Abolitionist thunders in the ears of the slave-holder, "It is not lawful for thee to hold this man, this woman, this child as thy slave," the cry is immediately heard, "God permitted it; the Bible sanctions it; the Saviour did not condemn it; the apostles recognised it;" and thus the conscience of the wrong-doer is soothed, and the monstrous evil perpetuated.

We are aware that the parties referred to qualify their defence of slavery by condemning what they term its abuses. They would not, for a moment, be supposed to sanction the application of the cart-whip or the cow-skin to the naked and shrinking flesh of the poor slave; they would not separate the slave-husband from his wife, nor the slave-mother from her child; they would not hunt the fugitive slave with blood-hounds, nor shoot him to death with fire-arms, if he persisted in his flight; they would not brand their slaves with hot irons, nor fetter them with heavy chains and iron collars, nor cast them into loathsome dungeons to pine away and die; they would not put out the eyes of their souls by keeping them in utter ignorance of the great verities of the gospel. No! They shrink with horror from all this. They would be the gentlest, kindest, most humane, and patient of masters, and their slaves should be the happiest and best instructed of mortals.

Such are the visions in which these good men indulge. Their benevolent feelings, their sense of justice, their piety, would not allow them to go further than to claim the persons of their slaves as property. They would retain the thing without its incidents; and, of course, admitting the principle, they could have no objection that they themselves, their wives, and their children should be slaves, if the laws of the country in which they were found so ordained it, or the presumption, on the ground of colour, were against them. They who maintain that slavery is justified by Scripture, must admit that slavery is not restricted to any one portion of the human race, and that they themselves might as justly be held as slaves as the most swarthy negro from the wilds of Africa. The position they take is a two-edged weapon, it cuts both ways, unless they mean to affirm that God has authorized the whites to enslave the blacks, or Christians to take the heathen for their inheritance.

Or, to look at the subject in another aspect, supposing they so far modified their views as to consider slavery unlawful when used for purposes of gain, and not for the exclusive benefit of the slave himself, does it not follow that all the poor, the illiterate, and the vicious, the minor, and the orphan, should be enslaved? Certainly, if it be right to hold any one human being as a slave for his good, it must be right to do so in all cases where that reason could apply. To enslave the Africans for their good was originally the plea set up to justify the slave trade; and is still used by the traffickers in human flesh to sanction their inhuman and revolting trade. It is this plea which has for nearly four centuries desolated Africa, and peopled the United States, South America, and the West Indies, with millions of victims who are doomed to perpetual slavery, and whose children, after them, through successive generations, are devoted to the same sad inheritance. In the mouths of those who use it, the plea proves too much, and is, therefore, worthless as a defence of slavery.

But has the Divine Being given his sanction to the principle of slavery? Has he authorized one portion of the human family to hold another portion of that family as slaves, and, if so, which? Certainly, if the Almighty allows one class of men to hold another as property, he allows them all the rights which inhere in property. They may therefore be lawfully used for purposes of gain; they may be bought and sold and given away, as well as bequeathed. They may, when reluctant, be coerced to labour, as the ox is goaded to the furrow; when disobedient and unruly, be punished. If God has constituted men property, then they may be dealt with as property. It is absurd to reason otherwise. But to assert that God has done this is to place Him in hostility with himself, and in conflict with his royal law of love:—"Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and soul, and mind, and strength; AND THY NEIGHBOUR AS THYSELF." Now we know "that love worketh no ill to its neighbour,"—neither to his nature—his rights—his relations—nor to his prospects for time or eternity. It is as full of justice as it is of benevolence: it respects both the person and the property of all men alike. It is without partiality. It covets nothing. It was embodied in the life of our Divine Master and Lord, "who went about doing good;" who taught his disciples that "it is more blessed to give than to receive;" and left it as an authoritative rule of conduct to all: "As ye would that men should do unto you, do ye also unto them, for this is the law and the prophets." Now this law is of universal obligation, and is binding upon all men. Will, then, those who defend slavery, undertake to prove that, in any form in which they can present it, it is compatible with the law of equity and love? They cannot. Take the case of the man who holds the slave, not for gain, but for his own good. Has God given to him the assurance of worldly prosperity, so as to render a change of circumstances impossible? If not—then this very slave may be seized and sold, in the public market-place, to pay his master's debts, and his misery become the more intense from the recollection that his old master, so far from exercising his legal rights over him, kept him in slavery solely for his own good. But supposing that the prosperity of his master continued uninterrupted, would that guarantee his life? At any moment he may be cut off, and, in that case, the poor slave becomes the property of his heir, whose opinions and character may be entirely at variance with those of his predecessor; or, what is more likely to be the case, the property left has to be divided. In that case a sale takes place, and this highly-favoured slave is put in the inventory with live stock, implements of husbandry, household utensils, and it may be a library of standard divinity; nor should we be surprised to learn that, in token of the piety of the defunct, part of the proceeds of the sale were directed to be given to the Bible, Missionary, and Tract Societies, or to some theological seminary for the education of pious youths for the ministry. In the meantime the slave is transported to Louisiana—the rest may be imagined. As an additional ingredient to the bitterness of his cup, he may have married, that is to say, he may have formed a union with another slave; for marriage is not recognized by the law of slave-states, and he may have become a parent. In that case, how will his heart be wrung by the separation—the eternal separation—from the objects of his affections. Nor is this all: This slave may have become a Christian; and that fact, so far from loosening his bonds, only enhances his price in the slave-market. So much for his thews and sinews—so much for his skill as a servant, or artizan—and so much for the grace of the Holy Spirit and the image of the Redeemer! We pause while we write this, involving, as it does, so great an outrage on our common humanity, and our holy religion.

We shall not deal in fiery denunciation of the men, who, unhappily, attempt to defend the system of slavery from the Bible, but feel bound to say that we abhor their principles, so far as they relate to this subject; and shall feel it to be a sacred duty to unmask them, inasmuch as we believe them to be practically infidel, anti-social, and anti-Christian; and, if our voice could be heard, we would entreat these men, as for our own liberty, to review the ground on which they stand, to peruse the unanswered and unanswerable Bible argument against slavery, which has, during the last few months, appeared in the columns of the Reporter, and which is yet to be continued. They are bound to refute that argument, drawn exclusively from the Scriptures, before they venture again to affirm that either the law or the gospel consecrates the system of slavery, or that it can be reconciled with the doctrines, the precepts, and the spirit of Christianity.—Anti-Slavery Reporter.

POETRY.

THE REFORMER.

BY JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER.

All grim and solid and brown with tan,
I saw a Strong One, in his wrath,
Smiting the godless shrines of man
Along his path.

The Church beneath her trembling dome
Essay'd in vain her ghostly charm;
Wealth shook within his gilded home
With pale alarm.

Fraud from his secret chambers fled
Before the sunlight bursting in;
Sloth drew her pillow o'er her head
To drown the din.

"Spare," Art implored, "yon holy pile;
That grand, old, time-worn turret spare;"
Meek Reverence kneeling in the aisle,
Cried out "Forbear!"

Gray-bearded Use, who, deaf and blind,
Groped for his old accustomed stone,
Leaned on his staff, and wept, to find
His seat o'erthrown.

Young Romance raised his dreamy eyes,
O'erhung with paly locks of gold,
"Why smite," he asked in sad surprise,
"The fair, the old?"

Yet louder rang the Strong One's stroke,
Yet nearer flash'd his axe's gleam;
Shuddering and sick of heart I woke,
As from a dream.

I looked: aside the dust-cloud rolled—
The Waster seemed the Builder too;
Upspringing from the ruined Old
I saw the New.

'Twas but the ruin of the bad—
The wasting of the wrong and ill;
Whate'er of good the old time had
Was living still.

Calm grew the brow of him I feared;
The frown which awed me passed away,
And left behind a smile which cheered
Like breaking Day.

Green grew the grain on battle-plain,
O'er swarded war-mounds grazed the cow;
The slave stood forging from his chains
The spade and plow.

Where frowned the fort, pavilions gay
And cottage windows, flower entwined,
Looked out upon the peaceful bay
And hills behind.

Through vine-wreathed cups with wine once red,
The lights on brimming crystal fell,
Drawn, sparkling, from the rivulet head
And mossy well.

Through prison walls, like heaven-sent hope,
Fresh breezes blew, and sunbeams strayed;
And with the idle gallows-rope
The young child played.

Where the doomed victim in his cell
Had counted o'er the weary hours,
Glad school-girls, answering to the bell,
Came crowned with flowers.

Grown wiser from the lesson given,
I fear no longer, for I know
That where the share is deepest driven,
The best fruits grow.

The outworn right, the old abuse,
The pious fraud transparent grown,
The good held captive in the use
Of Wrong alone—

These wait their doom, from that great law
Which makes the past time serve to-day;
And fresher life the World shall draw
From their decay.

Oh! backward-looking son of time!—
The new is old, the old is new,
The cycle of a change sublime
Still sweeping through.

So wisely taught the Indian seer:
Destroying Seva, forming Brahm,
Who wake by turns Earth's love and fear,
Are one, the same.

As idly as in that old day
Thou mournest, did thy sires repine,
So, in his time, thy child grown gray,
Shall sigh for thine.

Yet, not the less for them or thou
The eternal step of Progress beats
To that great anthem, calm and slow,
Which God repeats!

Take heart!—the Waster builds again—
A charmed life old goodness hath,
The tares may perish—but the grain
I sowed for death.

God works in all things; all obey
His first propulsion from the night;
Ho! wake and watch!—the world is gray
With morning light!

GENTLE WORDS.

We like the spirit of the following, by C. D. STUART. Such poems, we believe, exert a beneficial influence. "A word fitly spoken is like apples of gold on beds of silver."

A young rose in the summer time
Is beautiful to me,
And glorious the many stars
That glimmer on the sea;
But gentle words, and loving hearts,
And hands to clasp my own,
Are better than the brightest flowers,
Or stars that ever shone!

The sun may warm the grass to life,
The dew the drooping flower,
And eyes grow bright and watch the light
Of autumn's opening hour—
But words that breathe of tenderness,
And smiles we know are true,
Are warmer than the summer throng,
And brighter than the dew.

It is not much the world can give,
With all its subtle art,
And gold or gems are not the things
To satisfy the heart.
But O, if those who cluster round
The altar and the hearth,
Have gentle words and loving smiles,
How beautiful is earth!

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER

Is published on the first of each month, at one dollar per annum for one copy, or five dollars per annum for six copies, and at the same rate for a greater number, payable in advance. Abraham L. Pennock, Samuel Rhoads, and George W. Taylor, are the Editors and Publishers; either of whom will receive subscriptions, payments, and communications. Letters and papers addressed to them, or endorsed Non-Slaveholder, directed to box 777, Philadelphia Post Office, will duly reach them.

LIST OF AGENTS.

Maine.
John D. Lang, North Berwick.
Stephen Jones, Brunswick.
Daniel Taber, Vassalborough.

New Hampshire.
Asa C. Tuttle, Dover.
Moses Sawyer, Weare.
Thomas Roberts, Farmington.

Vermont.
Henry Miles, Monkton.
Amos Battey, Starksboro.

Massachusetts.
Wm. C. Taber, New Bedford.
Lydia Pope, Salem.
Wm. Hawkes, Lynn.
Wm. Henry Hobby, South Dartmouth.
Richard Battey, Uxbridge.

Rhode Island.
Samuel Austin, Providence.
Thos. R. Hazard, Newport.

Connecticut.
Abraham Wanser, Sherman, P. O.
Howell Wetherill, North Canaan.

New York.
Daniel Breed, 37 Market street, New York.
Edward Marshall, Jr., 99 John st., N. Y.
Thomas Willis, Jericho, L. I.
Robert B. Parsons, Flushing, L. I.
Henry Titus, Jerusalem, South L. I.
Richard Carpenter, Mamaroneck, West Chester co.
Wm. Shotwell, West Farms, West Chester co.
Richard T. Osborn, Quaker Hill, Dutchess co.
David Irish, Quaker Hill, Dutchess co.
Silas Cornell, Rochester, Monroe co.
Joseph Bowne, Butternuts, Otsego co.
Benj. Boss, Smyrna, Chenango co.
Wm. Keese, Keeseville, Essex co.
Benj. Bowerman, Scottsville, Monroe co.
Merritt Force, Lowville, Lewis co.
Hartas Hedley, Milville, Orleans co.
Isaac G. Thorn, Washington, Dutchess co.

New Jersey.
Wm. J. Allinson, Burlington.
Samuel Allinson, Jr., Yardville, Mercer co.
Jonathan Freedland, Salem.
Benj. Parlier, Shrewsbury.
Joel Wilson, Rahway.
Joseph Tatum, Woodbury.
Nathan B. Willis, Haddonfield.

Pennsylvania.
Enoch Lewis, New Garden, Chester co.
Wm. Kirkwood, Coopersville, Lancaster co.
S. C. Passmore, Jennerville, Chester co.
Moses Whitson, Penningtonville, Chester co.
George Spencer, Hotham, Montgomery co.

Wm. A. Thomas, Bellefonte.
Thomas Mendenhall, Benton, P. O., Columbia co.
Joshua B. Sharpless, Downingtown.
S. Hambleton, Russellville, Chester co.

Delaware.
Samuel Hiles, Wilmington.

Maryland.
Thomas Levering, Rising Sun, Cecil co.

Ohio.
Lemuel Jones, Mount Pleasant.
Peter Hathaway, Milan, Erie co.
James D. Ladd, Richmond, Jefferson co.
Penrose Hussey, Smithfield, Jefferson co.
Aaron L. Benedict, Bennington, Delaware co.
John Hunt, P. M., Martinsville, Clinton co.
Joseph Maddock, Sen., West Elkton, Preble co.
Benj. Mainsberry, Damascus, Columbiana co.
Asa Williams, West Liberty, Logan co.
Jonathan Cowgill, St. Clairsville.

Indiana.
Jeremiah Hadley, Jr., Mooresville, Morgan co.
James Haworth, Mooresville, Morgan co.
John Cox, Darlington, Montgomery co.
Joel Parker, P. M., New Garden, Wayne co.
Henry Henley, Carthage, Rush co.
Richard Gordon, Spiceland, Henry co.
James Siler, Annapolis, Parke co.
Seth Hinshaw, Greensboro, Henry co.
Job Hadley, Springtown, Hendricks co.
Rowland T. Reed, Richmond, Wayne co.
Harvey Thomas, Thorntown, Boone co.
Levi T. Pennington, Westfield, Hamilton co.
Hudson Middleton, Crawfordsville.
Marshall Diggs, Winchester, Randolph co.
George Valentine, Blooming Grove, Franklin co.
Henry Hunt, Annapolis.

Illinois.
Henry Harrison, York, Clark co.

Michigan.
Wm. Beal, Rollin, Lenawee co.
Stephen Bogue, Cassapolis, Cass co.
Edward Gorton, Ypsilanti.

Iowa.
Joseph D. Hoag, Mount Pleasant, Henry co.

Great Britain.
Charles Tylor, Stamford Hill, near London.

New subscribers will please state what numbers they have received.

By decision of the Post Master General, the Non-Slaveholder is subject to newspaper postage only.

FREE PRODUCE STORE.—The Subscriber has made an arrangement with Joel Fisher for the purchase of his stock of Free Goods, and the occupation of the store now in his tenancy at the north west corner of Fifth and Cherry streets, to go into operation on the first of next month. He proposes to conduct the business through an agent, and expects to keep constantly for sale, WHOLESALE AND RETAIL, an full assortment of Free dry goods and groceries as practicable, increasing the present variety as new facilities are afforded. To enable him to place the goods at the lowest rates, it will be necessary for him to make his sales for cash,—persons giving him their orders are requested to bear this in view. To those who have heretofore patronized this establishment, to his friends, and to the friends generally of the Free Produce cause, he looks with great confidence for support in the responsible undertaking he is about to assume. Orders addressed to him at the above place, or at Box 777, Philadelphia Post Office, will have immediate attention, and goods will be delivered in any part of the city, or forwarded to the country, according to direction.

GEORGE W. TAYLOR.

Philadelphia, 1st mo. 1st, 1847.

PRINTED AT

Merrihow & Thompson's Book & Job Office,
No. 7 Carter's Alley.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

"Whoso gives the motive, makes his brother's sin his own."

VOL. II.]

PHILADELPHIA, SECOND MONTH, 1847.

[NO. 2.]

COMMUNICATIONS.

To the Editors of the Non-Slaveholder.

If I have rightly understood the plan of your periodical, you are willing to diversify its pages by occasionally admitting disquisitions on other subjects than those which immediately relate to the slave. I send you, in this view, the first of a series of papers, intended to consist of but a few numbers, and which, if acceptable to you, will be furnished for insertion in your Journal, as my other engagements, and your convenience, will allow.

BIBLICAL INVESTIGATIONS—NO. I.

Preliminary Remarks.

Few persons, if any, have gone into a profound examination of the Holy Scriptures without arriving at the conclusion, that the English translation of them, usually known as King James' Bible, is entitled to our high approval of its general accuracy, and its translators to our highest admiration of their intelligence and fidelity. This is not said in derogation of other versions in the English or foreign languages, whether protestant or catholic; for unimpeached intention and great research must be attributed to them also; and wherein they differ from the authorized version, first adverted to, the very difference is calculated to shed lustre upon the point which elicited the variance:—nor is it said to convey the idea, that even this version is beyond improvement. None of the translations of the Bible, up to the present time, have probably been conducted by persons, however pious and prayerful, who were thoroughly imbued with the sentiment that wars and fightings of all kinds, were altogether contrary to the nature of that peaceable government which Jesus Christ came to establish upon earth. Nor were they made in view of the fulness of that sentiment, which, touching a portion of the Jewish law, was uttered by the Saviour:—"Moses, because of the hardness of your hearts, suffered you to put away your wives, but from the beginning it was not so." These translations bear the unavoidable imprint of the translators' minds, and it is not improbable that, under higher convictions of the peacefulness and eternity of Christ's Kingdom, various existing forms of expression in the respective translations would have yielded to other terms more in accordance with the superior light.

Numerous and decisive as are the testimonies of learned men to the great excellence of our authorized version, the erudite and orthodox author of the "Introduction to the critical study and knowledge of the Holy Scriptures," Thomas Hartwell Home, does not hesitate "readily" to admit that the existing version "is not immaculate, and that a complete correction of it is an object of desire to the friends of Religion, were it only to silence the perpetually repeated cavils of the opposers of divine revelation, who, studiously disregarding the various satisfactory answers which have been given to their unfounded objections, persevere in repeating them, so long as they find a very few mistranslated passages in the authorized version."

With great deference, then, to a version which has had the assent of Protestant Christendom during a period of more than two hundred years, and with an earnest and prayerful desire to be preserved from the suggestion of any variation from the received text which has not its evident foundation in the Truth; with a desire, too, to silence the cavils of those who array themselves against the divine inspiration of the Bible, founded on mistakes in the translation, it is my purpose to submit to the reader some errors, in that portion of it called the old testament, which, in my view at least, are clearly establishable.

To carry his mind with me into this investigation, it may be necessary for me to give, now, a very brief synopsis of the Hebrew grammar, adding hereafter such further illustrations of it as the occasions may call for.

Hebrew words may be divided into three classes; nouns, verbs and particles. A noun denotes a substance or quality. A verb declares the action or state of a being or thing. A particle is used to connect words, and show the relation which exists between them, and also to give emphasis, and direct attention to them.

Nouns are substantive or adjective, as they respectively denote substance or quality. They have two genders, masculine and feminine, and two numbers, singular and plural, but are without inflections indicating case. When, however, two nouns stand together in such relation that the latter would occupy the position of the genitive case in other languages, the former is said to be in regimen, or in the construct state, and frequently undergoes a change of termination. Nouns are usually traced to a root found in the third person preterite in the conjugation KAL, in which root rests the primitive sense of most words. Within nouns are included pronouns.

Verbs have three active and two passive conjugations. The active are KAL, which signifies to do, HIPHIL, to cause to do or be done, HITHPAEL, to do oneself, or to make or feign oneself to be. NIPHAL is the passive of KAL, and signifies to be done, and HOPHAL is the passive of HIPHIL, and signifies to be caused to do or be done.

Verbs have also three moods, Indicative, Imperative, and Infinitive; and two participles, the active or present, called BENONI, and the passive, or past, called PAEL. The indicative mood has two tenses only, the past and future. The past tense, or participle active, is often used for the present time, whilst the future tense, supplying the place of the subjunctive or potential mood of other languages, is employed to indicate not only what shall or will be, but what may, can, might, would, should, or could be, and also what has already been, provided it was future or contingent to some other event before spoken of.

To make certain a coming event, it is usual to prefix to the verb its infinitive mood, or, as it is commonly termed, to double the verb. This doubling of the verb, also called its intense form, is represented in our English translation by the adverb surely, in connection with a single verb in the future tense. A negative prefixed to a verb gives certainty to a prohibition.

Particles hold a highly controlling influence over the signification of phrases. In return, the connexion often imparts to the particles a sense different from that in which they are ordinarily used. The rule of translation in the latter case is, or ought to be, to render the particle by a word the most proximate to its ordinary sense which the phrase will allow of, and never certainly by one which is at all questionable; it being preferable to retain a hebraism than to corrupt the text.

I have no doubt that errors, be they more or less important, have crept into our version from want of a rigid attention to this rule. I shall have occasion to refer at a future time to, at least, one important illustration of this remark in the rendering of the particle beth.

In view of the range of construction allowed to the Hebrew future, the reader of the bible, with no desire needlessly to vary the English text, yet seeking the truth, cannot fail to observe many cases in which the mandatory would have been better supplied by the predictive or permissive form of completing the verb.

Taking, as a lesser instance, the commandment to Adam respecting the trees of the garden, Genesis ii. 16-17, in which the verb to eat thrice occurs in the Hebrew future, and the verb to die once occurs, also in the same future, but in its doubled or intense form, he will probably prefer the following translation as conveying the idea that moral death was the necessary consequence of disobedience to God's law, rather than the arbitrary punishment of it.

And the Lord God commanded the man saying, of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat: but of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou mayest not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof, thou wilt surely die.

Taking, as a greater instance, the precept to Noah, Genesis ix. 6, and concerning, for the present, the accuracy of the version in other particulars, he will perceive the great temerity of the translators in placing the word shall, if they really attached to it an imperative sense, where may or will would have been the safer, and thus, to fallible man, the truer rendering. When, however, we perceive that the translators in many instances have used the word shall where the sense is obviously may, or will, we cannot but suppose they habitually attached to the word a less imperative sense than we now are accustomed to assign to it.

I conclude these preliminary views by the following rules, selected from Horne's Introduction, and which are valuable guides to a just translation of the scriptures.

1. "In interpreting words that have various meanings, some degree of uncertainty may exist as to which of their different senses is to be preferred; yet the ambiguity in such cases is not so great but that it may in general be removed, and the proper signification of the passage in question may be determined: for the subject-matter, that is, the topic on which the author is treating, plainly shows the sense that is to be attached to any particular word."

2. "Another most important assistance for investigating the meaning of words and phrases, is the consideration of the context, or the comparison of the preceding and subsequent parts of a discourse. If we analyse the words of an author, and take them out of their proper sense, they may be so distorted as to mean any thing but what he intended to express. Since, therefore, words have several meanings, and consequently are to be taken in various acceptations, a careful consideration of the preceding and subsequent parts will enable us to determine that signification, whether literal or figurative, which is best adapted to the passage in question."

3. "If the meaning of a single verse is to be ascertained, the five, six, or seven verses immediately preceding should first be read with minute attention."

4. "A verse or passage must not be connected with a remote context, unless the latter agree better with it than a nearer context."

5. "The parentheses which occur in the sacred writings should be particularly regarded; but no parenthesis should be interposed without sufficient reason."

6. "No explanation must be admitted, but that which suits the context."

7. "Where no connection is to be found with the preceding and subsequent parts of a book, none should be sought."

ALEPH.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

BRIEF ACCOUNT OF THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS

Founded in the City and County of Philadelphia by Charter from William Penn.

The institution of these schools originated in a concern felt by the members of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia, for the establishment of a grammar school in that city. To this end the gifts and amonities liberally contributed by individuals, members of the religious Society of Friends, were entrusted to the care and management of a Committee appointed by that Monthly Meeting. Under its direction the business was conducted with such reputation and evident usefulness, as occasioned an encouraging increase in the means of sustaining the institution, and extending its advantages. The weight of the trust thus increasing, the expediency of a Charter of Incorporation became manifest.

In the year 1697, "upon the petition of Samuel Carpenter, Edward Shippen, Anthony Morris, James Fox, David Lloyd, William Southby and John Jones, on behalf of themselves and others, desiring that a Public School for teaching and instructing children and servants, both male and female, might be founded," an order was granted by William Markham, Lieut. Governor, and the Council of the Province, for the foundation of such a school. This was carried into effect, and the order was confirmed by the Proprietor in 1701, but not being sufficiently extensive in its powers and privileges, two subsequent charters were granted by William Penn, one in 1708, the other in 1711, under which the Corporation now act by the name of "the Overseers of the Public School, founded by Charter in the town and county of Philadelphia, in Pennsylvania."

The following is the language of the preamble. "Whereas the prosperity and welfare of any people depends in a great measure upon the good education of youth and their early instruction in the principles of true religion and virtue, and qualifying them to serve their country and themselves by breeding them in reading, writing, and learning of languages and useful arts and sciences suitable to their sex, age, and degrees which cannot be effected in any manner so well as by erecting Public Schools for the purposes aforesaid."

In the charter William Penn directs that the common seal shall have engraved upon it his coat of arms, with this inscription, "Good instruction is better than riches." The Overseers, fifteen in number, are directed and enjoined in case of death, resignation, or removal of any of their number, to appoint a successor within forty days after due notice being given of such vacancy.

The first meeting recorded under the charter was held 4th of 10th month, 1712, present Samuel Carpenter, Griffith Owen, Thomas Story, Anthony Morris, Richard Hill, Isaac Norris, Samuel Preston, Jonathan Dickinson, Thomas Masters, and James Logan, who acted as Clerk.

Their minute states, "The said charter being read was received with grateful acknowledgments to the Proprietor, for his favourable care and regard to the welfare of this place, and the education of the youth of it, on which depends principally the happiness of the next generations."

The plan early adopted by the overseers, appears to have been, to build school houses and furnish them to teachers of suitable qualifications rent free, on condition of their receiving as many poor children as should appear reasonable, and instruct them in reading, writing and arithmetic. This is noted in the year 1730. Eight years after it is mentioned that the Latin tongue was also taught to the poor scholars gratis. The teachers were allowed to take pay scholars at reasonable rates, which were generally fixed by the overseers, the course of instruction being probably as liberal as the qualifications of the teachers would warrant.

The minutes of the overseers show that they had great difficulty in procuring persons qualified to teach the higher branches of education. They corresponded frequently with Friends in London, soliciting their aid in procuring such for them, offering to pay the expense of their passage, and to give them salaries, considered no doubt liberal in those days. (£100 sterling, and 20 guineas for the passage.)

In the year 1742 appears this minute: "Any of the members of this corporation are desired to inquire for such poor boys among Friends as may be objects of charity, and recommend them in order to be admitted into the school to be taught gratis; and if a sufficient number cannot be found among Friends, then to admit those of other persuasions, till the whole school consists of thirty scholars." The same year Anthony Benet proposed "to undertake to teach writing, arithmetic, accounts, and the French language, and the Overseers agreed to allow him the use of the school room, and the sum of £50 out of the public stock for one year, in consideration of his teaching fifteen poor children,—to which terms Anthony agreed."

A large and commodious brick school house was built in 1746, at the cost of nearly £800.

In 1748, at the request of the overseers, Robert Willan, of Scarborough, Yorkshire, was engaged by John Fothergill and John Hunt of London, to teach the Latin and Greek languages in the corporation school.

The solicitude of the overseers for the religious instruction of the scholars is frequently manifested, and in 1755 it was concluded to request the meeting of ministers and elders to appoint some of their number to attend meetings for worship, to be held in the school house with the children every three months. The following report was made after one of those meetings: "The Board was now informed that on the first sixth day of the week in this month (4th mo., 1756,) a meeting was held in the school house, at which most of the children in the several schools attended, and in general behaved well, and it is hoped received some advantage from the excellent and weighty advice and doctrine communicated to them by our worthy friend Samuel Fothergill."

They also exhorted the masters to keep the scholars to the frequent reading of the Bible, and frequently visited the schools, as the following minutes in 1749 indicate.

"After much conversation on the present state of the schools, and the perusal and consideration of some proposals made by both the masters, (A. Benet and R. Willan,) the overseers present being concerned to promote the laudable intentions of the first founders of the school, and to render the service thereof as beneficial and extensive as they can, have concluded it may be expedient once in each quarter of the year to appoint three of the overseers to visit the schools as often as they see it to be necessary, and that they should at least once within that time, make a particular inquiry from the masters whether the rules agreed upon are duly put in practice, and if in the course of their observation any further rules should appear to them to be necessary they are desired to communicate their sentiments thereon to the Board."

The capacity and usefulness of the schools steadily and largely increased. In 1759 it appears "that for several years past upwards of 200 children have been constantly taught in the schools, a large proportion of whom were orphans and poor children of the several different denominations of Christians, freely admitted and instructed at the expense of the institution, in the most useful parts of learning, and by this means some of them have been qualified for school masters, who are now of service both in this city and county."

In answer to a renewed application to Friends in London for teachers, in 1760, John Hunt writes, "Good and able teachers are greatly wanted here, and hard to be found. It therefore looks as if you must advance the pay, or not be supplied with a person properly qualified." "The education of Friends' children was weightily considered by our Yearly Meeting this year, and a proposal for the encouragement of masters and mistresses was agreed to,—if that plan should be put into execution we shall be in want of able teachers here." "However, our endeavours shall not be wanting to fulfill your request, and be assured it will afford us no small satisfaction to have it in our power to serve you and the Society."

The overseers in reply to this say, "in case of your meeting with a person fully qualified to answer our expectations, we shall not be averse to increase the salary proposed, rather than fail of obtaining such an one."

The following instructions issued in 1748 "for the Latin and English masters and mistress of the Public School in Philadelphia," appear to embody very fully the sound judgment and religious concern of our worthy forefathers.

First,—That they strictly enjoin and require their respective scholars to apply themselves diligently to their several studies in school time, not suffering them to idle their time away by talking, staring about, moving from place to place in the schools, or frequently running out upon any pretence; but cause them early to application and industry at their books which will render them an agreeable sight to every person that observes their diligence and decorum: be a reputation to their teachers, of singular advantage to themselves, both at school and in business when men, and highly praiseworthy.

That the Latin scholars be early accustomed to analyze or parse their several lessons, and the English to learn the English language grammatically: an exercise indispensably necessary for the correct writing the latter, and ready construing or writing the former, in which they should likewise be early employed.

That the foremost of the Latin boys be required to give, in writing, the most elegant translations or versions into English of the Latin authors they have read, whether prose or verse, that their capacity will allow, to be fairly transcribed and kept as copy books; by this practice they will more strongly impress upon their memories the language and subjects they are reading, improve their hand writing, style, and spelling: learn readily to write their native language correctly, with elegance; invite them to read history in English, give them a relish for the best English authors, and induce them to an imitation of their style and sentiments when they come to be exercised in composing English themes, or upon any occasions in public or private life.

Let not the scholars be allowed too frequent play days, and none upon such days as are commonly though improperly called holy days for reasons obvious to every sober minded person, that has observed the many disorderly companies that are strolling about at such times, both in town and country, which children will be too apt to mix with, and be in danger to imitate. But rather let their relaxation from study be the reward of their diligence or extraordinary performance at their books, and not to gratify an idle sauntering disposition, that will surely endanger if not ruin their morals and fortunes, if they are entitled to any; and if not, will effectually prevent their rising any for themselves. Such must be the consequence of an early and repeated taste of sensual pleasures, and an aversion from study and business. Yet when it may be thought convenient to allow them some relaxation from their studies, let it be understood not to be commendable in them often to desire it, for that is a concession to encourage them to pursue their studies more earnestly, when they return to their books, which are always preferred by men of sense before diversions or idleness, and therefore at such times especially they should have some easy tasks appointed.

Let the children of both sexes understand that they are required to be at meetings twice on the first day of each week, besides the week days already appointed, unless sickness, weather, or something very material prevent, and if any fail therein, let strict inquiry be immediately made for the cause, and no method omitted to detect and discountenance every inclination observed in them to screen or hide their misconduct in this or any other instance, by that truly mean and scandalous practice so frequent among children, of deceiving their parents and tutors by quibbling, equivocating and lying, a vice they should know is thoroughly detestable in the sight of God and good men, and worthy of correction more than any neglect of books, and, on the contrary, let openness, candour, and integrity be duly extolled and rewarded by proper instances of favour.

But above all, let there be frequent opportunities taken and every occasion employed to inculcate in their tender minds the necessity and advantage to themselves, both present and future, of strictly observing every social, moral and Christian duty, and let any breach thereof be more severely reproved than any other neglect, because all judicious parents will allow it is far more necessary and advantageous that their children be taught how to obtain the favour of God and religious men, than the language or sentiments of any Pagan poet or historian; and, therefore, as one great means to attain those good ends, let all the children be regularly required to read, thrice a week, some parts of the Holy Scriptures, both of the Old and New Testament. For the Apostle says, "They are able to make wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus, and are profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works." 2 Tim. chap. iii. verse 15—17.

[To be continued.]

To the Editors of the Non-Slaveholder.]

Newport, (Indiana,) 29th Dec., 1846.

I take the liberty to enclose a paper prepared last fall, with a view to bring this project to the notice and consideration of the public; or at least of those who duly appreciate the destitute condition of the coloured people in the free states, and our own obligation as friends of humanity, to aid them in their moral progress. The circular enclosed, was written with too much haste, and the whole subject presented in a more crude form than could be desired, if it had been intended for distant circulation. It is hoped, nevertheless, that it will afford you a general idea of our design and plan of operations in this undertaking. If you should judge it not inappropriate for the "Non-Slaveholder," its appearance in your columns might aid us materially in this work.

The erection of a boarding house is deemed by the managers to be indispensable to the successful progress of the school. The work is now going on, and will be completed some time in the spring. The managers had very much desired so to conduct the operations as not to become involved in debt; but this indispensable appendage, the boarding house, will go several hundred dollars beyond the amount of means as yet subscribed. Although the friends of the coloured man have done well, and come nobly up with their means to aid in this business, yet the imperative family claims on those in mediocrity of circumstances settling a new country, greatly limit and circumscribe their munificence; and of the more wealthy "but few are called" to sympathize or make sacrifices for the man of colour; or, if called, they have not obeyed the heavenly monition. Hence there is difficulty in obtaining the pecuniary means to carry forward any enterprise of a benevolent character, especially if such enterprise have for its object the elevation of the negro race in this country. Could contributions to this school be obtained from the friends of the coloured race in your city?

I would fill the rest of my blank space on the subject of free produce; but do not know that I have any thing to communicate that would aid in the good work in which you are engaged. It has been some two years since I removed from North Carolina to this place. I am aware that there is a considerable quantity of cotton raised by free labour in that state, and if a trusty agent could be found in the town of Fayetteville, I should suppose that several hundred bales might be collected and shipped from that point each year. A letter addressed to ————, would elicit full information on the subject. Mr. ———— is a member of the Society of Friends, and a man of business. I had the pleasure to labour with him in the Manumission Society from about the year 1815 up to the unfortunate period when the pernicious efforts of the Colonization Society deceived many by its false pretensions to anti-slavery principles, disgusted others by its hypocrisy, and paralysed the Anti-Slavery, or Manumission Society, which at that time had forty organized branches in North Carolina.

With ardent desires for your success in the free produce enterprise, and with much esteem for the work's sake,

I am truly yours,

MOSES SWAIN.

CIRCULAR.

Newport, Ia., September, 1846.

SIR:—I am instructed by the Board of Managers to address you in behalf of the Union LITERARY INSTITUTE; in the hope that the object of this School will meet your favourable regard, and through you be acceptably presented to the benevolent of your acquaintance, who may take an interest in the moral elevation of the African race in this country.

We cannot conceal from ourselves the helpless condition of this people;—proscribed by an unjust social prejudice—disfranchised by the State—unprotected by the law, and excluded from our Schools. Shall we make no effort to stay their downward course in ignorance and its attendant crimes?

A people is in our midst from whom all educational facilities are withheld, while their ignorance and moral degradation are insulted and spurned by a most unjust and capricious prejudice.

What is it but this prejudice against the coloured man, evoked through the legislation of the country, that surrounds him with disabilities, fits him for delinquency and crime, that it may visit him with punishment?

Can we trace to any other source those absurd legal and constitutional disabilities imposed on the coloured man? Can we reconcile their degrading effects and tendencies, on a numerous and increasing class of people in our midst, with any sound principles of political philosophy, or justify ourselves on any principle of Morals or Religion?

And are not the operations of our laws and social policy in reference to this people equally disgraceful to us, and unjust and injurious to them? Do not their moral degradation proclaim aloud the infamous triumphs of perverted Legislation, corrupted Morality, and abused Religion?

Does it not behove the benevolent and the good to make one effort to extend to this people the means to counteract, or at least modify, the force of a prejudice which has borne upon them from earlier and darker times with such blighting power!

Disfranchised as are these people, and the protection of the law virtually withheld from their persons and property, yet we see individuals among them, by dint of native energy and perseverance, rising above the force of circumstances that surround them; triumphing over barriers thrown in their way, without uttering a complaint or betraying impatience of the laws that oppress them, or reviling the social caprice and folly that proscribe and insult them; going steadily forward, gaining a competence, approaching to wealth, and winning a moral and even intellectual character that should at once shame thousands of their white brethren and provoke their emulation.

With a people in her midst, holding the anomalous position of disfranchised citizens, our Republican State, whose municipal laws demand their obedience, punish their delinquency and tax their persons and property, around which they throw no adequate safe-guard, closes her Courts of Justice to their complaints. She excludes them from her Schools, and yet requires them to learn the relations and perform the functions of Citizens. What duties, as Christians and Citizens, do we not owe to these people and to the State? Shall we continue to seek in that depravity we have forced upon them, an excuse for continuing these proscriptive laws, and that social persecution, until we compel them again to flee!—Ah! whither, with their wives and little ones! And where shall they find shelter from the Legal, Social, and Religious tyranny which overshadows this land of their birth, in the nineteenth century? Or shall we not rather, out of the abundant means with which Providence has blessed us, extend to them the helping hand of brethren? Shall we not take them under the healing wing of Education until the day of their persecution shall have passed away, and the Government shall resume its proper and legitimate functions, The protection of the weak against the strong, and the Education of every child in the State?

Can any Christian citizen hesitate as to his course in relation to this people?—Can the enlightened Statesman withhold his co-operation in aid of an institution, having for its object their moral elevation, and consequent preparation to fill the relation and perform the duties of Citizens?

Such an Institution has recently been started ten miles north-west of this place, (Newport.) Though humble in its beginnings, it may be made the instrument of incalculable good, both to ourselves and to those who have become outcasts in the land of their birth, and whom it is designed more directly to reach and bless.

It had its origin in sympathy and benevolent regard for these people. A few citizens of this State (Ia.) and Ohio made donations of small tracts of land contiguous, amounting in the aggregate to near four hundred acres; others contributed money and goods to the amount of some fifteen hundred dollars, which, with all future donations and endowments, are, and will be, rendered inalienable in the hands of five Trustees; who with six others chosen at different periods will constitute a Board of Directors to have a general supervision over the School, and control and direct its police and pecuniary matters.

While the great principles of the Christian Religion will be carefully inculcated, with a view to impart a high moral finish to the character of the Student, the School will be equally guarded against the biasing influences of Sectarianism and Bigotry.

It was not until the Autumn of the last year that the first movement was made in this undertaking, and the first donation given. Since that time a house has been built on the land large enough to accommodate eighty or an hundred pupils—a competent teacher has been employed—a farmer has also been engaged and located on the premises, and a Manual Labour School has been opened; where it is intended, so soon as the funds at command or in prospect will justify the Managers, to enlarge the accommodations for boarding and provide the proper facilities for teaching the higher branches of science, and prepare young coloured men to take charge of schools in different neighborhoods where they are so much needed.

Such, Sir, is a brief summary of the motives and design in founding this School,—of the principles on which it is to be conducted, and the progress already made. Permit me to ask: at your hands a candid review of the present and prospective condition of that class of our population for whose benefit it is mostly intended. If your judgment and your heart approve the object, and regard with favour the plan, no further appeal is needed to your liberality for aid in the pecuniary means to give to it permanency and success. With this, the enterprise can be speedily carried forward to the most happy results: without such aid it must languish.

The undersigned will be happy to respond to all enquiries that may be addressed to him in relation to the School. He will receive and acknowledge such donations and contributions as may be transmitted, reports of which will also be regularly published by the Board. He will also attend in person to calls that may be made by the friends of the coloured race, where it may be judged expedient to present their moral destitution and the claims of this School in their behalf more directly to the people. M. SWAIN, Agent and Corresponding Secretary.

MONKTON, (Vt.) 1st mo. 9th, 1847.

To the Editors of the Non-Slaveholder.

Several causes have hitherto prevented me from furnishing you, as you proposed, with some account of my late journey through a part of Virginia.

Although the principal inducement I had to visit Virginia was to discharge a duty to which I felt bound as companion to another friend, a minister, who was on his way to pay a religious visit to Friends and others, within the limits of Baltimore Yearly Meeting, yet I confess I was not wholly uninfluenced by the opportunity which the journey would probably afford me, of seeing with my own eyes, something of that institution which is attracting so much attention from the thinking portion of mankind. I also hoped that I might be able to obtain some information relative to procuring, through free labour, some of those articles in common use which are generally the proceeds of slave labour.

We spent only a few weeks in Virginia, including parts of the 9th and 10th months. Of the many meetings which we attended in that State, several were held in meeting houses that were evidently designed to accommodate a much greater body of Friends than generally assemble in them at the present time,—the balance having mostly emigrated to the western States, to avoid as much as possible the inconvenience of living in the midst of slavery. It is to be hoped that the unboly prejudice against the dark skin was not among the inducements which led them to forsake what might be called "advanced posts" in the moral warfare against this sin of sins. Of the few remaining, not a small proportion appeared to consider their hands materially weakened by those removals, to the no small loss of the nominally free blacks in the State. I confess it was by no means difficult to coincide with them in that sentiment, after hearing of the cases which frequently occur, where the liberty of these legally free is placed in jeopardy, requiring the friendly aid of some one on the spot, to have all the liberty that the law allows them, secured to the claimants. Many cases undoubtedly occur to which, from a variety of circumstances, the care of the few Friends now in the State cannot be extended. As there is a willingness manifested by many slaveholders that I conversed with, to allow Friends to bear their testimony against slavery in their own way, plainly, if needful, it seems the more to be regretted that they which have removed, had not remained, and patiently endured, for the negro's sake, those inconveniences of which perhaps they have not entirely rid themselves by removing.

Whilst tarrying in the Old Dominion, if there was one conviction by which my mind was more particularly impressed, as connected with our duties to the American negro, it was, that we should embrace every opportunity that offers of furthering the intellectual and moral elevation of that portion of the race over which the slaveholder has neither a moral nor legal right to exercise authority.

Gov. Smith's recent message, although justly deprecated by the leading journals of Virginia, must necessarily be regarded as an index of the feelings towards the free blacks entertained by an influential class in this State. He speaks of them as "moral lepers," and regards it as among the highest duties of the State to get rid of them. It has occurred to me that there is another and better way to cure them of their leprosy than banishment, and that is to educate them, and treat them courteously. The law which stands opposed to their receiving an education at school, is so construed by many, as not to prohibit their receiving some instruction from the family in which they may be inmates. This instruction, of course, is extremely limited; the consequence is that the black population of the State is truly illiterate.

As long as this law remains in force, it is not to be expected that much can be done in Virginia, by the best combination of the friends of the coloured people; still, I think they are not entirely out of our reach. By the many small patches of rice which I saw waving triumphantly before the wind, I was assured that both the climate and soil of a considerable part of the south-eastern counties were favourable to the growth of that species of grain. Many persons, including some Friends, who do not own or employ slaves, would very cheerfully go into the culture of rice, if they could be assured of a market for it when raised, and I was informed by those competent to judge, that it could be delivered on board a vessel in James River, at Smithfield, for instance, at a price low enough to insure a favourable reception in the wholesale markets, after passing through the hands of the manufacturer, to free it of its husk. The quality of the rice, a sample of which I left with you, appeared to me to be nearly or quite equal to that from Carolina. Another item in the account, which should not be forgotten is, that those counties that have suitable soil for producing rice, and where some Friends reside, contain also some thousands of Gov. Smith's "moral lepers" who would probably find employment in this business.

If such Friends and others, as have come to the resolution to no longer give their money patronage in favour of the slave system, would take some pains to throw that patronage into this part of the free labour scale, they may have the satisfaction of seeing more good result from it than many predict. First, the direct benefit which the free blacks of a part of Virginia would receive by this additional demand for their labour; and secondly, as far as their condition is improved by this bonus on their industry, so far will an obstacle be removed which blocks up to a certain extent an anti-slavery feeling, which unquestionably does exist in the minds of many who are numbered among slaveholders. I think, from the conversation I had with several Friends in that State, that I am warranted in saying, they coincided with me in this sentiment, and probably hold themselves ready to reply to any suggestions which they may receive upon this subject.

Trusting that the Free Produce Association of Friends of Philadelphia, will feel themselves warranted in forwarding to the Friends alluded to in Virginia, sufficient encouragement to induce them to make a beginning the coming spring,

I am your affectionate friend,

HENRY MILES.

ASSOCIATED ACTION.

From the Anti-Slavery Reporter.

Address of the Committee of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society to the Friends of the Anti-Slavery cause throughout the World,

ON THE DISEUSE OF SLAVE PRODUCE.

The abolition of slavery and the slave-trade through every portion of the territorial possessions of Great Britain, is, perhaps, the greatest event which has marked the progress of the present age. In it we cannot fail to discover the triumph of Christian philanthropy and national justice, over a system of heartless selfishness and inhuman oppression. By the laws which have been passed, millions of slaves have been emancipated, and their posterity, through successive generations, declared free. To measure the misery from which these liberated slaves have been relieved, the degradation from which they have been raised, the privileges to which they have been exalted, and the blessings which they enjoy, would be impossible.

But whilst we are permitted to rejoice in this triumph of justice, humanity, and religion, we have still to deplore the existence of slavery and the slave-trade to an enormous extent, and under the most aggravated circumstances, in foreign countries. So long as they exist, we consider it to be the duty of philanthropists to use every practicable means for their removal; and hence, we earnestly call on the friends of the slave throughout the United Kingdom and the World, to combined and persevering efforts in promoting this great and good work.

The number of Africans and their descendants now held in bondage under professedly Christian governments, is estimated at upwards of seven millions. In the rice swamps and cotton plantations of the United States, nearly three millions of innocent human beings languish in slavery and chains. An equal number are compelled, under the dreadful stimulus of the slave-whip, to cultivate the vast territory of Brazil, and to work its mines; and about 800,000 more are driven to their toil on the sugar and coffee plantations of the Spanish colonies. To these we may add 400,000 who pass a wretched existence in the colonial possessions of France, Holland, Denmark, and Sweden. The variety and intensity of the privations and sufferings endured by these poor slaves can only be fully known to him who is omniscient, and "whose ear is open to their cry;" yet enough is known of their sorrow and degradation to excite the tenderest compassion for them, and the most earnest prayers and efforts for their deliverance.

In this brief statement of human wrong, one melancholy fact should not be forgotten. Nearly one half of the millions of the human race, now held in slavery, are women; and on them it falls with dreadful severity. Within the grasp of their brutal masters, neither the innocence of youth, nor the virtue of womanhood is respected. No law protects them from the deep pollution to which, in most cases, they are subjected.

The great extent and multiplied horrors of the African slave-trade have engaged too much of public attention to require more than a mere reference. At the least computation, from 80,000 to 100,000 men, women, and children are torn from Africa annually, to meet the demands of the slave-markets in the Spanish colonies and Brazil. Yet these form scarcely more than one-third of the whole number of victims of this dreadful traffic. From 150,000 to 200,000, besides those led into hopeless captivity, are estimated to perish in the wars engendered by it in the interior of Africa, in their transit to the coast, in their detention at the barracoons for sale, and in their conveyance across the Atlantic to their place of final destination and bondage.

In all countries where slavery prevails, especially in the United States, an immense internal slave-trade is carried on, under the most revolting circumstances. There, husbands and wives, parents and children, are publicly exposed to auction, handled and examined like cattle, and sold and separated without compunction or remorse; and in some states, they are reported to be raised like brute beasts for the market.

Our friends are aware, that during the past year an act of the British legislature was passed, which allows of the introduction of slave-grown sugars into the home market for consumption. The tendency of this measure is to extend and strengthen the system of slavery, and to give a dreadful stimulus to the slave-trade, by affording increased profits to the inhuman traffickers in their fellow-men, as well as those who build up their fortunes on their uncompensated toil. Under these circumstances, it is for Christian philanthropy, influenced by a deep sense of moral obligation, to counteract the effects of a commercial intercourse which invades human liberty, retards civilization, and destroys the life and the happiness of men.

This consideration induces us to direct your serious attention to the fourth rule of the Society, where, among the means referred to for promoting the abolition of slavery is the following, viz.: "TO RECOMMEND THE USE OF FREE-GROWN PRODUCE (AS FAR AS PRACTICABLE), IN PREFERENCE TO SLAVE-GROWN." This is a practical measure which all can adopt; it would be an efficient one, were all, who love the freedom of the human race, to follow it. Under any circumstances, as auxiliary to other measures, it could not fail to force the conviction on the minds of slaveholders, that we would not voluntarily be partakers of their crimes. In asking you to adopt this recommendation in your daily practice, permit us to suggest it as a matter of consideration, whether those who needlessly purchase slave-produce are less necessary to the crime of the slaveholder, than is the purchaser of stolen goods, to the robbery by which they are obtained! Slaveholding involves in itself nearly every crime by which the physical and moral nature of man is wronged and outraged. The slave is robbed of his person and the fair reward of his toil;—he is, in a multitude of instances, deprived of the means of mental and moral improvement; and doomed, after a life of suffering, frequently to a premature death. It must be obvious to all reflecting minds, that it is the demand which exists for slave produce, which is the chief support of slavery. It is this which keeps open the slave-markets. May it not, therefore, be said, that to the commission of a great amount of crime, and the infliction of unparalleled sufferings on a large portion of mankind, do the consumers of slave produce, however unintentionally, furnish the motive?

The articles produced by slave labour, in common use in this country, are principally cotton, rice, coffee and tobacco; to which sugar has recently been added. With the exception of cotton and tobacco, a supply of these articles, the produce of free labour, can be readily obtained. So far as we are individually concerned we can lessen the demand for slave produce by steadfastly and conscientiously refusing, where we have the power, its consumption. To carry this determination into effect may involve acts of self-denial; and the substitution, for a season at least, of other fabrics for those of cotton; but the conviction that by so doing, you lessen the toil of the slave, and withhold a great incentive to the slave-trade, will prove an abundant compensation for any sacrifice that may be made. It may also deserve remark, that in proportion as you limit the demand for slave produce, you increase it for free, and thus give a stimulus to human industry and commerce in the right direction. There is reason to hope that the experiments which are now being prosecuted in British India, and other parts of the empire, to increase the quantity and improve the quality of cotton will succeed, and that the difficulties which at present exist in manufacturing cotton goods wholly from the produce of free labour, will be removed.

It is an important and encouraging circumstance, that in the United States a Society has been established for the especial purpose of promoting the use of free labour produce only. As a personal and standing testimony against slavery, it is already producing excellent moral effects. We rejoice greatly in this fact, and would encourage our friends in that country, both in this, and all other legitimate efforts, on behalf of the slave.

To the female heads of families we would especially and earnestly appeal on this important subject, under the well-grounded persuasion, that their judgments and feelings will alike combine to lead them to the adoption of the course suggested in this address. They will not, we are convinced, turn a deaf ear to the cries of Africa, ravished of her children; or consent, by their practice, to add a pang to the sorrows of the slave in the land of his captivity and exile.

In conclusion, we would observe, that it is far from our intention, by pressing on your consideration the disuse of slave produce, to induce a suspension or relaxation of other efforts for the abolition of slavery. It is to be regarded simply as one among the various means which may be used to awaken the conscience of individuals and the justice of legislators; and thus to promote the extinction of one of the greatest crimes by which humanity is afflicted, and heaven defied.

From the same.

ADDRESS OF THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY

To British Shareholders in Foreign Mines in which Slave-Labour is employed, and to other Subjects or Natives of Great Britain who hold or hire Slaves in Foreign Countries.

Whilst anxiously and earnestly occupied in attempting to promote the abolition of slavery in foreign lands,—by which system upwards of seven millions of immortal beings are regarded in law, and treated in practice, as chattels; in countries professing Christianity; and whilst seeking the extinction of that traffic by which hundreds of thousands of Africans are annually condemned to death in their own land, or to bondage on a foreign shore;—our thoughts are naturally directed to the part which our countrymen yet take in these dreadful practices.

We are sensible that when we make an appeal to the people of other Countries against these iniquities, we shall be in some, if not in many instances, met by prejudices which would not be equally felt, did it come from their own fellow-citizens; and especially that familiarity with slavery and slave-trading, and the debasing effects of this familiarity, will do much to prevent a candid and just attention to our remonstrances. These remarks will not equally apply to you. You are not wholly unacquainted with our character; and you will not, we believe, generally doubt that our single object is to advance, what we consider to be, the just rights of our enslaved brethren, the sum of human happiness, and the honour and interests of that religion which you in general profess as well as ourselves. Neither have many of you been reconciled to the atrocities of slaveholding and slavetrading, by the frequent or constant sight of those practices. On the other hand, you know how indignantly the Christian public of Great Britain has risen up against them, and have caused them to be swept from the British dominions. How hopeful, then, may seem to be our task of persuading you to perform that duty, which is evidently required at your hands, of giving liberty to those whom you now hold as bondmen—but we do not conceal from you or from ourselves, that the greatest obstacle to emancipation, the love of gold, exists with too many amongst you, as well as with the foreign slaveholder.

We proceed to state, so far as we are aware of the fact, the extent to which British subjects, or natives of Great Britain, are implicated in slaveholding in foreign countries.

There were several Brazilian mining associations, established about twenty years since, the shares in which are principally held by Englishmen. The mines belonging to these associations have been, during that period, and still are to a great extent, worked by slaves, the number of whom held as property, or hired, is estimated at about 2,000. In the Cobro Copper Company, in the island of Cuba, which is largely owned by British proprietors, the labour of slaves is also employed. We are unable to state the precise number claimed as property, or hired by that company, but there is reason to suppose that it amounts to some hundreds. We are not sure that the Cobro Copper Company is the only one principally sustained by British capital, and conducted under British management, in which slave labour is employed. Besides the slaves held by the Mining Associations in Cuba, we are informed that natives of Great Britain are concerned as proprietors of plantations, cultivated by slaves, both in Cuba and Porto Rico. In Surinam, a Dutch colony, there are a large number of plantations that belong to Englishmen and Scotchmen individually, or jointly with others. The slaves on these plantations, appear from the last Surinam Almanac to which we have access, that for 1843, to be not fewer than about 7,000, and constitute one-sixth, or nearly that proportion of the whole number of slaves in the colony. In the island of St. Croix, under the rule of Denmark, there are several plantations with slaves upon them, owned by, or mortgaged to British subjects, or natives of Great Britain.

Allow us now to call your attention to the extent of slavery and the slave-trade, and to some of the dreadful evils with which these crimes are accompanied, in the various countries in which you hold property in your fellow-men. Brazil and Cuba together contain nearly 4,000,000 of slaves and are to a fearful extent engaged in the African slave-trade, the number of whose victims, brought to their shores, having often reached or exceeded 100,000 annually. We need not remind many whom we address that this fact, painful as it is, represents only a small part of the horrors of the slave-trade, to supply which traffic wars are constantly waged in Africa, its villages plundered of their inhabitants, and large numbers of them destroyed by the hardships of the march to the coast, privations at the place of embarkation, and the intolerable sufferings of the middle passage. We have not adverted as we might have done to the cruelties endured by the slaves in Brazil and Cuba; but we may observe, that a principal cause of the great difficulty which exists in the suppression of the slave-trade in those countries, arises from the large demand for fresh hands, to supply the waste of life among those employed in the mines and on plantations. In Surinam a system of the most galling oppression prevails, and has, in a period of little more than twenty years, destroyed one-third of the slave population formerly existing in that colony. In the Danish West India Islands a large portion of the same class has also been destroyed by similar causes, and although the number of slaves in the Danish islands has within the last few years exhibited little decrease, or has been nearly stationary, that result is very far from satisfactory, opposed as it is to the general experience of all free countries. Not only is slavery a murderous system in the countries of which we have spoken, but some of the other features by which it is distinguished are scarcely, if at all, less to be deplored. We allude to the general neglect of intellectual, moral, and religious instruction among slaves—the severe labour usually exacted from them—the cruel punishments to which they are exposed—the deep demoralization incident to their neglected and unprotected state—and finally, the frequent separation of the nearest domestic ties, by sale or otherwise. These results, and many more that we cannot stay to particularize, are the natural fruits of a system founded upon violence and injustice, and which can only exist in a community by the commission of those crimes.

This system of slavery which we have imperfectly sketched, and the existence of which furnishes a never-failing incentive to a foreign or domestic slave-trade, you whom we address have now for many years sanctioned; and still sanction by your example—a consideration which we trust will be felt to be most serious and painful by not a very small number amongst you.

We rejoice to know that there are some, who having become proprietors of shares in a Brazilian Mining Association, in ignorance of the fact that the company held or hired slaves, are not only dissatisfied with their position as slaveholders; but have besought those with whom they are associated, to restore to the slaves, belonging in law to the company, their rightful freedom. Permit us at the same time to express to you, of whom we have last spoken, and to whose conduct we look with the deepest interest, our decided opinion that you can only escape from being partakers of other men's sins, by a constant renewal of efforts similar to those made by you some years since, and by a frequent protest before the world, so long as your efforts are unsuccessful against an iniquity, perpetrated contrary to your earnest counsel and will. Such steps will, we believe, accomplish their object eventually, and we hope speedily, whilst we cannot doubt that you will feel satisfaction in these efforts on behalf of those whose dearest interests you cannot neglect without implicating your character as professed Christians.

The duty incumbent upon British members of foreign mining Associations who have hitherto taken no part in the attempt to procure liberty for the slaves, or who have opposed their emancipation, is no less imperative, than on the part of those to whom we have just alluded.—We beseech you, therefore, who have hitherto been indifferent or hostile, where the liberty of your fellow-men is at stake, to be so no longer. We beseech this of you by every consideration of honour, of justice, of humanity, and of religion. Thus may the blessing, and not the curse, of those who are ready to perish, come upon you!

We have heard it asserted that the example of the mild treatment of the slaves of an Anglo-Brazilian mining company, has promoted a better feeling towards that class of persons in Brazil. We possess information, which leads us to disbelieve the statements of the alleged treatment; but were it true, it must be the height of folly to suppose that such a circumstance would influence the conduct exercised towards any considerable portion of three millions of slaves, scattered over the vast territory of Brazil. An example of the abandonment of slaveholding by one, and still more by all of the Anglo-Brazilian Mining Associations, would, it may reasonably be supposed, excite no inconsiderable attention; and might be followed by some of the best disposed among the slaveholders of Brazil. It might also, by the discussion and consideration to which it would lead, prove the first important step towards the abolition of slavery and the slave-trade in a country, where those crimes exist upon a stupendous scale. Our remarks on the conduct which we deem it the duty of British holders of Brazilian mining shares to adopt, are no less applicable to the slaveholders of mines in Cuba.

We now direct ourselves to those of our fellow subjects who are individually, and not in connection with others, holders of mortgages of slave property in foreign countries.

To those who hold such property unconditionally, we submit that the duty is plain, at once, to give liberty to those whom they have hitherto unjustly deprived of that right. You have the unfettered power to perform this Christian obligation. Can you doubt that this act is required from you by Him who came to preach glad tidings to the poor, to proclaim deliverance to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound; who, when upon earth, went about doing good; and who left this injunction to his followers, "whosoever ye would that others should do to you, do you even so to them."

To British mortgagees of slave property, we would say:—We deeply regret that by taking the persons of your fellow-men as a pledge, you have become slaveholders; and are consequently responsible for that crime and for the cruelties by which it may be, and generally is, accompanied. You are likewise accountable for the pernicious influence of your example. We entreat you at once to abandon your present conduct; and should those whom you now hold as chattels, fall into your hands from the inability of the mortgagee to repay the advance made, or from any other cause, on you will rest the duty of giving to those men, who are thus shamefully degraded, and wronged, their immediate freedom.

Some among those we address, hire, and do not otherwise use the labour of slaves. This, however, really is but another form of slaveholding. It may exist for a shorter period in some instances, than is often the case, when slaves are purchased or inherited, but it involves a participation in that injustice by which the slave is deprived of his freedom and of the fair reward of his toil.

We have not hitherto particularly referred to the case of slaves who are held or hired as domestics by Englishmen who reside in foreign countries, or by their agents. Although the treatment of these may, in some instances, be less severe and degrading than that of predial slaves, or of slaves employed in mines, it is liable to the same insuperable objection which exists to all slavery, in the right claimed over the person of the bondman, and in his uncompensated labour. The almost unlimited power possessed in this, as well as in all other cases of slaveholding, is also, in a vast number of instances, attended with a large amount of cruelty.

It may be proper that we should briefly notice the allegations easily made, and which we have seen made in one instance, of superior treatment of slaves on the part of companies in which British interests are largely represented, or of individual British slaveholders. It would not be difficult to prove, that the mode of treatment adopted not only by certain mining companies, but by other proprietors, towards their slaves, affords much ground for dissatisfaction apart from the essential wickedness of the system. This might be shown by the large mortality among the slaves, in many instances, or in other ways equally decisive. A similar pretence of superior treatment we have heard advanced on behalf of slaves, under the rule of subjects of nearly every slaveholding country of Europe, and to those of America and Brazil. If the statement were true in some cases, it does not lessen the duty which devolves upon all slaveholders of abandoning a practice, irreconcilable with the first principles of morality, and over which the cases we have supposed throw a partial and delusive gloss.

In conclusion, we once more beseech each one of you, whom we have addressed, that, for the sake of the slave—for your own sake—in order to maintain a conscience void of offence, and a character without reproach—for the sake of your country's honour; and above all, that you may obey the precepts and promote the advancement of that holy religion which you profess—that you at once take measures to restore to the victims of an intolerable and unchristian oppression, that liberty, to which they have a right no less sacred than your own.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, SECOND MONTH 1, 1847.

A SEASONABLE WARNING.—Our observation of the course pursued by a numerous portion of the religious community in relation to the Anti-Slavery enterprise, has long since brought us to the conclusion that not only do they stand in the way of the slave's emancipation, by denouncing whatever efforts are being made to effect it, but that also they bring into discredit with the world the religion they profess to love, and which, practiced, would make them the foremost to proclaim deliverance to the captives and the opening of the prison to them that are bound. It has often fallen to our lot to hear a justification of slavery from the lips of men who name the Saviour with reverence, and to hear them denounce the ardour with which others less professing than themselves, yet more honouring the Saviour in their practice, seek to carry out the precept, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself." If the world shall at length come to believe that the professors of the Christian religion do either typify its principles in this relation, or use them as a mask, judging the tree by its apparent fruits, they will be apt, without further research, to pronounce the Religion itself a convenient pretension, or its principles as coming far short of the requirements of Humanity. It should indeed go further, and look into the real principles which this blessed religion inculcates; and the result of this inquiry would make "God true," however untrue it might make "every man." professing his name. We are Bible Abolitionists, and have in that book, and in our hearts bearing consentaneously with it, a warrant for the most strenuous efforts in behalf of the down-trodden, imbruted image of God in our brother in bonds. We are willing all should act for the slave impelled by every grade of moral and religious motive. Our associates in the work must, however, be such as recognize and are willing to carry into practice the religion of Jesus Christ. Other and better foundation can no man lay than this, and our vocation, we believe, is preeminently to call the professors of this religion to their long neglected duty of remembering those who are in bonds as bound with them.

Our attention has been recalled to these important considerations by reading in "the Charter Oak" published at Hartford, Connecticut, an article given as an "extract from the Rev. Mr. Patton's Sermon on the connection of Anti-Slavery with infidelity;" portions of which we furnish below and commend to the careful notice of our religious readers.

"Our investigation," says the speaker, "will not be even generally complete, unless we notice the effect produced upon many of the opponents of slavery, by the past action of the church. The truth is precisely this, unpalatable as it may be to the mass of the churches. There are many ardent advocates of Anti-Slavery principles, men, who, from the bottom of their hearts, loathe slaveholding, who are moral in their lives, men of truth, of charity, of honesty, of moral daring, from whose lips no oath, no impure word proceeds, but who nevertheless, are thoroughly infidel in their principles. I could name some of the most prominent, if necessary. I have heard them denounce the Bible, and have more often read their words of condemnation. Their number is increasing, and their principles are successfully instilled into minds, whose ardour out-weighs their judgment. Every year that passes, witnesses the conversion of many from Christianity to infidelity.

"I am well aware that pro-slavery ministers have derived an argument, from these very facts, against the anti-slavery cause. They have denounced it as tending to infidelity, and made the opinions of some, attached to the party, a text, from which to warn their people against labouring for the slave. I am as keenly alive to the evil influence of the Anti-Church abolitionists, as firmly opposed to their extravagance of opinion and action, as willing publicly and privately to deprecate their course, as are those to whom I have referred. But, nevertheless, I have a word of truth, in the name of crushed humanity and of the living God, to speak to these ministerial friends of oppression.

"Rail on, scoff on, at this infidelity—if you please; but know two things, that you scoff at the work of your own hands, and that the longer you continue your position, the larger will be the number of such infidels who will attack the church. Nay! start not at this announcement, as though it were something strange. I re-affirm it, that the infidelity of certain abolitionists, whose names have become a by-word with you, is occasioned by your conduct. You often call them 'the troublers of Israel.' I will answer in their behalf, out of that blessed book which your infidelity has brought into contempt: 'And it came to pass when Ahab saw Elijah, that Ahab said unto him, Art thou he that troubleth Israel? And he answered, I have not troubled Israel: but thou and thy father's house, in that ye have forsaken the commandments of the Lord, and thou hast followed Baalim.' There was a time when these men believed in the religion of Jesus Christ, when they attended upon the worship of God in the sanctuary, and respected the ambassadors of the Saviour. What has occasioned the sad change over which I, as well as yourselves, mourn? Hear me, ye ministers and church members who have been false to humanity and to God, in the cause of the slave! These men were sensible to the wrongs inflicted on their brother-man; they saw the scourge which descended upon his naked body, and buried itself in his quivering flesh; they beheld him as the tear ran down his cheeks; they listened to his groans—his cries for help thrilled through their hearts; they were witnesses of the degradation of body and soul to which he was reduced, and were roused to action as he crouched before them, spoiled of his rights—a miserable dehumanized chattel. Their souls, burning with anxiety to abolish a system which thus outraged millions of their fellow-men, they came to you, expecting that the ministers and followers of the compassionate Saviour would remember those in bonds as bound with them! What was the reception with which they met? You denounced them as fanatics; you refused to open your houses of worship, that the voice of the slave might be heard; you defended the slaveholder, and declared that the Bible sanctioned the claim of property in man; you admitted slaveholding preachers and professors to your pulpits, and to your communion tables; and were, in fact, so busy in "fitting mind, noise and cunning," in regulating church government and correcting heretics, that you omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy and faith. With you joined the theological seminaries, the religious press, the ecclesiastical bodies of the land, all asserting that the rights of the master were guaranteed by the book of God. One extreme begets its opposite. They took you at your word—they believed that the Bible did sanction slavery, and, as their consciences condemned it, they followed out the path you prescribed, and cast away the Bible. I do not defend their course,—but I charge its guilt in a great measure upon you. And now what is the result? Your indifference to humanity, your wanton practical perversion of the sacred scripture, drove them to 'come-outerism' and infidelity; and now, forsooth, you strengthen yourselves in opposition to anti-slavery principles, by reference to their irregularities! This reacts upon them, and they again upon you, and thus the breach widens, the evil increases, the cause of emancipation suffers, and the Bible is dishonoured!

"A few words in conclusion, and I have done. My hearers, the present crisis is one of intense interest to the true follower of Christ. A new race of infidels has arisen, not profane, much less immoral, as were their predecessors, but existing a regard for God, for truth, for humanity, for morals, and whose complaint is, that the churches are arrayed against God, against truth, against humanity, against sound morals. It is an evil hour when INFIDELITY can marshal its forces, with Humanity for its watchword, with the conscience of the world on its side, while CHRISTIANITY, in the hands of those who betray it, leads its host to battle for oppression. In such a conflict, infidelity must triumph—the Bible must fall. Then will be true of the church, what was anciently said of Jerusalem:—All that pass by, clap their hands at thee; they hiss, and wag their heads at the daughter of Jerusalem, saying, Is this the city that men call the perfection of beauty, the joy of the whole earth?"

LAWS OF PENNSYLVANIA RELATIVE TO FUGITIVE SLAVES.—The Constitution of the United States contains the following clause:—"No person held to service or labour in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from service or labour, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labour may be due."

A law of Congress, dated February 12, 1793, prescribes the manner in which a person so held to service or labour in any State or territory, and escaping into any other State or territory, shall be delivered up to the claimant; and the Supreme Court of the United States holds this to be the law of the land, and any State laws prescribing other modes of proceeding are declared null and void. But the same tribunal has decided that, inasmuch as Congress possesses no constitutional right to impose duties upon State officers, the legislatures of the several States may prohibit their judges, magistrates, jailors, and other officers and citizens from arresting or detaining, and from aiding in the arrest or detention of any person for the reason of his being claimed as a fugitive slave.

Several of the New England States have accordingly enacted prohibitory laws of this character. That of New Hampshire was published in the Non-Slaverholder, Vol. 1, p. 143.

Efforts have been made from time to time to obtain the passage of a similar law in Pennsylvania. During the session of last year a bill was introduced but not passed. Petitions on the subject have been presented at the present session, from various quarters, and a Committee of the Philadelphia meeting for Sufferings has attended at Harrisburg, for the special purpose of promoting the passage of the bill reported last year. We are glad to learn that the Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary has again brought it forward, and we shall rejoice if our legislative body can be induced to sever every legalized connection with slavery.

Beside the prohibition upon all officers and citizens of this State to arrest or detain, or to aid in arresting or detaining a fugitive slave, the bill, as we understand it, contains provisions to prevent kidnapping, and to repeal that part of the Act of 1780 which permits persons passing through or sojourning in this State to retain their slaves for six months.

It has been the general opinion that the law of Congress passed in 1793, and the laws of Pennsylvania relative to the arrest and delivery of slaves escaping into this State from another State, are also applicable to the cases of slaves brought into it by the master or coming with his consent. A case was tried by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in 1795, from which it was inferred, as appears by a note in Pardon's Digest, that "a citizen of another State, on a visit to this State with his slave, in case of the slave's refusal to return, is entitled to the aid of the magistrate to carry him out of the State." It is not clear, however, that this conclusion was warranted by the facts of the case; for the opinions from which it was drawn were merely expressed by the Judge in a charge to the jury, and had not the weight of an adjudication.

In 1825, Judge Barnes, President of the District Court in Philadelphia, refused to grant a certificate for the return of a slave, on the ground that he had not escaped from one State into another, but came by his master's consent from Maryland to Pennsylvania. We are satisfied that the view taken by Judge Barnes is correct, and perfectly tenable; and that neither the Federal Constitution nor the law of Congress or of this Commonwealth, provides for the case of a slave who refuses to leave the State after he has been brought into it by his master, or has come into it with his master's consent. Consequently, in such a case, no officer has any right to interpose his authority in support of the master's claim to carry his slave out of the State. Under the laws of 1780 and 1788, "persons passing through or sojourning in this State," may retain their slaves for six months; but these laws contain no provision for the removal of such slaves, by any legal process, out of the State, either within the period of six months or after its expiration.

We consider this a subject of great importance, both as regards the character of the State and the rights of slaves who may be brought here by their masters, and we intend to pursue it more at large.

THE "BLACK LAWS OF OHIO."—Several attempts have been made in the Ohio Legislature, at various periods, to effect a repeal of those odious restrictions on the rights of the coloured population of the State. It is satisfactory to find that Governor Bebb, in his message to the legislature, has recommended their repeal. He says: "Let those enactments, very properly, by universal consent, denominated 'the Black Laws of Ohio,' be repealed. They are impolitic, unjust and inhuman; at war with the genius of our free institutions, and the spirit of the age in which we live."

In reference to this subject, a correspondent in Ohio writes as follows:—"Our meeting for sufferings met for the special purpose of taking into consideration the oppressive laws of this State in regard to our coloured population, and if way should open therefor, to petition our legislature for their repeal. The subject was entered upon with much unanimity, and a memorial was prepared to be presented at the approaching session. I hope this measure may not be altogether without effect, as at the present time these laws are awakening considerable attention, more especially in consequence of the maltreatment which J. Randolph's emancipated slaves have so recently received in this State."

We shall rejoice if the hopes of our friends should be realized, but we are not sanguine in our anticipations of such a result. On the contrary, it would not greatly surprise us if the Ohio Legislature should pass, and the Governor approve, laws of a still darker character. We do not know what support may be given to a bill recently introduced into the Senate, but we cannot regard the movement as a favourable indication of an improvement in the moral or religious "spirit of the age."

The first section of the bill provides for the registration of each particular black, mulatto and quadroon in every township in the State.

The second section provides for the expulsion from every township of any coloured visitor from another township, and from the State of any coloured immigrant from any other State.

Sections third, fourth and fifth, direct the public sale of any coloured person who, after having been removed from the township or the State, shall return thereto;—six months for the first offence, and twelve months for the second.

"It ought to have been entitled," says the National Era, "a bill to register and enslave a portion of the people of Ohio. It is introduced by a Senator, not of a slave State, but of Ohio, the most enlightened State of the West; by a Senator, not from some obscure, semi-civilized district, where ignorance might be alleged in palliation of brutality, but from Cincinnati, the boasted Queen City of the West."

"It attempts to restrain the locomotion of eighteen thousand free people of the State; to confine them to the limits of the townships in which they severally reside; to punish them with limited slavery, should they, in pursuit of employment or the means of happiness, in necessary attendance on their business, or in discharge of the duties of parents or children, be found in any other townships than those in which they are registered."

Small as is our confidence in the integrity of politicians, we can scarcely believe that this most monstrous and tyrannical bill will be passed into a law, if the truly religious portion of the people make their voices heard in the legislative hall.

ADDRESS OF THE COMMITTEE OF THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY ON THE DISUSE OF SLAVE PRODUCE.—Under the head of Associated Action, our readers will find the Address to which our friend G. W. Alexander alluded in his letter, published in our last number. We hope it will be inserted in every Anti-Slavery paper in America, and that every "friend to the anti-slavery cause," into whose hands it may come, will examine the subject with an earnest desire to perceive the truth; and to be enabled, through the divine blessing, to fulfil its requisitions. We would by no means inculcate the sentiment, that simply disusing slave produce is all that a faithful testimony against slavery demands of us. But we believe that such disuse on the part of "all who love the freedom of the human race," would not only strengthen them individually, but would so increase the moral power of every other proper effort for the abolition of slavery, that the great result could not but speedily follow. Entertaining this view, we rejoice at every new manifestation of the extension and adoption of this principle. The slaveholders readily comprehend its truth, and in almost every debate in Congress and elsewhere, reproach with inconsistency and hypocrisy those who condemn slavery and yet share its gains.

We desire the attention of the Committee of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery to the fact that large quantities of cotton and tobacco are cultivated in this country by freemen, and that efficient arrangements might be made which would secure the transmission of those articles from the cultivator to the merchant and manufacturer in England, unmixed with such as are grown by slave labour. We feel authorized to say, that the Managers of the Free Produce Association of Friends would gladly co-operate with any parties in England who may desire to enter into such arrangements.

STORE FOR THE SALE OF FREE PRODUCE.—The senior Editors of this paper ask the attention of its readers to the advertisement of our colleague, George W. Taylor, on our last page. The increasing desire throughout many sections of our country to procure the necessaries and conveniences of life, free from the labour of slaves; and a religious concern, on his part, to promote the good work by every means in his power, have induced him to enter into this business. He will most scrupulously investigate the sources of his supplies, and, in this and other respects, will be assisted by the operations of the Free Produce Association of Friends.

Many applications have been received for a supply of groceries and cotton goods to be sold on commission. Without entering into details, we may state that this plan is quite impracticable. If several individuals in a neighbourhood would join in raising such an amount of money as may be convenient to them, they could receive its value in goods at wholesale prices, and divide them in the proportions of the several sums contributed.

Many persons who do not profess a decided religious scruple against using slave produce, yet declare their preference for the productions of free labour, and even a willingness to pay more, if necessary, for them. We hope that such as these will avail themselves of the opportunity now afforded, to gratify their preference. Faithfulness to faint glimmerings may lead to larger openings—a proper use of feeble rays of light may prepare the spiritual eye for greater clearness and strength of vision—and those who have seen "men, as trees, walking," may eventually see "every man clearly."

To another class, who, under various outward disadvantages and difficulties, feel religiously restrained from contributing their support to slavery, we would extend the encouragement which we have gratefully received ourselves in a recent letter from our dear friend Thomas Willis, of Long Island. In reference to a discouraging circumstance, he says: "It has no effect to abate my concern on this subject, [the disuse of slave produce] but rather stimulates to greater faithfulness on my part. I sincerely hope that the apathy, so prevalent in the Society, relative to this branch of our testimony against injustice and cruelty, may in no wise abate the Christian concern and perseverance of those who have associated together for the promotion of this work of righteousness; for such I truly esteem it. And it does appear to me that if our Society have any real testimony to bear against slavery and the slave-trade, the time has arrived that we are called upon to make it manifest—not in word only—but in deed and in truth; so that our example may be consistent with our profession and set the seal thereunto."

PROCEEDINGS IN CONGRESS. The present session of Congress has been marked by proceedings of a deeply interesting character. At its commencement in the 12th month last, there was addressed to it by the President, an elaborate message detailing the state of our public affairs, but especially vindicating our war upon Mexico, and carefully excluding any suggestion of its real motive—that of sustaining a slaveholding preponderance in our confederacy, and of giving extension to the area of slavery. The true purpose of the war was, however, made evident to the world, by the vote of the South at the last session of Congress, on the Wilnot proposition to exclude slavery from any territory which the United States should hereafter acquire by conquest or treaty. That vote shewed it to be the clear intention of the South, to have no settlement of our ostensible differences with Mexico, while the real end of the conflict, that above asserted, was unaccomplished. In no portion of Mexico has slavery at the present time any legal existence, so that for the United States to allow of its introduction into territory to be acquired from that power, would be to create slavery. The Northern mind spontaneously revolts at doing this; and nothing but the strong trammels of party spirit, or a yet meaner reality, will seduce it into the position of bringing upon this nation, the guilt of being instrumental to so vile a prostitution of a yet free soil. South, there is no distinction of party on this question. Whig and democrat coalesce into one great phalanx when the paramount interests of slavery are at hazard. Why should it be different at the North, when the hallowed cause of Freedom and Humanity demands Union? We look with great confidence to such a union, for though the northern democracy profess to justify the war on the official declarations of the administration, they generally express their determination that it shall not be the means of extending slavery. On the 4th ultimo, Preston King of New York introduced into the House a bill which, omitting the preamble, was in the following words:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled: That the sum of thirty thousand dollars be, and the same hereby is appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the President to enter upon negotiations for the restoration of peace with Mexico, whenever it shall be in his power to do so.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in any territory which shall hereafter be acquired by or annexed to the United States, otherwise than in the punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted: Provided, always, that any person escaping into the same from whom labour or service is lawfully claimed in any one of the United States, such fugitive may be lawfully reclaimed and conveyed out of said territory to the person claiming his or her labour or services.

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the sum of two millions of dollars be, and the same is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the President to conclude a treaty of peace with the Republic of Mexico, if the said treaty shall call for the expenditure of the same, or any part thereof; full and accurate accounts for which expenditures shall be by him transmitted to Congress at as early a day as possible."

On the motion to postpone the special order to allow the introduction of this bill, the yeas were 88, the nays 89. The motion was thus lost by only one majority. Of those voting against the postponement were many, it was said, who were decidedly in favour of the restriction on slavery, but preferred some other occasion of declaring it. A subsequent occurrence shows this to have been the fact.

The Washington "Union," an administration paper, expressed its alarm at the above vote in the following terms:

"Signs appeared in the House of Representatives to-day, which bode the renewal of the Missouri contest. We deprecate any such controversy, and every measure which is calculated to produce it. The Democratic party must continue united. This portentous question threatens to shiver them in pieces. The North, and the South, and the West should respect the Union of the States like the holy Ark of the Covenant. But these controversies, by drawing lines and severing interests between different sections on the most delicate question that can be suggested, tend to alienate the feelings and weaken the ties which should bind this holy Union together for ever.

"Is it necessary to force this question upon our public councils, in a period of war, when all our energies should be united against the common enemy? Is it at all necessary at this time? It is an affair of internal regulation among ourselves. It cannot enter into a treaty of peace with a foreign country. If we are to obtain new territory by a treaty of peace, it will then be time enough to meet this difficult question. When Rome was at war she commanded her domestic differences to cease. When peace comes and brings with it new territory, then, amid the tranquillity of peace, we may settle this matter to our own satisfaction."

The New York "Tribune" thus commented on the above:—

"This talk about the sacredness of the Union, from a journal which advocated the annexation of Texas, and which never sticks at any outrage upon the Constitution that promises to give additional security and strength to slavery, is decidedly rich. It all means, of course, that the Free States should so venerate the Union as to let the South trample the Constitution under her feet whenever it suits her purposes to do so. We hope the day of Northern subservency and degradation is passing away."

The New York "Evening Post," a democratic paper, in an editorial reference to the speech of Preston King, said:—

"There is but one way of settling the question which the people will tolerate. The new acquisition of territory must be exempt from the curse of slavery, and open to the emigration of free labourers from the North and West. It will be the wisdom of the South to consent to this arrangement early, as we believe most of the southern members had made up their minds to do at the last session. The determination to insist upon the exclusion of slavery from the domain we may yet acquire, is far more earnest and firm than superficial politicians at Washington are aware of."

Enacting the above vote was an effort on the part of the South to obtain inferentially an extension of the Missouri compromise into the new territories which it is expected will be added to the United States, and thus to allow of slavery South of that line. This intended coup de main was a total failure, as the following proceedings will show!

"Friday, January 15. When the bill to establish a Territorial Government in Oregon was about to be voted on finally by the House of Representatives, Mr. Burt moved to amend the twelfth section, in the seventh line, by adding, between the word "and" and the word "shall," the words: "inasmuch as the whole of said Territory lies north of thirty-six degrees thirty minutes north latitude, known as the line of the Missouri compromise."

The vote on this amendment was—Yeas 83, all except 6 being from the slave states; Nays 113, all from the free states.

FAMINE IN IRELAND.—The starving condition of a large portion of the population of Ireland has, for a few weeks past, been generally known in this country, and successful measures have been adopted, in various places, to raise contributions in money and provisions for their relief. The collections in New York and Philadelphia are forwarded to a committee of Friends in Dublin; all parties having full confidence that the trust reposed in its members will be faithfully and impartially executed.

The London Treasurer for the contributions of Friends in England had already received, at the last date, upwards of £22,000; some persons who are not members of our religious society, having also become donors to this fund. Our friend William Forster has felt it his duty to go over to Ireland and visit the most suffering and remote districts, to ascertain the best mode of applying the funds collected, prepare suitable channels for distribution and assist in the formation of soup establishments. We have received an interesting but very painful account of his first week's progress, written by his companion. On the 26th of 12th month last, he was in the north west county, Mayo, and intended to proceed southward through the most desolate and isolated portions of the island. In our land of abundance, it is difficult to conceive the utter destitution which exists in that country. In some districts, two-thirds or three-fourths of the inhabitants had neither food nor the means of obtaining it, and in one neighbourhood, visited by some Friends of Cork, the condition of the people came up to the most horrible descriptions of famine on record. These dreadful sufferings, at the very beginning of winter, threaten a most awful and alarming state of things before another crop can be available.

The present duty is to rescue the famishing thousands from a miserable death. To aid in this work, contributions, in money, are received by Thomas P. Cope, and, in provisions, by Henry and Alfred Cope, Walnut street wharf, Philadelphia.

The potato disease—to which, principally, the famine in Ireland is attributed—has also caused great suffering in other parts of Europe. "The state of the Highlands and Islands of Scotland," says the editor of the London Friend, "is represented as rivalling that of Ireland."

UNION LITERARY INSTITUTION.—We commend the letter and circular relating to this establishment, and which appear in the department of Communications, to the notice of our benevolent readers. The education of the coloured race is all-important to its elevation, and this is so well appreciated by the friends of that people, that we need not add any thing to the cogent motives which are presented in the circular, to incite in their minds a liberal feeling towards the object of the enterprise.

We shall gladly receive, and duly forward, any contributions which may be entrusted to us for transmission in aid of that object.

"THE NATIONAL ERA."—We hail with no ordinary satisfaction the appearance of this new paper, published at the seat of the Federal Government. Judging from the three first numbers, it promises to be an able advocate of the cause of equal liberty and equal rights. Indeed, from the known character of its conductors, we have a right to expect a dignified and energetic paper;—calm, argumentative, truthful, liberal, charitable, and faithful. We would say to the editors in the language of Holy Writ, "Be ye wise as serpents, and harmless as doves." "Reprove, rebuke, exhort with all long-suffering and doctrine." "Be gentle unto all men, apt to teach, patient, in meekness instructing those that oppose themselves;" observing "sound speech, that cannot be condemned; that he that is of the contrary part may be ashamed, having no evil thing to say of you."

SELECTIONS.

THE HEROISM OF PHILANTHROPY.

In a letter of the Bey of Tunis to the British consul at Mahu, announcing that, "for the glory of God, and to distinguish man from the brute creation," he had decreed the abolition of human slavery in his dominions, honourable mention is made of "the most excellent Richardson."

The gentleman here alluded to, James Richardson, has recently returned from one of the most perilous expeditions ever undertaken for the welfare of humanity. For the purpose of ascertaining from personal observation the actual features and extent of the slave trade carried on between the Great Desert and Tripoli, he followed the route of the slave caravans towards Central Africa, visiting all the principal cities of the continent north of the Mountains of the Moon; the old and famous marts of Mourzouk, and Soudan, and Ahmeur; passing through the midst of the unscrupulous and keenly-intelligent slave merchants of the great oasis of Fezzan; the wild, warlike, but handsome, light-skinned Touaregs; the cruel, licentious, and mercenary Tibboos of the Libyan desert; and the cowardly and treacherous men-stealers of Bornou, on the southern rim of the Sahara—a route of more than 2,500 miles. Apart from fatigue, privation, and suffering from want of suitable food and water, in that terrible climate, he incurred a frightful risk, from the circumstance of his errand as an abolitionist being known to the slave-traders. Conversing, as he found opportunity, with slave-dealers and slaves, visiting the great markets where the slaves taken in the wars of the Sultan of Zindie were brought together, in waiting for the Moorish merchants of Tripoli, and travelling for weeks with the returning caravans, he has obtained a vast amount of valuable information, which it is to be hoped, will be turned to the service of humanity. At the great and flourishing city of Kanon he saw slaves of the Fula country brought in by the robber soldiery. They were a fine looking race of men, with beautiful, regular features, and as white as the Portuguese or Spanish. These white slaves sell for enormous prices; and one traveller thinks that wars are instigated by the Moors for the purpose of securing so superior a class. The following are some of the facts which he has laid before the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society:

"1st. That the slave-trade is on the increase in the Great Desert.

"2d. That slaves were flogged to death en route from Ghat to Tripoli, and others were over driven or starved to death.

"3d. That the youngest female children are violated by their brutal captors or masters on the route from Bornou to Ghat and Fezzan by the Tibboos.

"4th. That slave children of five years of age walk more than one thousand and thirty days over the Great Desert, and through other districts of Africa, before they reach the slave market of Tripoli, to be sold.

"5th. That three-fourths of the slave traffic of Central Africa and the Great Desert is supported by the money and goods of European merchants resident in Tunis, Tripoli, Algiers and Egypt.

"6th. That a considerable traffic in slaves is carried on in the southern provinces of Algeria, under French protection, by the Shonif and Shambat Arabs.

"7th. That, at present, there are no wars in Central Africa, but those undertaken exclusively for the capture of slaves. To these I add other two facts or statements.

"8th. That slaves are the grand staple commerce of the Soudan and Bornou caravans, and without slaves this commerce would hardly exist, at least without a great exchange in African commerce.

"9th. That the trade of Tripoli, at the present time, entirely depends on slaves, other commerce being neglected or abandoned."

The London Anti-Slavery Reporter for the 10th month last, contains several extracts from the journal kept from day to day by James Richardson, while travelling with the Tripoli caravans across the Desert. The details are almost too revolting for publication. He was compelled to be a silent witness of the murder of young females under the lash, and of the brutal flogging of children five years of age, for picking up herbage and chewing it, to assuage the horrible thirst of their desert march under the burning sky. One wretch of a slave-dealer, Haj Esrousee, a man of Lockna, is described as a fiend incarnate. He was born for a slave-driver, with a cunning ferocity and sensuality stamped on his countenance, all that can be conceived of loathsome lust and beastly obscenity, and cowardly inhumanity, seems to have been embodied in this unmitigated monster. Nothing but the long exercise of irresponsible power over human beings could have so imbruted and hardened one born of woman, and claiming to be a man.

After leaving the oasis of Fezzan, on the route of Tripoli, the caravan, which had left its track of blood for a thousand miles across the desert, was swept over by the Ghibles, or terrible hot wind of the south. The weary and wretched negroes sank under this new affliction. They seemed literally to wither and shrivel beneath it. The stern Arab drivers resolutely set their thin leather faces against the furnace-blast, urging on the miserable slaves with blows and execrations. Haj Esrousee distinguished himself on this dreadful day by his active ferocity, dismounting from his camel, chasing the lagging slave, flogging unmercifully all who were sick and weak. At length, the horrible tempest of heat became insupportable. The melancholy cavalcade halted under the lurid sky, crouching behind the camels and sand hills, the groans of suffering women and children mingling with the curses of the drivers.

"Heaven and earth," says Richardson, "seemed to conspire against the unhappy slaves. It was an awful moment—one of those seasons when the sinking mind might exclaim, 'Where is God? Has He abandoned His creatures?'"

The description which the traveller gives of the arrival of the caravan at the sea coast near Tripoli, is graphic and descriptive:

"When within two days of Tripoli, after a sultry day, we had a cold sand storm, for we were among the sand hills of the coast. The sand filled our eyes, ears, and nostrils; the air was darkened, and we were obliged to grope our way. Here, again, the whip alone could keep the wretched slaves on their legs. We encamped at noon, under the protection of a high cliff by the sea shore, which sheltered us from the savage gale, sweeping the bare bosom of the desert above. But here the slaves first saw the sea—the white surf chafing and roaring at their feet. And their first sight of this new element, in its wildest form, will be hereafter in memory associated with their most aggravated sufferings in journeying over the Great Desert. I could not help watching the countenances of these miserable victims of mercantile speculation, who, from the fair banks of the Niger, its sweet waters and pellucid streams, had been forced away, to gaze at the wide and boundless sea, now lashed by the tempest into mountainous heaps. Some gazed at it with most stupid indifference; others laughed and grinned; others looked blank horror; and others hid their faces, after gazing a moment, under their tattered clothes. All seemed to say, 'How and what is this? Surely the devils of the white men inhabit these waters!'"

Personally, the noble-hearted Englishman could render the poor slaves with whom he travelled no assistance, beyond allowing the weakest to ride upon his camel, while he walked over the desert. This was his daily practice. Occasionally, he shared with them his food and water. The poor creatures were sadly puzzled to know why a Kafir, or infidel, as the Moors called him, was so kind to them.

At the slave market of Ghat, he found that the traders professed to be conscientiously opposed to making slaves, looking upon those who did so with as much abhorrence as an American slave trader does upon those engaged in the foreign traffic. Yet, their whole business was in buying slaves whom the less conscientious Touaregs of Tibboo had stolen.

We hope the entire journal of this heroic philanthropist will be published. He deserves the highest commendation for his disinterested and noble efforts. He belongs to that new and glorious band of Christian knight-errants—the chivalry of humanity—who, in generous endeavours to ameliorate the condition of their fellow-men, have associated with their names that romance of personal peril and intrepid adventure, which has been too long monopolised by those who have added to the afflictions of our race, and stained our common inheritance with the blood of brethren.—National Era. J. G. W.

A NEW VIEW OF WEST INDIA EMANCIPATION.

It may be useful to inquire, what have been the doings of the emancipated negroes in the West Indies? In connection with a return lately furnished to the British Government, as to the number of emancipated negroes who have become freeholders, &c., in British Guiana, is appended a list of estates which they have purchased either in partnership or association. From this list we extract the following instances:—

Perseverance Estate.—Four hundred and seventy acres, purchased by sixty-three labourers in association, for 5000 dollars; and two hundred and fifty acres, purchased by one hundred and nine labourers, for 1,715 dollars, in the same manner.

Littlefield Estate.—Five hundred acres, purchased by twelve labourers, in partnership, for 9,000 dollars.

Lovely Lass Estate.—Five hundred acres, bought for 1,715 dollars, by fourteen labourers in association.

North Brook Estate.—Five hundred acres, purchased by eighty-four labourers in partnership, for 10,000 dollars.

These are only examples from a list extending over five large foolscap sheets of paper. From the facts gathered from them, we see no cause to doubt the wisdom of these enfranchised blacks. They have even set an example to the working classes of the whites. In a country where little labour is required for the sustenance of life, they appear determined to discontinue the oppressive system of overworking hired labour. This they effect by becoming freeholders through co-operation, in association, in partnership. In all this there is no lack of wisdom.

INTELLIGENCE.

REPORT OF THE POST MASTER GENERAL. RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES.

Accompanying the report of the Postmaster General, are several tables of statistics connected with the Department. But one table is not given: that of receipts in each of the states. This is the more remarkable, as the expenditures in each state are specified, and hitherto it has been the practice to report the receipts. As it is, no correct idea of the working of cheap postage in the several states can be formed. There can be no doubt that the experiment has worked far better in the non-slaveholding than slaveholding states. It is well known that there has been an annual deficit in the receipts of the Department in the latter of some half million of dollars, which has been made up by the surplus revenue in the former; and this fact has been often pointed out as one striking illustration of the injurious operation of slavery on the general welfare. Was it in view of this, that the important table alluded to was this year omitted?

But there is another table which may be examined with some profit: that of expenditures for mail service in the states severally. From it we compile the following statement, showing the total annual transportation in each state, with the aggregate cost in each; also, the total annual transportation in the slaveholding and non-slaveholding sections of the Union, with the aggregate cost per mile, in each:

	Total annual transportation, miles.	Total annual cost of cost, dollars.
Maine	1,114,422	40,791
New Hampshire	705,348	26,409
Vermont	727,724	26,723
Massachusetts	1,910,810	105,898
Rhode Island	158,394	9,102
Connecticut	732,008	43,863
New York	4,944,499	237,918
New Jersey	733,841	58,850
Pennsylvania	2,864,432	155,304
Delaware	150,914	7,887
Maryland	923,000	133,069
Virginia	2,420,549	193,586
North Carolina	1,586,748	172,557
South Carolina	1,017,088	117,959
Georgia	1,228,622	150,162
Florida	348,061	44,909
Ohio	3,098,412	166,954
Michigan	830,152	48,288
Indiana	1,212,576	68,875
Illinois	1,884,534	125,291
Wisconsin	302,104	15,891
Iowa	74,408	8,658
Missouri	1,477,008	68,259
Kentucky	2,282,188	125,850
Tennessee	1,326,368	91,160
Alabama	1,456,324	227,412
Mississippi	831,272	95,109
Arkansas	590,668	56,264
Louisiana	365,960	42,670
Total	37,498,414	2,665,078

	Total transportation.	Total cost.	Cost per mile.
Free States	21,393,364	$1,137,565	5.3 cts.
Slave states	16,004,850	1,527,513	9.5 "

Were the cost per mile the same in the free as in the slave states, the total cost of mail service in them annually would be more than two millions, or nearly twice as much as it is now.

There is and can be no economy where slavery exists.—National Era.

ANTI-SLAVERY MOVEMENT IN DELAWARE.

There is quite an extensive and powerful sentiment awakened against the continuance of slavery in Delaware. A Wilmington paper says that petitions are in circulation recommending the Legislature to abolish slavery on fair and equitable terms. The paper very quietly adds: "We have heretofore said that no other measure would conduce so much to the prosperity of little Delaware. A tide of emigration would set in here, to buy up and improve our old and worn-out lands, and the million acres supposed to be capitalised in Delaware would be worth more than five millions of dollars more as soon as such a law is passed. Our interests require it. There are only about 2,000 slaves in Delaware."

SOUTHERN EXPORTS.

Statement of the exports of the principal staples of the South, for the last ten years, as follows:

	Aggregate of exports in each year.
During the year ending—
Sep. 30, 1836.—Cotton*	$71,384,925
Tobacco†	10,494,104
Rice	2,548,750
Naval stores	912,376
Indigo	1,020
	$85,241,175
Sep. 30, 1837.—Cotton	63,340,162
Tobacco	6,223,438
Rice	2,509,279
Naval stores	823,419
Indigo	—
	72,396,238
Sep. 30, 1838.—Cotton	61,556,811
Tobacco	7,969,449
Rice	1,731,819
Naval stores	703,394
Indigo	50
	71,231,533
Sep. 30, 1839.—Cotton	61,238,932
Tobacco	10,449,153
Rice	2,460,198
Naval stores	668,890
Indigo	—
	74,837,133
Sep. 30, 1840.—Cotton	63,870,367
Tobacco	10,699,628
Rice	1,942,076
Naval stores	602,529
Indigo	209
	77,112,749
Sep. 30, 1841.—Cotton	54,330,341
Tobacco	13,479,547
Rice	2,010,167
Naval stores	684,514
Indigo	—
	70,504,509
Sep. 30, 1842.—Cotton	47,593,464
Tobacco	10,066,245
Rice	1,907,357
Naval stores	743,329
Indigo	1,043
	60,311,467

*Unmanufactured cotton.

† Both manufactured and unmanufactured tobacco.

‡ Turpentine, pitch, resin, and tar.

During the nine months ending—
June 30, 1843.—Cotton	49,119,806
Tobacco	4,929,298
Rice	1,825,726
Naval stores	475,357
Indigo	198
	56,150,385

During the year ending—
June 30, 1844.—Cotton	54,063,501
Tobacco	8,935,853
Rice	2,182,468
Naval stores	818,962
Indigo	1,176
	65,999,692

June 30, 1845.—Cotton	51,739,643
Tobacco	8,008,317
Rice	2,169,456
Naval stores	814,969
Indigo	70
	62,723,455

Exports in 1836	85,241,175
Exports in 1845	62,723,455
Decrease in value	22,517,720
June 30, 1846.—Cotton	$42,767,341
Tobacco	9,174,184
Rice	2,564,991
Naval stores	1,085,712
Indigo	20
	55,592,308

Rep. of Com. of Patents for 1845, pp. 1124 to 1142.

It will be remarked that the export of tobacco has been continually varying, being sometimes greater, sometimes less. The export of rice has been more uniform. The chief falling off has been in the value of cotton, which has been steadily decreasing ever since 1836, until it has sunk from seventy-one millions in that year, to forty-two millions in 1846.

In 1840, the population of the Southern states was 7,255,746, so that the value of these exports per head was $10.62; while in 1845, the population was estimated at 8,229,000, so that the value of the exports per head in 1846 was little more than $6.

The principal falling off, as we have seen, is in the value of the cotton export. This, it should be remembered, arises, not from a decrease of growth, but a reduction of price; for the growth, and the amount exported, have vastly increased.

Since 1836, the value of exports from this country has been fluctuating. In that year it was, in round numbers, $128,000,000; in 1840, $132,000,000; in 1841 it had fallen to $104,000,000, but in 1846 it rose again to $114,000,000. Generally it may be said that while the value of exports of these Southern staples has decreased, that of exports of the staples of other parts of the country has increased. Thus, while the diminution of the former from 1836 to 1845 was twenty-three millions of dollars, the decrease in the total value of all exports was but fourteen millions, so that there must have been an increase of nine millions in the value of other exports.

These facts are not to be disregarded by southern men. Why should they be so anxious to acquire additional territory for slavery? The decrease in the total value of their staples does not result from under, but over production. Would they raise more cotton on their new territory? The market is already glutted. It is not territory they want, but free labour and diversified industry.

The following pithy comment upon these facts is extracted from the letter of a correspondent:

"It appears important that the fact of the great decline in the value of southern staple articles should be known and weighed by all merchants and jobbers, as well as by all anti-slavery men. Calhoun, in his letter to King, a few years ago, insisted that the fact of the falling off of West India exports was proof that emancipation was a failure, &c. By a parity of reason, the falling off of slave-grown exports is equal proof of the unprofitableness of slaveholding, and of its decline."—National Era.

POETRY.

From the National Era.

A DREAM OF SUMMER.

BY J. C. WHITTIER.

Bland as the morning breath of June
The southwest breezes play;
And, through its haze, the winter noon
Seems warm as summer's day.
The snow-plumed Angel of the North
Has dropped his icy spear;
Again the mossy earth looks forth,
Again the streams gush clear.

The fox his hill-side cell forsakes,
The muskrat leaves his nook,
The bluebird in the meadow brakes
Is singing with the brook.
"Bear up, oh Mother Nature!" cry
Bird, breeze, and streamlet free,
"Our winter voices prophecy
Of summer days to thee!"

So, in those winters of the soul,
By bitter blasts and drear
O'er swept from Memory's frozen pole,
Will sunny days appear.
Reviving Hope and Faith, they show
The soul its living powers,
And how beneath the winter's snow
Lie germs of summer flowers!

The Night is Mother of the Day,
The Winter of the Spring,
Ever upon old Decay
The greenest mosses cling.
Behind the cloud the star-light lurks,
Through showers the sunbeams fall;
For God, who loveth all His works,
Has left His Hope with all!

In the following brief prayer, the wants of the humble Christian are condensed in a manner worthy of Quaker or Herbert:

PRAYER.

BY THOMAS ELWOOD, A QUAKER OF 1690.

Oh! that mine eyes might closed be
To what concerns me not to see—
That deafness might possess mine ear
To what concerns me not to hear;
That truth my tongue might always tie
From ever speaking foolishly;
That no vain thought might ever rest
Or be conceived in my breast;
That by each word and deed and thought,
Glory may to my God be brought!
But what are wishes? Lord, mine eye
On Thee is fixed, to Thee I cry—
Wash, Lord, and purify my heart,
And make it clean in every part;
And when 'tis clean, Lord, keep it too!
For that is more than I can do.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Free Produce Store, Wholesale and Retail.

N. W. corner Fifth and Cherry Streets.

(Late Joel Fisher's.)

THE subscriber having procured a new stock of Dry Goods and Groceries, in addition to that purchased of Joel Fisher, all of which may be relied on as the product of Free Labour, now offers them for sale at the above place. He respectfully invites the patronage of those who give a preference to such goods, and of his friends and the public generally. Being the wholesale and retail agent of the Free Produce Association of Friends, and the retail agent of the American Free Produce Association, for the sale of the cotton goods manufactured by those associations, he will be prepared to furnish a greater variety of dry goods than has heretofore been offered at this establishment.

GEORGE W. TAYLOR.

Philadelphia, 1st of 2d mo., 1837.

THE NON-SLAVERHOLDER

Is published on the first of each month, at one dollar per annum for one copy, or five dollars per annum for six copies, and at the same rate for a greater number, payable in advance. Abraham L. Pennock, Samuel Rhoads, and George W. Taylor, are the Editors and Publishers; either of whom will receive subscriptions, payments, and communications. Letters and papers addressed to them, or endorsed Non-Slaverholder, directed to box 777, Philadelphia Post Office, will duly reach them.

PRINTED AT

Morrihow & Thompson's Book & Job Office
No. 7 Carter's Alley.

THE NON-SLAVERHOLDER.

"Whoso gives the motive, makes his brother's sin his own."

VOL. II.]

PHILADELPHIA, THIRD MONTH, 1837.

[NO. 3.]

COMMUNICATIONS.

For the Non-Slaverholder.

BIBLICAL INVESTIGATIONS—NO. II.

David, Job and Shimei.

It has pleased the Divine Being to graduate his laws for the government of men to the degree of their capacity for receiving a knowledge of his will, and of their disposition to carry out that will into practice. God is eternally the same, and with him absolute right is unalterable: yet from the time when Adam fell by placing himself in opposition to God's will, and stamped on his progeny the consequences of that terrific defection, four thousand years had to elapse, and, with it, myriads of human beings had to be born and to die, ere the world was fitted to hear the anthem of "Peace on earth," and to receive the doctrine of "life and immortality, brought to light through the gospel." During this period as much light and as perfect a law were given to men as were accordant with their state, but as men were not in the position the most agreeable to the Divine mind, so were the laws and so was the light which God bestowed upon them. We are not therefore to look back to the law of Moses, or to any other law antecedent to the coming of Christ, or to the persons living under them, for a full exemplification of the Divine will. Still we are to regard the history of God's dealings with man, contained in the ancient scriptures, as an invaluable legacy "given by inspiration of God, and profitable," in the light of christianity, "for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness; that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works." We so approach them.

In perusing the history of David, as contained in these records, we are deeply admonished that the most favoured of God's people may fall through unwatchfulness, and are also exemplified that any so falling, should by deep penitence and submission to God's chastisements seek to be restored to his favour. But, above all David's errors, grievous as they were, his love to his Divine Lord, his confidence in His boundless power, his recognition of His supreme authority, his devotion to His holy cause are so predominant, and his prophetic foreshadowing of Messiah's coming so remarkable, that we expect to find, in the closing moments of his life, some near approach of his mind to the Christian temperament in which Love and Forgiveness abound.

Our English version, in narrating the last words of this great king to his son and successor, disappoints our expectation in this respect. Very impressive indeed is the language of David when he thus addresses his son:—"I go the way of all the earth: be thou strong, therefore, and show thyself a man; and keep the charge of the Lord thy God, to walk in his ways, to keep his statutes, and his commandments, and his judgments, and his testimonies, as it is written in the law of Moses; that thou mayest prosper in all that thou doest, and whithersoever thou turnest thyself; That the Lord may continue his word which he spake concerning me, saying, If thy children take heed to their way, to walk before me in truth, with all their heart, and with all their soul, there shall not fail thee a man, said he, on the throne of Israel." But how unsuited to this solemn occasion is the seeming direction to his son, following this pathetic exhortation, to take the lives of Joab and Shimei, as if vengeance was the last sentiment of his heart!

I am happy to believe that our version of this matter is a libel on the character of the dying king, and in great derogation of that magnanimity which, a true rendering will show, led him to desire that, so far as was consistent with the safety of his son's government, protection, and not death, should be extended to the persons whose wrong doings he rehearsed and deprecated.

That the past course of both Joab and Shimei, though with many instances of fidelity on the part of the former, had been such as made it proper to call the attention of the new sovereign to a consideration of it, and to invoke his wisdom for the adoption of such guards as would defend him against the turbulent and insubordinate disposition it too surely indicated, is obvious. Still his wisdom was not invoked for the punishment of acts, however heinous, which David had himself passed over, or forgiven, and with the perpetrators of which he had subsequently stood in friendly and confidential relations.

In reading the fifth and sixth verses of the second chapter of 1st Kings, so opposite are the connections in which the translators, by misrendering a verb, have placed the words "in peace," that it escapes the attention of most readers that these words do actually occur in each verse. When they come to know that they equally represent the same Hebrew term shalom,* they quickly suspect that the same sense attaches to each occasion of their occurrence. Now the word peace is evidently used in the first instance to designate a social state or condition the exact counterpart of war; a state of civil peace, and not simply a state of personal quietude. The words in peace are therefore to be regarded in this instance as technically equivalent to the expression in time of peace.

It is true that David was not at peace in his external relations, when either of the murderous acts of Joab was committed; still his internal government was firmly and peacefully established, and the persons on whom Joab had perpetrated his act of war, instead of being enemies, which they once were, had given in their adhesion to David's government, and now stood in the most peaceful relations to it: and thus Joab was correctly represented as shedding "the blood of war in peace," or according to the French version,† as "having shed during the peace the blood that our swords in time of war."

If this be a correct exposition of the sense of the words "in peace" in the one case, why should it not be in the other? In the degree that David reprobated the shedding of the blood of war in time of peace by Joab, would he desire to guard his son against any imitation of it.

Without insisting on this identity of meaning, which the context leads to, I shall proceed to

* In the system of pronunciation which will be followed in these essays, there are five textual vowels and one supplied one. Of the former, a, aleph, has the sound of a in fate; h, he, of e in mete; u, vau, of u in true; i, yod, of i in pine; and o, oin, of o in cone; excepting that i between two vowels has the consonant sound of n, and o before a vowel that of y. The Greek z, is the supplied vowel, and is uttered quickly, as e in met. The textual vowels are pronounced full and strong, and do not run into diphthongs.

† "ayant répandu durant la paix le sang qu'on répand en temps de guerre." Martin's translation. So also Ostervald's, and substantially so the Catholic version.

show that whatever was the sense in which the words in the second instance were used, it was the intention of David to prohibit in that sense the taking of Joab's life. To assume that, out of that sense, it was a direction for taking it, is a presumption in which we have no right to indulge.

Let us then see what is directed to be done or avoided in the sixth verse. The verb which the translators have improperly rendered "let—go down," is found in the Hebrew word shal, shal, where it stands in the second person singular future of the conjugation Hiphil, the sh, yod, characteristic of Hiphil being dropped, as is frequently done in that conjugation. The verb is derived from its root sh, shel, in Kal, where it means simply to descend or go down, and has no transitive action whatever. Much less could we expect such an action in its passive Niphil. In Hiphil it signifies to bring down and in Hophal to be brought down. It being in the second person we are especially compelled, in order to give it a bearing on a third, to assign to it the Hiphil signification. I shall therefore follow the example of the translators in verse ninth, in considering the word to mean thou wilt bring down—the direction being converted into a prohibition by a preceding negative. The particle u, vau, first rendered in our received version, therefore, and in the next place and, is better expressed, in view of the connection, by now, and yet. The word shibbo, shibbo, rendered his hoar head, is also better translated his gray hairs, which is the customary rendering. Gray hairs have from all time been considered to claim sympathy, deference and protection, and it was probably in allusion to this circumstance that David adverted both to Joab and Shimei's gray hairs. It is difficult to assign any other reason for his doing so.

With these amendments, and without stopping to inquire into the exact definition of the noun shal, shal, translated grave, the following construction of the verse will ensue:

Now do according to thy wisdom, yet bring not down his gray hairs, in peace, unto the grave.

This construction will require that vau at the commencement of the seventh verse should be rendered and instead of but.

The term shal, shal, above adverted to, is never used, so far as I have been able to discover, in describing a peaceful descent into the grave. The local grave, always associated with this agreeable sentiment, is expressed by the word qabar, qabar, of which we have examples in 2d Kings xxix. 20 and 2d Chronicles xxiv. 28. Had the version of the translators been the true one, the grave should have found its counterpart in this word. When David rested with his fathers, and was buried in the city of David qabar, qabar, is the verb which denotes his sepulture. The word shal, shal, or hwal, hwal, is rendered Hades in the Greek, and in the Doway Bible Hell, meaning the place or state of the dead, as it was in the earlier English versions. In our own version it retains this rendering in several instances. It has its root in a verb which signifies to ask, interrogate or crave; and its sense is defined to be "the invisible state of the dead"—"the place and state of those who are out of the way and to be sought for." With a descent into it is always connected some sentiment of sadness, distress or terror. Examples of this occur in Genesis xxvii. 35, xlii. 38, and xliii. 31.

I had fully arrived at the conclusion that a just rendering of the ninth verse was an inhibition, also, to the taking of the life of Shimei, when on recurring to Parkhurst for further authority in the case, I had the great gratification to find myself anticipated in this opinion by that distinguished linguist.

In his lexicon, page 167, he gives among other senses of the particle u, vau, the following, which is the 16th of the series.

"16. After a negative or prohibitive particle, And not, nor, neither. Exod. xx. 4, 17. Num. xxi. 14. Lev. xix. 12. Deut. xxxiii. 6. Prov. xxx. 3, and al. freq."

To this definition he subjoins the annexed remarks, the pronunciation of the Hebrew words and names of the letters being of my insertion.

"This very common use of the particle u, vau, clears the sense of shal, shal, 1st Kings ii. 9. Let the reader attentively consider in the original Hebrew the eighth and ninth verses; and he will clearly perceive that the middle of the ninth, from u, ki, to u, he, inclusively, must be understood parenthetically: And now when u, al tanqen, do not hold him (Shimei) guiltless (for thou art a wise man, and knowest what thou shouldst do unto him,) u, shal, neither bring down his gray hairs with blood to the grave: i. e. plainly, for his past offences against David. Accordingly Solomon held him not guiltless, by confining him to Jerusalem, under pain of death, and when he violated this condition, to which he himself had expressly assented and sworn, Solomon, for this fresh offence, as a wise man, caused him to die; and so Jehovah eventually turned Shimei's wickedness against David on his own head. See ver. 35—46; and compare in the Hebrew, Deut. vii. 25; 2 Sam. i. 21; Ps. xxvi. 9; Prov. vi. 4; Ps. cxliii. 7; but especially Deut. xxxiii. 6, where the u, vau, prefixed to the verb u, yei, signifies and not, neither, referring to the preceding u, al, just as in 1 Kings ii. 9; and this interpretation fully explains the text, and acquits David of the charge of cruelty and treachery in his conduct towards Shimei."

I now present in connection, the several verses from the fifth to the tenth inclusive of the second chapter of 1st Kings, according to my views of the true rendering sustained by the above remarks.

5. And also thou knowest what Joab the son of Zeruiah did to me, and what he did to the two captains of the host of Israel, to Abner the son of Ner, and to Amasa the son of Jether, whom he slew, and shed the blood of war in (time of) peace, and put the blood of war upon his girdle that was about his loins, and upon his shoes that were on his feet.

6. Now do according to thy wisdom, yet bring not down his gray hairs in (time of) peace, unto the grave.

7. And to the sons of Barzilai the Gileadite, show abundant kindness, and let them be of those that eat at thy table for so they came to me when I fled because of Absalom thy brother.

8. And behold there is with thee Shimei the son of Gera, a Benjamite of Bahurim, which cursed me with a mighty curse in the day when I went to Mahanaim: but he came down to meet me at Jordan, and I swore to him by the Lord, saying, I will not put thee to death with the sword.

9. And now, do not hold him guiltless, (for thou art a wise man and knowest what thou shouldst do unto him,) neither bring down his gray hairs with blood unto the grave.

10. So David slept with his fathers, and was buried in the city of David.

ALEPH.

To the Editors of the Non-Slaveholder.

The more I examine the Christian religion and the laws of my being, and compare them with the popular notions of War and Slavery, the more clearly is it demonstrated to my mind, that these practices are anti-Christian, and subversive of man's true happiness. The Christian religion is emphatically a religion of love; peculiarly adapted to our wants and condition, and the only principle that is capable of conferring upon us, or bringing us into, a perfect state of happiness. It is to me a matter of surprise, how any who profess to be qualified by the Spirit and power of God, to be teachers of the blessed and holy doctrines of the new dispensation, as revealed by Jesus Christ, and set forth in the New Testament, can so readily appeal to the Old for a justification of the above practices. They profess to believe that the New was designed to supersede the Old, and is in every respect superior to it. How would it be possible for them, if they were sincere in this belief and faithful to live in accordance with it, to go to the Mosaic dispensation for a justification of any practices that are prohibited by the Christian. "Ye shall know them by their fruits. Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles?—A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit." These sayings of Christ are perfectly agreeable to every day's observation. We all know that a good man cannot do a bad act, neither can a wicked man do a good act; therefore by their fruits they shall be known. I hold it to be an incontrovertible truth, that it is utterly impossible for a follower of Christ to kill, enslave, or designally and maliciously injure a fellow being. A true disciple must be influenced by the spirit of love, which, from its nature, must of necessity govern and regulate every passion within us of an opposite kind. It is perfectly preposterous for any of us to call ourselves Christians, and claim a Christian's reward, whilst living in opposition to the heavenly and benign influences of the doctrines of the Christian religion.

I have no confidence in a man's profession, unless his life be in accordance with it. How much more honourable and consistent would it be, in those who approve war and slavery, at once to say, "We have not faith to believe that the doctrines of the Christian religion, as inculcated by Jesus Christ, are adapted to man's wants and conditions. Those of the Mosaic dispensation appear to be more in harmony with the laws of our being."

I propose calling the attention of the Society of Friends, particularly, to the consideration of the subjects of war and slavery. Friends profess to bear a testimony against these anti-Christian practices; believing them to be contrary to God's law and spirit of love, as revealed through his Son Jesus Christ, and also to man's experience of what constitutes his true happiness. I observe that, in their Book of Discipline, they request their members to avoid giving any encouragement to war. They also advise and exhort them to be no ways accessory to the enormous national evil of the slave-trade; and they earnestly recommend to the Meeting for Sufferings to embrace every suitable opportunity for advancing their testimony in this respect, and for calling the attention of the public mind to this awfully interesting subject. They also prohibit their members from hiring slaves to their masters, to labour for them. My object is to draw their attention to a daily warfare which is carried on in the most shocking and revolting manner, that it is possible to conceive of, by one portion of the human family, against another, not for an alleged crime, but simply for the unhallowed purpose of pecuniary gain, and administering to the lusts of the flesh, and the pride of life. It appears to me that this species of warfare, from the capturing of the negro in Africa and conveying him to other climes, with the sufferings and death attendant thereupon, to the outrages against his inalienable rights during the whole period of his existence, is as much at variance with the Christian religion, as truth is with error. How it is that Friends have not felt it their duty to discourage this species of war, in every possible manner, is to me a mystery. Perhaps I may be answered, they have done so in discouraging the slave-trade, and the system of slavery. This brings us to the consideration and examination of their life and conduct, to ascertain how far they are in accordance with their discipline in reference to those subjects. In the first place, they advise and exhort their members not to be accessory to the slave-trade in any manner, nor to encourage their fellow men to hold others in a state of involuntary servitude, by hiring those thus enslaved. I hope Friends will carefully and prayerfully examine the propositions I am about bringing to their view; that the consumers of the products of slave labour, are the essential supporters of the system of slavery, and are accessory to the slave-trade. Also that they are encouraging a daily warfare, that is as anti-Christian as any other war. It is an undoubted truth, that every man, in his profession or calling, is sustained and encouraged to continue in it, in consequence of the demand for his services, or the productions of his labour. Withdraw this demand, and he will of necessity change his occupation. Upon the same principle, if you do away with the demand for the productions of slave labour, you do away with the system of slavery, the slave-trade and the war that is necessary to enforce them; inasmuch as the demand for such productions stimulates to these practices, with all of their concomitant train of evils. I am utterly at a loss to see how Friends can reconcile the practice of consuming the products of slave labour with their discipline, and the benign and heavenly doctrines of Jesus Christ, which they profess to venerate, embrace, and live in accordance with. I am aware, that there are various reasons given in justification of the practice. Some say that the Society, as a body, have never borne a testimony against it; hence the inference, that it is not contrary to what God's spirit of love would lead into, otherwise this spirit would have lead them out of it. If we test the practice by the principle of truth, and find it to be in opposition thereto, our duty will lead us to discontinue it, notwithstanding our predecessors omitted testing it by that standard which, when faithfully followed, leads into all truth. Others say, they do not feel at liberty to move in any moral reform, without an immediate revelation from heaven, requiring them to do so. Upon the same principle they should not be willing to continue in any practice they have been accustomed to from habit and education, without an immediate revelation from heaven that God requires them so to do. In the absence of such a revelation, in either case, what is our reasonable duty? Is it not to bring our deeds to the light, that they may be judged by the light? I apprehend that when we wish to arrive at the truth of any proposition, it is absolutely necessary that we become acquainted with the rule or principle by which alone it can be solved, otherwise our efforts will be fruitless. I have no question that Friends have sustained a great loss in reference to the subjects under consideration, as well as others, in consequence of settling down in a lukewarm state of indifference; expecting an immediate revelation from God, manifesting his will to them in reference to their conduct towards their fellow men. This revelation, upon a general principle, has certainly been given to us, through his Son Jesus Christ, wherein he commands us to love him above every thing else, and our neighbour or mankind, as ourselves, which obeyed, would lead us to fulfil another of his commands—to do unto others as we would they should do unto us. Agreeably to these views, it would appear to be our duty to examine all of our acts and conduct towards our fellow men, by the above commands, and prayerfully ask the witness of truth within us, to decide, whether they are in accordance therewith, and to act conformably to its decision. It is in vain to say that the small amount they consume, would have no perceptible influence in the abolishment of the sinful practice of enslaving our fellow men. The amount consumed by Friends, would probably require the labour of from five to ten thousand slaves; therefore, they are accountable for that number being held in the most abject state of servitude imaginable; besides the lives which are sacrificed in obtaining that number, and in coercing their labour. They are still further accountable for the encouragement they thus give to others, to brutalize their fellow men, who, undoubtedly, are as much the objects of God's regard and love as themselves, and equal candidates for the kingdom of heaven. In view of these facts, it is unquestionably our duty to abolish slavery individually, so far as we are sustaining it; and to make use of all consistent, Christian means to influence others to do the same. My sincere desires and prayers are, that Friends and others will severally and carefully examine the above views, by the principle of truth within themselves, and if consistent therewith, embrace them, and live in accordance with them; inasmuch as such a life is the only one that leads into the kingdom of heaven, wherein alone we can enjoy that peace and happiness which the world or the things thereof can neither give nor take away. C. C.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

BRIEF ACCOUNT OF THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS

Founded in the City and County of Philadelphia by Charter from William Penn.

(Concluded.)

The Corporation, though not officially connected with the religious Society of Friends, has always been composed of members. A minute of 1772 states—"It has been the care of the overseers of the school hitherto, and it is our earnest desire the same care may ever be maintained, to nominate such only to be overseers who are members of our religious Society in fellowship with the quarterly and monthly meetings of Friends, in this city and county. It is now agreed that so far as it may be in our power we ought to support and confirm such a connection with the said meetings, so that on any occasion in which the reputation and interest of the Society may be promoted in the discharge of the trust committed to us, agreeably to our Charter, we may ever be ready and willing to hear and consider any thing which may be offered to us by the said meetings."

During the revolutionary war the Corporation had many trying difficulties to contend with. Their school-houses were occupied by the military; their schools were broken up by test acts, passed by the assembly, requiring all teachers to take oaths of allegiance, with which Friends could not conscientiously comply; and their resources were greatly reduced by the derangement of the currency, which rendered it nearly impracticable to collect rents and other debts, except in a depreciated paper money. The following minutes, in relation to these difficulties, may prove interesting.

"First mo. 30, 1777. A number of soldiers, part of the American army, being placed by their deputy quarter-master in a forcible manner in our Latin school-house some time in the last month, and on application made by some of the overseers, removed, and since twice in the like manner forced into that school-room, John Thompson, after consulting with some of the overseers last week, opened his school in the chamber of Pine street school-house, 12 mo. 25, 1777. Our school-house having been ordered to be vacated by Sir William Eskine, quarter master general of the British troops, for the accommodation of the soldiers, several of the overseers waited upon him with a view to have his order revoked, which he declining to do, it was concluded most prudent to remove the school furniture and other effects belonging to the corporation, and it now being necessary to provide other places for keeping our schools in, a committee was appointed for that purpose."

"Ninth mo. 24, 1778. Joseph Yerkes having been arrested and bound with his two sureties to appear to the city court next month, to answer for teaching school without taking the affirmation prescribed by a late act of Assembly; although on considering the case, it is not clear this Board would have advised him to give bail on the occasion; Samuel Rhoads, Nicholas Wain, and James Pemberton are desired to advise and assist him."

The yearly meeting of 1779 having revived the concern of more attentively promoting the religious education of the youth, and of encouraging the establishment of schools under pious tutors for their profitable instruction, the monthly meetings of Philadelphia were desirous to acquaint the next yearly meeting with the care that had been early manifested, and the progress made on this important matter. A joint conference of the overseers of the school, and the committee of the monthly meetings was agreed upon, and held on the 9th of 7th mo. 1779, at which the committee laid before the Board several important queries which after a free conference on the subject of instruction and education of youth were deliberately considered, and the following members were appointed to prepare answers to them, viz: Nicholas Wain, Henry Drinker, James Pemberton and John Pemberton. At the next meeting of the Board an essay of answers was produced, and, with some alterations, adopted and forwarded to the committees of the monthly meetings, from which the following valuable remarks are taken, viz:

"It is our judgment that the preservation of our children from a corrupting connection with such whose example and conduct are injurious to their moral and religious education, depends principally upon the strict care and concern of parents and the heads of families, without which the endeavours of others, who are entrusted with their instruction and the oversight thereof, will be rendered difficult or wholly ineffectual, and we think it is the duty of parents to restrain them from coming at large in the streets, or associating with such company whose conversation and example are not influenced by the pure principle professed by us, whereby they become greatly injured when from under the immediate notice and oversight of their tutors."

"From our observation and experience, we are convinced that the necessity and importance of this duty and care hath been too little attended to by parents and heads of families in general, notwithstanding the many salutary and pressing exhortations frequently given forth by our Yearly Meeting, the revival of which we believe may have a tendency to excite to more diligence and circumspection in a matter so essentially necessary."

It appears from the above essay of answers that there were then under the trust and inspection of the Overseers ten schools; one of which was a "grammar school" for the Greek and Latin languages. In the others were taught reading, writing, arithmetic, and some branches of mathematics. In the school for girls, such branches as were peculiarly suitable for them were also taught, as sewing, &c. Two of the schools (one of them the grammar school) were composed of members and professors, the others, of mixed religious denominations; the number of scholars in each school varied from twenty-four to fifty.

Care was taken that the children of poor Friends should freely partake of learning in the several schools, and, when the funds would allow, the like charity was extended to others: but the circumstances of public affairs caused many difficulties and disabled the Overseers from extending this charity in the same manner as heretofore.

"On the whole (the Overseers conclude) we have ground to hope if the concern of the Yearly Meeting is duly attended to by parents and others who have the oversight and care of children, and our endeavours to promote it fervently united, that a reformation may take place for the essential good of the youth and our religious Society in general, in which necessary work the Overseers of the schools in this city will gladly co-operate with their brethren as far as comes under their notice and trust."

In 1779 the test laws which had been in some parts altered and repealed were again revived. The Board endeavoured to encourage their teachers to firmness in maintaining their stations, but four of the made teachers discontinued their schools, not having sufficient stability to withstand the opposition they feared, and the penalties to which they might be subjected.

The Overseers had seriously considered the subject of remonstrating against the law, but the meeting for sufferings having prepared a memorial and address embracing this and other subjects affecting the religious rights of Friends and other conscientious people, it rendered action on their part unnecessary.

COPY OF THE MEMORIAL.

"To the General Assembly of Pennsylvania:

"The memorial and address of the religious Society, called Quakers, respectfully sheweth—That divers laws have lately been enacted which are very injurious in their nature, oppressive in their manner of execution, and greatly affect us in our religious and civil liberties and privileges, particularly a law passed by the last assembly entitled 'A further Supplement to the test law of this State,' in the operation whereof the present and succeeding generations are materially interested. We therefore apprehend it a duty owing to ourselves and our posterity to lay before you the grievances to which we are subjected by these laws.

"Our predecessors, on their early settlement in this part of America, being piously concerned for the prosperity of the colony and the real welfare of their posterity, among other salutary institutions, promoted at their own expense, the establishment of schools for the instruction of their youth in useful and necessary learning, and their education in piety and virtue, the practice of which form the most sure basis for perpetuating the enjoyment of Christian liberty and essential happiness.

"By the voluntary contributions of the members of our religious Society, schools were set up in which their children were taught, and careful attention hath been given to the instruction of the children of the poor, not of our Society only, but our liberality hath been extended to poor children of other religious denominations generally, numbers of whom have partaken thereof, and these schools have been in like manner continued and maintained for a long course of years.

"Duty to Almighty God, made known in the consciences of men, and confirmed by the Holy Scriptures, is an invariable rule which governs their judgment and actions; He is the only Lord and Sovereign of consciences, and to Him we are accountable for our conduct, as by Him all men are to be finally judged.

"By conscience we mean the apprehension and persuasion a man hath of his duty to God, and the liberty of conscience we plead for is a free, open profession and unmolested exercise of that duty—such a conscience, as under the influence of Divine Grace, keeps within the bounds of morality in all the affairs of human life, and teacheth us to live soberly, righteously and godly in the world.

"As a religious Society, we have ever held forth that the Gospel dispensation was introduced for completing the happiness of mankind, by taking away the occasion of strife, contention and bloodshed, and therefore we are conscientiously restrained from promoting or joining in wars or fightings, and when laws have been made to enforce our compliance contrary to the convictions of our consciences, we have thought it our duty patiently to suffer, though we have often been grievously oppressed.

"The principle we hold in this respect requires us to be a peaceable people, and through the various changes and revolutions which have occurred since our religious Society hath existed, we have never been concerned in promoting or abetting any combinations, insurrections or parties to endanger the public peace, or by violence to oppose the authority of Government—apprehending it our duty quietly to submit, and peacefully to demean ourselves under every government which Divine Providence, in his unerring wisdom, may permit to be placed over us, so that no government can have just occasion for entertaining fears or jealousies of disturbance or danger from us; but if any professing with us deviate from this peaceable into a contrary conduct, and foment discords, feuds or animosities, giving just occasion of uneasiness or disquiet, we think it our duty to declare against their proceedings.

"By the same divine principle we are restrained from complying with the injunctions and requisitions made on us of tests and declarations of fidelity to either party who are engaged in actual war lest we contradict, by our conduct, the profession of our faith.

"It is obvious in these days of depravity, as in former times, that 'because of oaths the land mourns,' and the multiplying the use of them and such solemn engagements, renders them familiar, debases the minds of the people, and adds to the number of gross evils already lamentably prevalent which have drawn down the chastisements of Heaven upon our guilty country.

"We are not actuated by political or party motives, we are real friends to our country who wish its prosperity, and think a solicitude for the enjoyment of our equitable rights, and that invaluable privilege of liberty of conscience, free from coercion, cannot be justly deemed unreasonable; many of us, and other industrious inhabitants, being exposed to heavy penalties and sufferings, which are abundantly increased by the rigor of mistaken and unreasonable men under the sanction of law, whereby many are already reduced to great straits, and threatened with total ruin, the effects of whose impoverishment must at length be sensibly felt by the community at large, through the decline of cultivation and other necessary employments.

"We have been much abused and vilified by divers anonymous publications, and our conduct greatly perverted and misrepresented by groundless reports, and the errors of individuals charged upon us as a body in order to render us odious to the people, and to prepossess the minds of persons in power against us; being conscious of our innocence, and submitting our cause to the Lord who judgeth righteously, we have preferred patience in bearing the reproach to public contest, not doubting that as the minds of the people became more settled and composed, our peaceful demeanour would manifest the injustice we suffered, and being persuaded that on a cool, dispassionate hearing we should be able to invalidate or remove the mistaken reports and suggestions prevailing to our prejudice.

"The matters we have now freely laid before you are serious and important, which we wish you to consider wisely as men, and religiously as Christians, manifesting yourselves friends to true liberty and enemies to persecution, by repealing the several penal laws affecting tender consciences, and restoring to us our equitable rights, that the means of education and the instruction of our youth, which we conceive to be our reasonable and religious duty, may not be obstructed, and that the oppressed may be relieved. In your consideration whereof, we sincerely desire you may seek for, and be directed by, that Supreme Wisdom which is pure, gentle, and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits; and are your real friends.

"Signed, on behalf of a meeting of the representatives of said people, held in Philadelphia the 4th day of the 11th mo., 1779, by JOHN DRISKEN, Clerk."

In 1784 a report was made to the Board by its committee of the condition of the schools, and the number of the children taught, from which the following statement is taken, viz:

In the grammar school (then under the charge of Robert Proud, the historian of Pennsylvania,) there were 36 scholars; Barclay's Apology in Latin, and the Greek and Latin Testament were read by them; the price charged was six pounds per annum, one guinea entrance fee, and five shillings for fuel. In addition to this school, the committee remark, their attendance at meeting on Fifth day should be further enjoined, and a regulation with respect to (some) of the authors read by them, considered; to which purpose a list of sundry books in the Latin and Greek languages is lately received from our friend Richard Shackleton, master of Friends' School at Balitore, in Ireland, which we intend to communicate to Robert Proud for his opinion of the propriety of substituting them in his school, if they can be procured, instead of Roman Classics usually made use of.

In the nine remaining schools, the charges are from three to six pounds per annum, according to the age of the children and the branches taught. The whole number of scholars was 434, of whom 70 were taught gratis.

In the report of the committee it is also stated, "That the board had endeavoured for many years past to promote a separate school for teaching the most useful and instructive branches of mathematics, and had procured some apparatus for this purpose, and they now desire that a prudent, well qualified teacher might be sought for which may prevent some of our youth from going elsewhere to obtain such knowledge."

In the year 1786 the number of schools was increased to 14, and the number of free scholars to 177, a large majority of whom were of other religious denominations.

For the further promotion and encouragement of the mathematical department, a considerable importation of apparatus from London was made in 1787.

In 1793, "the usual meetings and customary attention to the duties of this very interesting trust suffered some months interruption from the spreading and prevalence of a calamitous disease, which through Divine Providence visited the city and liberties, attended with a mortality more general and extensive than has been known since the settlement of this country." Four of the most useful teachers were taken off in this awful visitation.

There are frequent evidences, on the minutes, of the watchful care of the overseers in regard to the books used in the schools, and their concern to admit none that would lead from the testimonies of our religious society. The following advice to the teachers was issued in 1796: "The variety of style in our language being much increased, and too much attention being paid to that which is merely ornamental, we think it our duty to recommend to you to teach the children as much as possible what may with propriety be called a plain style. This will necessarily include the attention to the plain language, and will lead to the use of some of the best authors who have sought to be intelligible and useful without attempting to set off their sentiments by any thing but their intrinsic worth; it will further lead to a proper attention to the rules of grammar."

By a report made in 1798, it appears that the applications of persons of other religious denominations for the admission of their children into the corporation schools, had much increased, and had induced the teachers to admit more into the schools than they could rightly bring forward in their learning, or train in that "stillness, sobriety and industry, wherein children cannot be too early initiated, and which may be of essential advantage to them during the remaining course of their lives."

A committee was appointed to consider the subject, and proposed a plan for the better conducting of the schools. In the plan recommended by the committee and adopted by the board, a reduction of the number under the care of each teacher was considered essential, and "that the schools be confined primarily to those of our religious society, conformably to the manifest design of the promoters, real benefactors and supporters of the institution."

At the same time, their Christian liberality was marked by the expression of their wishes that "The poor of other religious denominations may have such share of our care and income as is fully consistent with the original design, and the express or general tenor of the charter."

That their plan might be effected without circumscribing the income of the teachers, it was concluded, if a sufficient number of scholars of the desired kind did not apply, that the deficiency should be made up out of the funds of the corporation, and as the charge of tuition was fixed at a low rate, a salary should also be paid in addition to the amount received from the parents and others.

In conformity with this arrangement, several select schools were formed in different parts of the city, under the care of well qualified teachers, members of our religious Society, but not without considerable exertion and large expense on the part of the corporation.

In 1803 an accidental fire destroyed a large portion of one of the principal school houses, and also the classical library and entire collection of mathematical and philosophical apparatus. Accommodations were immediately provided elsewhere, and but little interruption of the several schools ensued. The building was quickly repaired.

By the report of a committee of general visitation in 1810, it appeared that in the 14 schools, there were 475 children, about 232 of whom were members of Society, and many of the others were either professors with us, or not being immediately in membership with any other religious society attended our meetings for divine worship. The schools generally were in an encouraging state, though there appears to have been some causes of concern to the overseers, especially in regard to their attendance of our religious meetings, held near the middle of the week, not being as diligent as it should be.

In 1815 a costly set of apparatus was imported from London, and renewed exertions made to establish on a more liberal scale, mathematical as well as classical instruction. Several years subsequently courses of lectures on natural philosophy, botany and mineralogy were delivered.

The report of the visiting committee in 1824, states that there were then in the 15 schools 479 scholars, the majority of whom were members. Several of the schools continued to be very nearly select. The Holy Scriptures were read in all the schools, and the conduct of the children was generally satisfactory to the committee. 137 of the pupils were taught at the expense of the corporation.

In considering the report of this committee, the board were "brought under a renewed exercise for the true advancement of the pupils, and issued advices to the teachers, the object of which was to impress upon them the necessity of imbuing the minds of the children with such a feeling of the nature of the Christian religion and its happy effects, obvious in the lives of the truly pious, as might through the Divine goodness draw them into a love of it, and engage them in an earnest desire to seek after it as for hidden treasure." In order to qualify the teachers for this, they were exhorted to "daily fervent aspirations to the source and fountain of all perfection, to preserve them in his fear and lead them in his counsel; that through the aid of His Holy Spirit, they might go in and out with propriety and acceptance before the children committed to their care, with their minds bowed in religious concern for their own preservation, they might be enabled, while imparting literary instruction, to convey to the minds of their scholars a savor of Christian virtue exemplified in calmness, patience, and a steady adherence to the testimonies and principles of our religious Society."

For a number of years subsequent to this period there was but little change in the schools. At the present time although the number of the schools has been diminished, the corporation continue to educate, gratuitously, about one hundred and thirty children annually, and to afford to others, at much less than the usual rates, the opportunity of having their offspring instructed in a more guarded and select manner than at the public schools.

ASSOCIATED ACTION.

A REVIEW OF A PAMPHLET ENTITLED

"An Appeal to the Public on behalf of a House of Refuge for Coloured Juvenile Delinquents."

The undersigned, a Standing Committee of the "Pennsylvania Society for promoting the Abolition of Slavery, for the relief of free negroes unlawfully held in bondage, and for improving the condition of the African Race," appointed to advise and aid the coloured people in matters pertaining to their moral and physical well-being, and to have a general oversight of their interests, having had our attention drawn to certain statements contained in "An Appeal to the Public, on behalf of a House of Refuge for Coloured Juvenile Delinquents," a careful investigation of the facts therein set forth was instituted, and in conformity with the direction of the Society, we respectfully present the following as the result of our enquiries.

The "Appeal" referred to, (the substance of which has recently been republished in the form of a circular) is in the opinion of this committee calculated to convey to the public, an impression of degradation and crime amongst the coloured population, which does not actually exist; and thereby to increase the popular prejudice against them. The statistics which it contains, although a correct transcript from the Records, are unaccompanied with such explanations as they require, and which would materially alter their bearing and tendency; hence are not to be taken alone, as the basis of conclusions touching the moral and physical condition of this class of our population.

We allege that the facts presented in the "Appeal" are partial and disjointed, and if received independently of other facts and circumstances, would present a picture of depravity of the coloured race amongst us, alarming to their friends, and as favourable to the idea of their inferiority and worthlessness, as their most prejudiced and bitter opponents could desire. It is to counteract such impressions, and to take away from the slaveholder, and his apologist, an argument with which we fear these statistics would supply him, that this committee have felt called upon to present a view of the question, which they think will place the coloured people in an entirely different light, so that instead of looking upon them as a burden and nuisance, and as occupying a very low position in the scale of morals, they will be viewed rather as a useful and improving class—notwithstanding the moral, social and political disabilities under which they labour.

In attempting this task, the committee have no invidious charges to make against the respectable individuals whose names appear to the "Appeal." Some of them we recognise as known friends of the coloured people, and several are members of the Abolition Society. They doubtless have appended their names to that document, without perceiving its pernicious tendency, and we trust they will join with us in efforts to correct any false impressions which it may make. Nor would we stand in the way of any wise and benevolent efforts to afford an Asylum for coloured juvenile delinquents. We have long believed that this class of offenders should be the objects of care, equally with those of a different complexion. Our labours to that effect are well known to the Managers of the House of Refuge, to whom we have constantly protested against their exclusion of coloured children from the benefits of the present institution, as being contrary to the dictates of benevolence, and in opposition to the wishes and expectations of many of the original contributors to the Refuge; as well as to law and sound policy.

The first statement in the appeal to which we would call attention is as follows, viz.:

"It appears that whilst the proportion of coloured to white population in Philadelphia City and County is as one to twelve, the ratio of coloured to white paupers in Blockley Almshouse on the 3d of January, 1st mo. 1846, was more than one to seven, and of untried prisoners received into the County Prison in the last five years, the proportion of coloured was still greater, or more than one to two."

This extract is taken from the abridged "Appeal" in circular form, and is a condensed statement or summary derived from statistics which are given at length in the pamphlet.

We will pass over, for the present, the first part of this extract, which relates to pauperism, and proceed at once to examine what we consider the most important; having more immediate connection with the objects of our concern, and as directly affecting the moral standing of the coloured people. To wit:—

Moyamensing Prison.

In the second clause of the "Appeal" in which the number of untried prisoners received into the county prison is given, the proportion of coloured to white prisoners is stated to be more than one to two. Without presuming to deny or call in question the sad reality of the fact, here stated in all its simple and naked deformity, we will briefly remark, that it is altogether ex-parte; and under this view of the subject, are grieved and surprised that the authors of the "Appeal," in attempting to give the public an idea of the moral condition of the people of colour, should not have discriminated between the actual criminals, and the unfortunate sufferers from a cruel prejudice.

The committee have taken special pains to investigate the alarming state of things indicated by the above statement. Two of our number were deputed to that service; they accordingly, in July last, spent an afternoon at the County Prison, and were obligingly furnished by the officers with every facility to prosecute their enquiries. They were informed that more than half of the commitments of the City and County came from a district including about twelve squares, lying on the southern line of the City proper, and including Moyamensing. The population in this district was roughly estimated at 20,000, about one half of whom are coloured. In the month of January, 1846, the whole number of commitments, white and coloured, from the city and county was 409. Of these, 212 were from the district referred to, and the balance 197 from all other parts of the City and County.

The number of coloured persons out of the whole number of commitments was 129, of these ninety-two were from the infected district, and thirty-seven from other parts. Here we have a fact, which gives a clue to the fair average proportion of crime between the whites and coloured. If from two hundred and twelve, the whole number of commitments shown by the Prison records in January last to have come from the twelve squares spoken of by the officers of the Prison, we deduct ninety-two, the number of coloured persons included in that category, as the proportion of blacks from the same range of population, it gives us one hundred and twenty, as the ratio of white prisoners, which is rather more than 25 per cent in favour of the coloured race in this particular district, where the population is about equally divided; and we do not hesitate to express our firm conviction that under the same circumstances, having the same opportunities, and exposed to like temptations, there is a greater amount of crime amongst the whites than amongst the coloured people.

Farther. Of these one hundred and twenty-nine coloured commitments in January last, only twenty-three were convicted when brought to trial, fifteen of whom were from the district of twelve squares spoken of—and every one of the whole number (twenty-three) for no higher grade of offence than larceny! This certainly does not argue such alarming depravity amongst the coloured people, as appears to have been intentionally indicated by the statements in the "Appeal." If out of a population estimated at some twenty thousand souls, in that portion of the districts where they are most thickly settled, amid all the temptations of a city life, and the greatly increased temptations (to the poor) of mid-winter, when the cold is severe, and work scarce, to have but fifteen convictions for crime in one month, and they for the lowest grade known in law, is an argument rather in favour of, than against the moral character of the coloured people as a class.

But what became of the enormous number of one hundred and six coloured prisoners in a single month, who were discharged without being convicted of crime? These are herded together under the general head of "untried prisoners in the County prison," and thus as an aggregate are presented to the public, as affording evidence of the alarming moral destination of our coloured population. Whereas, in point of fact, they only serve to show the gross prejudice and injustice of committing magistrates towards this people. The facts here stated are not new. In a printed Report published by this committee under its original organization in 1837 it was shown by official documents that not more than one in six of the coloured persons thrown into the County prison as offenders were ever brought to trial. The Grand Jury of the Court of Quarter Sessions for the County, for June term 1837, were so satisfied of this fact, that they made it the subject of special presentment in the following words:

"The Grand Jury would also state they consider the conduct of many of the Magistrates highly reprehensible in permitting very many cases of assault and battery to come before them; if they were to use a proper influence, they have it in their power to settle many of them, which would save the County, and relieve the Courts of considerable time, trouble and expense. The course pursued by many of the magistrates in Southwark and Moyamensing is truly astonishing; it would seem that they are in the habit of committing individuals who appear to be almost penniless and destitute to prison, on the most frivolous grounds, (merely for the sake of private emolument)."

The conduct of Committing Magistrates in relation to this defenceless portion of the community has since been noticed on several occasions by Grand Juries in their presentments, and by the Judges of our Courts.

The next point to which we would call attention is the #### Eastern Penitentiary.

In relation to this Prison the following statement is given in the "Appeal," viz.:

"Number of Convicts committed to the Eastern Penitentiary of Pennsylvania, from the opening of the Institution in 1829, to December 31, 1845.

White Convicts,	1,367
Coloured Convicts,	592

Total, 2,059

Ratio of coloured to white prisoners rather more than 1 to 2."

In contemplating the great disproportion between the white and coloured convicts here set forth, and picturing in imagination the number of whites which would have been confined there had they been equally vicious, we have not felt the degree of alarm manifested by the authors of the "Appeal." And we would ask the unprejudiced enquirer to consider several circumstances in connection with their statements, before they pass judgment upon this class of our population.

First. It must be remembered that the statistics of the Eastern Penitentiary, quoted in the Appeal, include coloured convicts of all ages, the House of Refuge not being opened to youthful coloured offenders, which, had it been, would have certainly diminished the ratio, to some extent. But suppose that from the opening of the Eastern Penitentiary in 1829, to December 31, 1845, comprising a period of seventeen years, six hundred and ninety-two coloured persons out of two thousand and fifty-nine, have been sent to that prison from Eastern Pennsylvania, does even this fact furnish an argument for the increased moral depravity of the coloured people, under the peculiar circumstances in which they are found amongst us? We think not.

Because, secondly. It will not be denied that prejudice against colour is one of the most inveterate, wide spread and deep rooted sentiments in this community. Not the less unjust, that it pervades all classes from the lowest to the highest—that its insidious influence is continually seen and felt in the social and political structure of society. This being the fact, it is not wonderful that it should find its way even into courts of justice. We have already shown how it operates amongst the inferior magistracy, and how materially the statistics of the County Prison are affected by it. And we would respectfully enquire whether the same rule will not apply in both cases. Who will deny, that the circumstance of an offender being a negro, (as these people are contemptuously called) is not against him with the great mass of the community? Or that many convictions occur to the black man, which the white man under similar circumstances would have escaped? Or that a great inequality exists between white and coloured convicts in the severity of punishment for the same grade of offences—the coloured convict as a general rule getting a much longer sentence—let the criminal reports in our daily papers answer. And who does not know the influence which wealth and station—the power of eloquent counsel and interested friends (of which the coloured prisoner is generally destitute) have over the minds of the community, and of courts and juries in forming their estimate of guilt? Or in how many instances the consequences of crime, even of a serious character, are evaded by those possessed of ample resources, and ingenious tact in eluding the penalties of the law.

As strongly corroborative of the estimate we have placed upon the general good character of the coloured people, and confirmatory of the sentiments advanced in our former Report, when treating upon the subject of crime, we cannot refrain from introducing an extract from some remarks published in the Colonization Herald, as having been made in the Senate of Pennsylvania, on the resolution relative to the right of petition, by Jesse R. Burden, the decided and uniform opposer of the course of abolitionists, and denunciator of their measures, and at that time in high standing in the community.

"In the prisons they (coloured persons) were numerous, their offences seldom of a high grade, generally those incident to poverty. The number of commitments was in a great measure to be accounted for from prejudice against their colour, and from want of friends. Our Pennsylvania system of 'squires' looks less to the satisfaction of justice, than to the justice's pocket—obedience to the laws is starvation to the magistrate—his interest is made to consist in having the laws broken, or in committing men under colour of law. He will discharge a white man from prison because a few dollars can be raised among his friends; the coloured man for want of funds, remains in prison until term time."

"He said he had never known an instance of a coloured person using disrespectful language to a white man, when spoken to in the manner which a gentleman ought to speak. He believed the conduct of the coloured people had been as good as any person had a right to expect, considering the circumstances under which they were placed."

Under this view of the subject, we would again enquire whether the crimes of the poor black—which in the largest proportion of cases are not of the highest grade, and where all the surrounding circumstances favour detection, conviction and consequent severe punishment, are to be set down to the account of his degraded moral condition; and a strict comparison drawn between him, and the more favoured race, when the circumstances of the two classes are so widely different.

Were all the violators of law and morals, all the offenders against the peace and good order of the community, brought to justice with the same rigor and pertinacity as are those of the African race, and were the laws administered with equal strictness in the cases of all, we strongly suspect that the apparent inequality in the criminal calendar would present a far different aspect.

These views are not presented in the language of censure or complaint against any class of our fellow citizens, or in extenuation of the crimes which unhappily exist in too large a degree amongst the coloured population; but as facts which belong to the examination of the actual moral condition of these people, without the consideration of which, it is impossible to draw a just comparison between them and the more-favored classes amongst whom they dwell.

(To be Continued.)

THE NON-SLAVERHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, THIRD MONTH 1, 1847.

TESTIMONY AGAINST WAR. When members of the Society of Friends speak of bearing a testimony against any evil practice, they do not mean an open attestation or profession, merely, but a public evidence, by their whole life, of their belief in its sinfulness. It has happened, however, that they have not, in all cases, at once perceived the full extent to which their principles would legitimately lead them. Although the first members of that Society held the sentiments and principles which now prevent their descendants from purchasing or holding slaves, yet, for more than a century after the rise of the society, both slavery and the foreign slave-trade were tolerated amongst them. Spirituous liquors were used by Friends universally, as a common drink, until a period comparatively recent, and there are even instances on record of monthly meetings appointing committees to see that all their members were provided with rum or other spirits in time of harvest. In both these cases their testimony has been progressive.

From its origin, the Society of Friends has always declared that all wars are in opposition to Christianity, yet, during a long period, its members appear to have been satisfied in a connection with war, which was subsequently repudiated.

John Woolman left an interesting account of the difficulties in which Friends were involved during the war against the Indians, in Pennsylvania, in 1755. He did not feel easy to pay a tax which was laid to carry on the war, and he relates that he "had conversation with several noted Friends on the subject, who all favoured the payment of such taxes; some of them I proffered before myself, and this made me easier for a time; yet there was in the depths of my mind, a scruple which I never could get over; and at certain times I was greatly distressed on that account." "To refuse the active payment of a tax which our Society generally paid, was exceedingly disagreeable; but to do a thing contrary to my conscience, appeared yet more dreadful. When this exercise came upon me, I knew of none under the like difficulty; and in my distress I besought the Lord to enable me to give up all, that so I might follow him whithersoever he was pleased to lead me."

At the Yearly Meeting of 1755, a Committee was appointed to correspond with the Meeting for Sufferings in London; and another to visit the Monthly and Quarterly Meetings. These committees met together and had "a weighty conference in the fear of the Lord; at which time," says John Woolman, "I perceived there were many Friends under a scruple like that before mentioned." This conference held by adjournments for several days. "Friends thus met," continues he, "were not all of one mind in relation to the tax; which, to such who scrupled it, made the way more difficult. To refuse an active payment, at such a time, might be construed into an act of disloyalty, and appeared likely to displease the rulers, not only here, but in England. Still there was a scruple so fastened upon the minds of many Friends, that nothing moved it; it was a conference the most weighty that ever I was at, and the hearts of many were bowed in reverence before the Most High. Some Friends, of the said committees, who appeared easy to pay the tax, after several adjournments withdrew; others of them continued till the last. At length, an Epistle of tender love and caution, to Friends in Pennsylvania, was drawn up by some Friends concerned, on that subject; and being read several times and corrected, was then signed by such of them as were free to sign it, and afterwards sent to the Monthly and Quarterly Meetings."

Samuel Fothergill, in a letter to his sister, dated Philadelphia, 12th mo. 17th, 1755, says:—"A number of substantial Friends from divers parts of this province having appointed a meeting for conference together in this city, and requesting my meeting them, I found some engagement of mind for the service. Our conference continued, by several adjournments, until this evening." He signed the Epistle adopted by the committee, and, in his subsequent correspondence, several times alluded to the subject. Before he left America, he learned that the advice it contained was disapproved by some Friends in England; and after his return home, he wrote to John Churchman thus:—"I found in almost every mind a secret displeasure against the Friends who signed the Epistle of caution and advice; and fully expected to be tried by the Meeting of Sufferings, for being concerned in it. But innocently conscious of my own and friends' integrity, and mindful of God which engaged us, I was quiet, and yet bold. I have this remark to make, although subscribing that epistle hath made me the butt of professor and profane, I never once repented it; I believe it was right, and leave the effect to Him, whose ways are unsearchable, yet faithful, just and true."

In a letter subsequently written to Israel Pemberton, he expresses a strong apprehension of an attack, at the time of the Yearly Meeting in London, from the "opponents of the progress of the Church from strength to strength." He again alludes to the subject, in another letter to John Churchman, dated 9th mo., 1757, in these terms: "The desolations on your frontiers are very distressing, but the difference in Friends' judgment, the disunion within the gates of our Zion, affords more cause of mourning. I am glad to hear mutual condescension prevails amongst you, that ancient signal of best fellowship."

In the year 1757, when John Woolman was in North Carolina, a Friend, "who laboured for his living, having no negroes, and had been a minister many years," related a difficulty he had been under, as follows:—"That as monies had been raised by a tax of late years to carry on war, he had a scruple in his mind in regard to paying it; and chose rather to suffer restraint of his goods than pay it; and as he was the only person who refused it in those parts, and knew not that any one else was in the like circumstances, he signified that it had been a heavy trial to him, and more so, for that some of his brethren had been uneasy with his conduct in that case."

The faithful perseverance of those who found themselves thus constrained practically to advance the testimony, which all professed, against war, finally overcame their opposers; and for nearly seventy years, the Discipline of the Society has directed that its members should "carefully avoid engaging in any trade or business promotive of war; sharing or partaking of the spoils of war by purchasing or selling prize goods; importing or shipping goods in armed vessels; paying taxes for the express purpose of war; grinding of grain, feeding of cattle, or selling their property, for the use of the army, &c."

The principle having been fully adopted, that no act promotive of war is to be committed, Friends are, individually, and as a Church, called upon to carry it into practice, under all the circumstances which the mutations of time may bring into existence. Few, perhaps, will venture to assert, that the "progress of the Church from strength to strength," has arrived at its ultimate point; or that the members of the Society, in their individual practice, are now observing in all respects and to its full extent, their testimony against war. The present state of our country ought to lead them into a renewed examination of their real position, individually, in regard to this matter; and if, in pursuing it, any should find a scruple in their minds respecting some practice, in which "our Society, generally," indulge, may they, like John Woolman under similar circumstances, feel it very "dreadful" to do a thing contrary to their conscience.

The Federal Government is now waging a war against our neighbours in Mexico, for the purpose of adding a vast territory to the United States. If this purpose should be accomplished, that territory will be the "spoils of war;" and it must clearly follow, that it will be "inconsistent with his religious testimony and principle" against war, for a Friend to purchase any part of it. Upon this point there can scarcely be a difference of sentiment, although the forcible possession of the country may be attempted to be justified under the cover of a treaty of peace.

A Member of Congress used the following language, in the House of Representatives—plainly indicating the character of any territory which may be given up by Mexico to the United States: "The President has said that the war must be prosecuted until ample indemnity shall be obtained of Mexico. We have already expended fifty millions of dollars, and in another year will have expended one hundred millions. How is she to indemnify us? She has no money; then of course, by territory. Will she voluntarily yield one-half or two-thirds of her territory? Any child knows better. Then the war is prosecuted to compel her to give up her territory! In other words, for conquest."

Let it be supposed that our Government, not content with despoiling the Mexican nation of its fertile lands, should, to this wrong, add another and an incomparably greater outrage upon the inhabitants; and, robbing them of themselves, their wives and their children, reduce them to the condition of slaves, and dispose of them to new occupants of the soil, to cultivate, by their coerced labour, the newly acquired sugar and cotton plantations. Is there one amongst us who would not, instinctively, reject the fruit of that stolen labour—the avails alike of war and slavery?

But our testimony against war is not confined to our own or to any particular country. It is not limited by geographical lines. The Christian regards all mankind as his brethren, and no "mountains interposed" or intervening seas, can present a barrier to the extension of his religious principles and duties. In whatever portion of the globe, therefore, wars may be waged, he will, in every case, feel impelled to avoid any trade, business or practice, which may promote, prolong or sustain them.

We will turn for a moment to bleeding Africa! It would greatly exceed our limits to attempt a description of the wars which are now, and have been for centuries, prosecuted in that greatly injured land. For our present purpose, it will be sufficient to give the following extracts from a sketch of the slave trade, written by the Editors of the "Friend's Library," and to be found in that work at page 133 of volume 4th.

"It appears that after making ample allowance for all doubtful cases, not less than one hundred and fifty thousand slaves are annually imported from Africa into Cuba, Brazil and Porto Rico, besides a large number (not less than fifty thousand) who are carried every year to Texas, the United States and other countries.

"As these slaves are chiefly the victims of rapine, or prisoners taken in predatory warfare, the number who are killed in procuring them is great, not less probably than those who are captured. During the long forced marches to the sea coast, over burning sands, destitute of food and of water, and subjected to great cruelties, vast numbers perish; and while waiting for a market at the places of deposit on the sea-board, contagious diseases and sickness, occasioned by grief, confinement and starvation, occasion great mortality.

"On the passage across the Atlantic, it is well ascertained, that the deaths are fully twenty-five per cent. of the whole number shipped; and of those who are landed at the places of destination, twenty per cent die in the seasoning and from other causes.

"Thus we are warranted in the conclusion, that at a moderate estimate, for the two hundred thousand slaves annually taken from Africa, three hundred thousand are sacrificed, and that the continent is thus DESPOILED OF HALF A MILLION OF ITS INHABITANTS EVERY YEAR.

"We have already said that many of the slaves were prisoners of war:

"These wars are not the consequence of a disposition naturally quarrelsome, but are the immediate offspring of cupidity, sharpened and roused to action by the arrival of a slave-ship. Others of these wretched beings are the innocent victims of a corrupt system of jurisprudence, which owes its existence to the same fruitful source of human misery. This unjust system places the poor natives wholly at the mercy of the petty despots who rule the country. He who has enriched himself by his industry, or who has a numerous family of fine children, the sale of which would produce a handsome sum, seldom escapes the notice of his chieftain. Crimes are invented and promoted, and accusations multiplied, solely with the hope of procuring condemnations, the punishment annexed to which is, 'sale to the slave-merchant.' Many are the victims of a system of roused rapine and plunder—peacefully pursuing their agricultural or mechanical occupations, they are seized by ruffians who had concealed themselves in ambush, are gagged, bound, and borne away to the slave-ship.

"All these are the effects of the strong temptations held out by the white men who visit their shores, to procure cargoes of slaves; for the natives, when provoked by their artifices, evince mild and pacific dispositions; but no sooner does a ship move anchor, than avarice, hatred, revenge, and all the malevolent passions which agitate the human breast, seem at once roused to action."

Dreadful, indeed, is this picture of war and misery, and deeply does it behoove every professor of the religion which proclaims, "on earth peace, good will toward men," to inquire, for what purpose this awful sacrifice of human life and wicked violation of the heaven-bestowed rights of man, are maintained.

For what object is Africa "despoiled of half a million of its inhabitants every year"? The answer is found in the destruction of human life on the plantations of Cuba, Porto Rico and Brazil, which, without this annual supply, would in a few years become depopulated of their coloured labourers.

To what end is this annual supply of 200,000 slaves directed? The production of the cargoes of sugar, coffee, cotton and tobacco, which fill the warehouses of Europe and America, and are found on our tables, in our wardrobes and on our persons. It is then, indisputably, the purchaser and consumer of these articles who send to the shores of Africa, the slave ship whose arrival rouses, in the natives, avarice, hatred, revenge, cupidity, and all the malevolent passions which agitate the human breast, and produce and perpetuate the most horrible scenes of carnage and misery.

Do Friends maintain a faithful testimony against war, whilst their daily practice promotes and sustains it? Do they truly exemplify the principles of their religious society—the doctrines and precepts of Christianity—by holding out the temptations which induce the heathen of Africa to forget their "mild and pacific dispositions," and to wage perpetual and desolating wars against each other?

THE DEATH PENALTY.—The most prominent opponents to the repeal of the punishment for murder by death, are to be found in the professing religious world. These respectable and influential antagonists to a reform which other pious and humane persons believe is required by the spirit of Christianity, take the ground that murder is so heinous an offence against God that nothing short of the death of the murderer will satisfy the divine justice. This requirement they suppose is written in various parts of the Scriptures, but especially in the code given to the Jewish nation, which embodies, in their opinion, the entire, as well as the unalterable law in relation to murder. While we wholly dissent from the view of these individuals, we nevertheless think a vast gain would accrue to the cause of humanity by an accommodation of our penal code, in that particular, to the law of Moses. We are clearly of the opinion that the latter not only excluded circumstantial testimony, which the other admits, but demanded also the testimony of two positive witnesses to the commission or confession of any crime worthy of death. The following are the provisions of the Mosaic law in relation to witnesses, which we think will justify this view:

"Whoso killeth any person, the murderer shall be put to death by the mouth of witnesses; but one witness shall not testify against any person to cause him to die."—Numb. xxxv. 30.

"At the mouth of two witnesses, or three witnesses, shall he that is worthy of death be put to death; but at the mouth of one witness he shall not be put to death.

"The hands of the witnesses shall be first upon him to put him to death; and afterwards the hands of all the people. So thou shalt put away the evil from among you."—Deut. xvi. 6, 7.

We apprehend that under this law the horrible incident narrated in the following statement, copied from the Boston Whig, could not have taken place. Here was a real murder, though done according to law. We submit to those who vindicate the religious duty of making an atonement for murder by the death of the murderer or murderers, the question, Who in this case should be sacrificed to the divine justice? Should it be the judge who charged the jury—the jury who rendered the verdict—the hangman who enforced it—the legislature which made the law—the people which permitted it, or the individuals who incited on all these, its religious necessity?

"Sir,—In reading the narrative of circumstantial evidence in your paper, I was forcibly reminded of a case which came under my personal notice many years since. A schooner sailed from New York for Charleston, S. C., with some eighteen or twenty passengers. On the voyage some hashed meat was served up for dinner, and while eating it, several of the passengers became sick, and it was suspected that poison was the cause. The cook, a black man, was suspected, and after charging him with the deed, which he denied, the captain asked him to eat the meat, which he declined. Some one or two of the passengers died. When the vessel arrived at Charleston, the cook was arrested and held for trial.

"The mate of the vessel was not to be found, and no one knew him or where he had gone. The cook was brought to trial. A New England lawyer defended him: I was present at the trial, and all the evidence against him, was the fact that he refused to eat the poisoned meat. All the eloquence of his young attorney could not save him. He was found guilty and sentenced to be hung. I visited him in prison, and heard him many times assert his innocence. He was allowed a minister of the Gospel to visit him, to whom he asserted his innocence in language so convincing, that on the scaffold he stated his firm belief that he was innocent. I saw him hung, and the last words he uttered, I shall never forget. —'I die an innocent man,' said he in a solemn and convincing tone, that seemed to carry conviction through the spectators, of his innocence, but nothing could save him. Many years past, and this scene, buried in the thoughts of those who witnessed it, but I never could forget it.—We all remember the pirates who were hung in this city some years ago. One of them was Gibbs who confessed that he was mate of that schooner, put the arsenic in that mince meat, and fled on the arrival of that vessel at Charleston. This is no fiction, but a melancholy fact—and witnessed by the writer; and this is one of the many instances of legal murder—the result of circumstantial evidence."

OHIO, PENNSYLVANIA, RHODE ISLAND AND DELAWARE.—A Bill providing for the decision, by the votes of the people, of the question of abolishing the "Black Laws" of Ohio, passed the House by a vote of 34 to 30, but was lost in the Senate, 18 to 16.

The Bill, to which we referred in our last paper, as having been introduced into the House at Harrisburg, to prevent kidnapping; to prohibit officers of the State from aiding in the arrest, detention or carrying away of fugitive slaves under the law of Congress, and to repeal that part of the act of 1780, which allows certain persons to hold slaves six months in this State, has passed that body by a unanimous vote. Just as this paper is about to be put to press, a report has reached us that it has also passed the Senate. It now awaits the signature of the Governor.

In Rhode Island, a bill of a similar character passed the House, but was defeated in the Senate.

A Select Committee of the Delaware Legislature reported a bill, agreeably to the wishes of a number of petitioners, for the Abolition of Slavery in that State; but it was lost in the Senate by a majority of one, after having passed the House.

These movements indicate an encouraging progress in public sentiment, and raise bright hopes of the future.

DEATH OF JOSEPH JOHN GURNEY.—In recording the decease of this distinguished individual, we may adopt the lamentation of King David: "Know ye not that there is a prince and a great man fallen this day in Israel?"

This mournful event took place at his residence, Earham Hall, near the city of Norwich, England, on the evening of the 4th of 1st mo. last. On the 22d of the preceding month, while he was returning home from a Meeting of the District Visiting Society for the benefit of the poor, the horse on which he rode, stumbled, and with its rider, fell to the ground. He did not appear at the time to have received serious injury, and resumed his ride homeward. On the following evening, he attended a Meeting of Ministers and Elders, and next day, the Quarterly Meeting. On First day, the 27th, he attended meeting both in the morning and afternoon, and was, most acceptably to his friends, engaged in the ministry and in supplication. He was at a meeting of the District Visiting Society on the 28th, but feeling unwell, withdrew before its conclusion. Internal inflammation, to which he had been subject for several years, ensued the following day, but it was not until the evening of First day, the 3d of 1st mo., that danger was apprehended. A telegraph despatch was then sent to London for Dr. Prout, who reached Earham at 10 o'clock on 2d day morning, and pronounced the case hopeless! At 5 o'clock in the afternoon, J. J. G. attempted to walk across his chamber, but finding himself too weak, lay down on his bed; a stupor came on, and at 10 o'clock, P. M., without a struggle, he passed to his everlasting rest! His age was 58.

From a Norwich newspaper we derive the following account of the funeral. It is apparent that the writer was not a member of the Society of Friends.

The Funeral of Joseph John Gurney.—During the interval between the death and the funeral of Joseph John Gurney, the sensation created by the mournful event which has cast so unprecedented a gloom over the ancient city of Norwich, has continued rather to increase than to abate. By realizing their loss, the inhabitants have come to feel so much the more intensely its gravity and its extent. It has furnished the principal topic of conversation in every family, in every private circle, in every group by the wayside. Persons of all classes and of every age, however various in opinion on other subjects, have united in their high estimate of the character of the deceased, and in the melancholy satisfaction of recalling excellencies of which now, alas! the memory alone remains. Each individual has had his own story to tell of some public benefit, or of some kindness shown to others or himself; and innumerable acts of beneficence, long forgotten amidst the crowd of more recent instances, have been related and listened to with the mournful pleasure incident to such a theme. In the mean while, the outward manifestations of grief remained until the day of the funeral, unchanged. The half-closed shops and the darkened windows of the private houses in every part of the city, gave unequivocal testimony to the sorrow which reigned within.

"Other demonstrations of affection and esteem were made. We are not aware that either history or tradition tells us of seven days civic mourning in the case of any private individual whatever.

"The funeral itself, as might have been expected from these unusual preliminaries, was of an extraordinary character. At a very early hour, on the morning of Tuesday, the appointed day, the few shops which had opened, closed again, and the entire city suspended business, in order to witness or take part in the approaching ceremony. The procession set out from Earlham at about ten o'clock. It consisted of the hearse, and carriages containing the relatives, followed by the equipages which had arrived from Norwich, making in all more than fifty, and accompanied by a considerable body of pedestrians. The cortege would no doubt have been more numerous, but it was understood to be the wish of Mr. Gurney's family that no empty carriages should attend. A simplicity in harmony alike with the practice of the Society of Friends and with the habits and character of the departed, marked all the arrangements. As was fitting in such a case, there was no parade, no hired sorrow, no needless insignia of grief. There was, however, the pomp of mourning multitudes. As the procession moved on towards the city it was met by a gradually increasing number of the inhabitants, who had issued forth in a continuous stream to pay their last tribute to the memory of Joseph John Gurney. Silently and sadly they stood while the hearse passed slowly by, and many a tearful countenance among the crowd, bore witness to their sympathy with the surviving relatives, and their reverential attachment to the dead. At St. Giles' gates the throng became yet more dense and imposing. Every vacant space was occupied with spectators, and the road sides were like living walls. All, however, appeared to be impressed with the solemnity of the occasion, and with the desire to preserve a becoming order. But for the obvious traces of sorrow every where displayed, it might have been imagined that the voice so often heard with delight amongst us, was not yet stilled by death, and that the well known benignant smile, and the accustomed eloquence were employed in marshalling that vast assembly. The departed spirit seemed to resume for the time its wonted influence over the citizens of Norwich.

"At this point a body of Sunday School Teachers to the number of about two hundred, joined the procession, now greatly swollen by numbers who had already fallen in with the line of carriages, and accompanied it on foot. The passage through the city presented a striking spectacle. The closed shops, the thronged but quiet streets, the windows every where filled with persons looking on with mute emotion, the unadorned hearse and its attendants moving slowly through the motionless and crowded ranks, all this spoke of a sentiment alike deep, universal, and irrepressible. It was the language of a bereaved community lamenting the loss, and bearing a last testimony to the virtues of a fellow citizen, beloved and honoured in life: still more beloved and honoured now that he was gone.

"The procession, welcomed every where in the same manner, and continually growing as it went along, passed to the burying ground attached to the Friends' Meeting house in the Gildencroft. At about half past eleven the hearse arrived at the narrow gateway leading to the burying-ground from whence the coffin was borne to the grave by six members of the Society of Friends, followed by the mourners.

"After the procession had reached and surrounded the grave, at the mouth of which the coffin was supported, a profound silence ensued, according to the simple but solemnly appropriate practice of the 'Friends.' This was, at length, broken by John Hodgkin, who made a brief reference to the 55th, 56th, and 57th verses of the 15th chapter of the 1st Corinthians. Another pause took place, followed by an address delivered by Lucy Maw, of Needham. The coffin was then lowered. It was an impressive and affecting moment. The circle of mourning relatives, the surrounding crowd of spectators—scarcely less moved or less warmly attached to the deceased—persons of all ranks, of all ages, of all communions, magistrates and artisans, Clergymen and Dissenting ministers, Churchmen, Independents, Baptists, Methodists, and Friends—in short, representatives of the whole population of Norwich, now took their last farewell of Joseph John Gurney. We shall not desecrate the feelings of that moment by attempting to describe them. It will be sufficient to say, that the procession slowly turned their footsteps towards the meeting-house, where a public religious service was to be held.

"This service differed in no respect, but in the numbers who attended, from the usual meeting for worship in the same place. It consisted of the accustomed silence, broken at intervals by the language of unpremeditated prayer and preaching. The first ministers who addressed the dense and attentive assembly were Mary Ann Bayes, Cornelius Haubury, and Wm. Ball. The widow of the deceased, with whom all hearts sympathized, then offered up a prayer, full of resignation and thanksgiving. The next speaker was John Hodgkin. A prayer by J. B. Braithwaite concluded the meeting. The service was deeply impressive, and, pervaded as it was throughout by the spirit of pure evangelical catholic Christianity, formed an appropriate conclusion to the funeral of Joseph John Gurney.

"Thus terminated the proceedings of a day destined to be memorable in the annals of Norwich: of a day when the simple obsequies of a private individual were converted into an august public ceremony by the whole body of the citizens, as a memorial of his exalted virtues, and of their irreparable loss.

SELECTIONS.

From the Pennsylvania Freeman.

SLAVERY AS IT IS.

Who can read such details as are contained in the following letter from our respected friend, Dr. Ellwood Harvey, and not become an abolitionist?

Chadds-ford on Brandywine, Dec. 26th, 1846.

DEAR SIR,—Myself and two others lately visited the eastern part of Virginia to see the cheap lands much talked of now in agricultural circles, and there saw a slave auction. My friends were not abolitionists before, and pitied my credulity when I told them the horrors of slavery; but one week in the Old Dominion has added two staunch adherents to our cause. I wish every pro-slavery man and woman in the North could witness one slave auction.

We attended a sale of land and other property near Petersburg, and unexpectedly saw slaves sold at public auction. The slaves were told they would not be sold, and were collected in front of the quarters, gazing on the assembled multitude. The land being sold, the auctioneer's loud voice was heard, "Bring up the niggers." A shade of astonishment and affright passed over their faces, as they stared first at each other and then at the crowd of purchasers, whose attention was now directed to them. When the horrible truth was revealed to their minds that they were to be sold, and nearest relations and dearest friends parted forever, the effect was indescribably agonizing. Women snatched up their babes and ran screaming into the huts. Children hid behind the huts and trees, and the men stood in mute despair. The auctioneer stood on the portico of the house, and the men and boys were ranged in the yard for inspection. It was announced that no warrants of soundness were given, and purchasers must examine for themselves. A few old men were sold at prices from $13.00 to $25.00, and it was painful to see old men, with beards white with years of toil and suffering, stand up to be the jests of brutal tyrants, and to hear them tell of their diseases and worthlessness, fearing they would be bought by traders for the southern market.

A white boy, about 12 years old, was placed on the stand. His hair was brown and straight; his skin exactly the same hue as other white persons, and no discoverable trace of negro feature in his countenance.

Some coarse and vulgar jests were passed on his colour, and $5.00 was bid for him, but the auctioneer said "that is not enough to begin on for such a likely young nigger!" Several remarked they "would not have him as a gift!" Some said a white nigger was more trouble than he was worth. One man said it was wrong to sell white people. I asked if it was not wrong then to sell black people. He made no reply. Before he was sold, his mother rushed from the house upon the portico, crying in frantic grief, "My son, oh my boy, they will take away my dear ——" Her voice was lost, as she was rudely posted back and the door closed. The sale was not for a moment interrupted, and none of that crowd of ruthless tyrants appeared to be in the least degree affected by the scene. The poor boy, afraid to cry before so many strangers, who showed no sign of sympathy or pity, trembled and wiped the tears from his cheeks with his sleeve. He was sold for about $250. The monsters who tore this child from his mother would sell your child and mine if they had the power. During the sale, the quarters resounded with cries and lamentations that made my heart ache. A woman was next called by name. She gave her infant one wild embrace before leaving it with an old woman, and hastened mechanically to obey the call, but stopped, threw her arms aloft, screamed, and was unable to move.

One of my companions touched my shoulder and said, "come, let us leave here, I can bear no more!" We left the ground. The man who drove our carriage from Petersburg had two sons who belonged to the estate—small boys. He obtained a promise that they should not be sold. He was asked if they were his only children. He answered, all that's left of eight. The others had been sold to the south, and he would never see or hear from them again.

As Northern people do not see such things, they should hear of them often enough to keep them awake to the sufferings of the victims of their indifference.

Very respectfully, your friend,
ELLWOOD HARVEY.

[Compare the following law of a professedly free State, with the acts passed by several of the New England States, which prohibit all officers and citizens of those States from aiding in the arrest or detention of any person claimed as a runaway slave. We trust our friends in Illinois will not rest satisfied while this wicked and tyrannical law disgraces their State, but will exert every proper means to obtain its repeal.—Eps.]

From the Western Citizen.

ADMINISTRATION OF LAW.

"Every black or mulatto person who shall be found in this State, and not having such a certificate as is required by this chapter, shall be deemed a runaway slave or servant, and it is lawful for any inhabitant of this State to take such black or mulatto person before some Justice of the Peace, and should such black or mulatto person not produce such certificate as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of such justice to cause such black or mulatto person to be committed to the custody of the Sheriff of the county, who shall keep such black or mulatto person, and in three days after receiving him, shall advertise him at the Court-house door, and shall transmit a notice, and cause the same to be advertised for six weeks in some public newspaper printed nearest the place of apprehending such black or mulatto person, stating a description of the most remarkable features of the supposed runaway; and if such person so committed shall not produce a certificate or other evidence of his freedom, within the term aforesaid, it shall be the duty of the Sheriff to hire him out for the best price he can get, after having given five days previous notice thereof, from month to month, for the space of one year; and if no owner shall appear and substantiate his claim before the expiration of the year, the Sheriff shall give a certificate to such black or mulatto person, who, on producing the same to the next Circuit Court of the county, may obtain a certificate from the court, stating the facts, and the person shall be deemed a free person, unless he shall be lawfully claimed by his proper owner or owners hereafter."—Section 5 of the Black Laws of Illinois.

BLACK LAW EXECUTED.

"Sheriff's certificate to Harry Buckman."

This is the magistrate's superscription on the following delegation of human rights:

"State of Illinois, Madison County.

I, Andrew Miller, Sheriff of Madison county of the State of Illinois, do hereby certify that a coloured man calling himself by the name of Harry Buckman, about fifty years of age, very black, about five feet seven inches high, and having a hernia or rupture, was committed to the common jail of this county, as a runaway slave, on the 8th day of May, 1845, and has been dealt with according to the statute in such cases made and provided. He will, therefore, be considered a free man, unless lawfully claimed by his owner or owners.

ANDREW MILLER."

Sheriff of Madison Co., State of Illinois.

The bearer of the foregoing certificate is a superannuated negro, who has just reached Springfield, and is performing menial services at the "City Hotel."

The following are authenticated incidents of his eventful life. He was born in the State of Virginia, about 1796, where he lived until six years of age. His owner becoming insolvent, he was then sold from the auction stand to William Clay, of Kentucky, to which state he was soon taken. He was owned by Clay about twelve years; after which he was again sold to a Kentuckian named Garnett. This gentleman resided in that State about ten years after he had purchased this slave, (whose name was Harry Buckman) when he removed with all his family and servants to one of the border counties of Missouri. Mr. Garnett was an avaricious man, and finding that slave labour was in great demand, hired out for about fifteen years in succession, his boy Harry. The boy being about forty-four years of age, had already completed his apprenticeship, and could no longer command ordinary wages per annum. Hence, he must remain with his owner. This he did; and received as pay for his hard earnings, abuses and stripes. Harry frequently had the boldness to threaten to run away from Garnett, if he continued his harsh treatment. This thought of absconding was very pleasing to his master; and on the last occasion, when Harry was suffering abuse, he threatened, as usual, to leave. Garnett told him, with an imprecation, if he did not leave immediately, he would shoot him. Whereupon Harry resolved to start for the soil of the free.

He set out towards the Missouri river, on reaching it, he took a skiff, descended the river into the Mississippi, and landed on the Illinois side, a short distance below Alton. Being fatigued and hungry, he proceeded to the city, and while there procuring refreshments, a slave-hunter, called Baker, approached him, and pronounced him a runaway, and hurried him into the calaboose, where he remained until the next day, when he was brought before the magistrate, and having no certificate of his freedom, was sent to the county jail of Madison as the law directs; and advertised in the county newspaper as the law directs; and kept in confinement six months as the law directs; and afterwards taken out and sold by the Sheriff from month to month to pay his jail fees, as the democratic law of Illinois directs.

Thus the poor slave having been cruelly incarcerated, was sold for the first month for $4; for the second $7.12 and for the third $3, solely to pay for being imprisoned 6 months for the incorrigible sin of daring to be free, even when compelled to it. He would have been sold for the nine consecutive months, had not his health failed. But this being the result of his struggle for freedom, he was unable to pay the county for their impudently beneficence in committing him to the gloomy cells of a jail and was finally presented by the Sheriff of the county with a certificate of human rights and feelings.

Transactions of this character, are only worthy a condole of cannibals, yet their recurrence is frequent in the State of Illinois.

Harry, although an aged man, worn out and decrepit, appears to treasure as a diamond of priceless value, the parchment of human freedom, for which he paid so great a price; and although poverty-stricken, rejoices in the consciousness of being

"A man for a' that."

Springfield, Dec. 15, 1846.

K.C.

POOR WHITE FOLKS.

We find in the Home Journal a letter from the South, which gives a very graphic account of the Poor White Folks. As the writer is evidently no abolitionist, and does not hint at the cause of this state of things, he certainly ought to be admitted as good evidence.—Nat. A. S. Standard.

"I have uniformly found the people of all classes I have met with, kind and hospitable; and, being totally unarmed, have had as little fear of life or money, while travelling among them, as I would in Massachusetts. The Crackers, as they are called, are the poor, white population of Georgia—very poor and very ignorant. Very few of them can either read or write, and are too lazy to improve their condition. They abhor labour, and will only work just so much as to obtain a mere subsistence. They will take possession of any land unoccupied, which suits their fancy, without caring to whom it belongs—erect a cabin—plant a few acres of Indian corn, and a little patch of cotton to make their own cloth, and with a few pigs, a cow or two, a mule or horse, manage to live and bring up a large family in the same ignorance with themselves. When they get tired of living in one place, or have exhausted the soil of the few acres they had cultivated, they pack all their moveables into an one horse cart, and move to another county. Thus they are constantly migrating and never settled for life. Their ancestors are said to be Highland Scotch, who first settled the western part of North Carolina, from thence they have gradually worked their way into Georgia, and have commenced invading Alabama. They have no objection to working in cotton factories, and are employed in the factories which are now in operation in Georgia, and make much better operatives than our slaves—but agricultural labour they consider nigger's work. If Georgia should become a manufacturing State, as is confidently predicted, they may be usefully employed, and their condition very much ameliorated. They are generally a good-natured, inoffensive people, have a great deal of pride and independence of character, with all their poverty and ignorance. They scorn to tell a lie or steal, but are vindictive and revengeful when insulted or injured, and will not hesitate to shoot a man behind his back to revenge an injury or an insult. An instance occurred in Monroe county a few days before I passed through there. A Cracker was insulted by a neighbouring planter, and watched his opportunity to take his revenge by shooting him dead. The planter had several hundred dollars in his pocket, which were found untouched. The Cracker fled; and as the laws are so loosely administered in Georgia, he will probably escape justice.

"The Georgia planters sacrifice almost all the comforts of life, and devote all their energy and all their means to raising cotton. It is the only article they can raise that will bring them money. They buy negroes to raise cotton, and raise cotton to buy negroes. A planter with whom I spent a night, is worth $50,000. He lives in a cabin, full of wide cracks on every side, through which the wind and rain have free access, and a chimney made of sticks, cross-piled and plastered with clay. He raises, for the subsistence of his family and negroes, plenty of corn and pigs, and with corn-bread, and fried fresh pork, and smoked bacon, they live contented the year round. Yet he is not miserly, but a free-hearted man—they do not know how to live better. There are, however, exceptions—some of the wealthy planters have the comforts and even the luxuries of life, and know how to appreciate them. Their implements of husbandry are of the most rude construction. Their plows are such as we might imagine were used in scriptural times, being three sticks put together in the form of a triangle, the hypo-then use forming the handle—the point at the sharp angle being shot with iron, much in the shape of a mason's trowel, and not much larger. With this rude instrument they prepare their ground for their cotton, corn, and other crops, scratching up the soil not exceeding three inches deep. Some of the larger planters, however, have become so much enlightened as to use real Yankee plows; and a better system of cultivation is being gradually introduced."

'MUNIFICENCE' OF A SLAVE DEALER.

We published a few days since from the New Orleans Tropic an account of the 'munificence' of Mr. Isaac Franklin, who died in April last in Louisiana, leaving the principal part of his property, amounting to nearly a million of dollars, to be appropriated to the endowment of an educational establishment in Sumner Co., Tennessee. We were not aware at the time that this Mr. Franklin was the famous dealer in human flesh, whose name has so long been familiar throughout the country in connection with the firm of Franklin & Arnfield. We have often been assured that throughout the South, the negro trader is regarded with disgust and abhorrence; but this man, who amassed an immense fortune in buying and selling the bodies and souls of his fellow men, and transferring them from the comparative ease and comfort of a slave's life in the Northern Slave States, to the terrible severities of the cotton, sugar and rice plantations of the South—a doom which they dreaded often more than death—separating husbands and wives, parents and children, regardless of their cries and entreaties—this man is eulogised in the papers of the South as "an honorable and upright man," a prodigy of "benevolence and philanthropy," who lived "but for the benefit of the whole human race!" Yes, this 'soul hardened barterer in human blood,' whose

Were dim with the blood of the hearts he had sold," is represented as a man eminent for every virtue that adorns the human character! "No doubt," says the New Orleans Tropic, "he often contemplated with delight, the character and usefulness of his immortal namesake, Benjamin Franklin, and resolved in his own mind to imitate his bright example in an effort to scatter good among his fellow men." "Had he lived," continues the same authority, "in the remote times of early Greece and Rome, his fame would have descended to us in the genius of the far-famed lyric poets, who adorned those classic lands; and have been embalmed for immortality in the living pages of Thucydides, or Livy, or Tacitus." To crown all, he is represented as a "worthy Christian," who has been transferred "from a scene where suffering is predominant, to a state of perfect beatitude."

Eulogy like this bestowed on a negro trader, whose wealth was "died in human gore and steeped in widows' tears," and who left the world without one expression of regret, still less of penitence, for his life of villany, may well convince us that Coleridge was right when he said that,

"Earth's renown is infamous;
Her titles slanderous names—her praise reproach."

N. Y. Tribune.

INTELLIGENCE.

BALTIMORE, January 24, 1847.

I wrote you so recently that I have not much to communicate; but thought that a few incidents that have occurred here during the past week might be of some interest to your readers. Hope H. Slater, the notorious dealer in God's image, made a shipment of a large number of men, women, and children, for the rice swamps of the far South. The "General Pinkney," the vessel which took this freight of bodies and souls, cleared several days previous to sailing, and lay lay anchored off the "Point." And in real slaveholding style, at the appointed time, weighs anchor, drops into her berth, takes in her cargo, and immediately sails. Slater's slave prison is about two miles from the "Point." He generally, as in this case, treats his goods to an omnibus ride from their public house to the vessel, and in the free, enlightened, Christian city of Baltimore, third city of the only Republic and free country on earth, on Tuesday, January 19th, 1847, might have been seen a train of omnibuses crowded with human beings, "made but little lower than the angels," torn from all that makes life desirable, without crime or offence, and hurried off to toil "neath the burning sun of a Southern plantation," without reward, with no man to care for the soul. Following this train, was a tall, gray-headed old man, of sixty winters, on horseback. His heart was callous to the wailings of the anguished mother for her child. He heeded not the sobs of the young wife for her husband. The sister, whose grief was insupportable as she heard the last farewell, faintly uttered, from an only brother as he was hurried on board that accursed vessel, moved not the adamant heart of this human trafficker. These relations may not have existed as I have stated them, but friendship in every relation is severed by these horrible transactions. I saw a mother whose very frame was convulsed with anguish for her first-born, a girl of eighteen, who—withstanding her master was under bonds to the amount of two thousand dollars not to sell any of the family out of the State—had been sold to this dealer, and was among the number then shipped. I saw a young man who kept pace with the carriages, that he might catch one more glimpse of a dear friend before she was torn forever from his sight. As she saw him, she burst into a flood of tears, was hurried out of his sight, sorrowing most of all that they should see each other's face no more.

These are not uncommon occurrences in this city. The last Tuesday in December, there was a much larger number shipped than on last Tuesday. This is about all we see of Slavery here in the city. Humanity is not shocked, as on plantations, with the frequent floggings of the slave, or at least, it does not fall under observation, as in the other case. The effects of Slavery, however, are to be seen on every hand, and marks of this blighting system will be visible years after Slavery has been abolished.

The "Sun," of this city, a "neutral" Democratic paper, mentions the sailing of the "General Pinkney" for New Orleans, among the vessels sailed; &c., but says nothing of her cargo; two or three days after, it heads an account of the capture of two Brazilian sloops, on the coast of Angola, as slavers,—"The HORROR SLAVE-TRADE." Neither of these sloops had any slaves on board; but a vessel can sail from our port actually freighted with slaves, and the simple fact of the vessel sailing is noticed, and not a word said about "the horrid slave-trade," as if the slave-trade on the coast of Africa was any worse than on the coast of America.—A. S. Standard.

AN OLIVE LEAF FOR THE AMERICAN PEOPLE.

Friends of Humanity!—Hundreds of your fellow beings are dying, almost daily dying, of starvation in poor Ireland. Will you not send them bread from your plenteous boards? It has been stated that more have perished by famine in that afflicted land, than those who fell by the cholera in that dreadful year of death. A penny a day will save a human life. Will you let thousands die when they can be rescued so cheaply from the grave? The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ forbid! Farmers, mechanics, merchants, men of the United States, children, wives and mothers, will you let thousands of your kind be thrown uncoffined into the grave, when two cents' worth of Indian meal a day will save a human life. Mothers, sisters, daughters, wives of America! there are thousands of your sex dying naked upon the damp, cold ground in Ireland, without even straw to lie upon. Will you not look into your wardrobes and give what you can spare to the poor creatures, perishing with famine and the famine-fever? May the God of all grace and mercy and compassion touch the heart of America in view of such a spectacle of wretchedness. Anything—anything to eat or wear will come to thousands like a ministration of heaven's mercy. The English Government, as you see below, has promised to pay the freight of all contributions of food and clothing which may be forwarded from the United States. Will not the rail road companies, in the United States, and steamboat companies transport from the interior to the seaboard all such contributions free of charge? All these contributions may be consigned to the Society of Friends in England, who have made arrangements for extensive distribution to the starving, or to any other parties that may be preferred. I cannot add another word. I expect to be obliged to travel all night from London to Liverpool, to transmit the following communication from the English Government which I received after the mail was closed.

Yours for humanity,

ELIHO BURRITT.

London, Feb. 3, 1847.

To Right Hon. Lord John Russell, First Lord of the Treasury.

The undersigned citizens of the United States of America, desiring that their fellow countrymen may participate in the pleasure of contributing to the relief of their suffering brethren in Ireland, have learned with much gratification, that the English government have intimated a willingness to defray the expense of transportation of the provisions and clothing which the Society of Friends in America may contribute for the destitute Irish. The undersigned would respectfully inquire if they may be permitted to transmit to America, by the Royal Mail Packet leaving on the 4th, the intimation that the English government will defray the expense of conveying from American to Irish seaports all other contributions of provisions and clothing which may be made in, and forwarded from, the United States, for the same benevolent object.

ELIHO BURRITT, Mass. U. S. A.

JAMES L. L. F. WARREN, "

No. 27 New Broad St. London, Feb. 1st, 1847.

Treasury Chambers, Feb. 3d, 1847.

GENTLEMEN,—I am commanded by the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to acquaint you, in reply to your letter of the 1st inst. addressed to Lord John Russell, that the Lords will be prepared to pay the freight of any provisions or clothing which benevolent persons in the United States may send to Ireland or to the distressed districts in Scotland, on proof being afforded that the articles were purchased from the produce of private subscriptions, and have been appropriated to charitable objects.

I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant,
C. E. TREVELYAN.

Messrs. Elliot Barritt, and James L. L. F. Watson, 27 New Broad Street.

PROCEEDINGS IN CONGRESS. A bill which passed the house of Representatives by a majority of 9, granting monies to the President for conducting a negotiation with Mexico and containing the Wilmot proviso, is yet before the Senate. Our latest accounts represent it as probable that a vote will be taken upon it this day.

Several of the free States have instructed their Senators and requested their Representatives to vote against any acquisition of territory, except on condition that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall be allowed in it, except for crimes whereof the party shall have been duly convicted.

POETRY.

JOHN WOOLMAN.

BY ELIZABETH MARGARET CHANDLER.

Meek, humble, sinless as a very child,
Such wert thou,—and, though unheeded, I seem
Off-throes to gaze upon thy features mild,
Thy grave, yet gentle lip, and the soft beam
Of that kind eye, that knew not how to shed
A glance of aught save love, on any human head.

Servant of Jesus! Christian! not alone
In name and creed, with practice differing wide,
Thou didst not in thy conduct fear to own
His self-denying precepts for thy guide.
Storn only to thyself, all others felt Thy strong rebuke was love, not meant to crush, but melt.

Thou, who didst pour o'er all the human kind
The gushing fervour of thy sympathy!
E'en the unreasoning brute, fail'd not to find
A pleader for his happiness in thee.
Thy heart was moved for every breathing thing,
By careless man exposed to needless suffering.

But most the wrongs and sufferings of the slave,
Stirr'd the deep fountain of thy pitying heart;
And still thy hand was stretched to aid and save,
Until it seem'd that thou hadst taken a part
In their existence, and couldst hold no more
A separate life from them, as thou hadst done before.

How the sweet pathos of thy eloquence,
Beautiful in its simplicity, went forth
Entreating for them! that this vile offence,
So unbecoming of our country's worth,
Might be removed before the threatening cloud,
Thou saw'st o'erhanging it, should burst in storm and blood.

So may thy name be revered,—thou wert one
Of those whose virtues link us to our kind;
By our best sympathies; thy day is done,
But its sweet twilight lingers still behind,
In thy pure memory; and we bless thee yet,
For the example fair thou hast before us set.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

LIFE OF WILLIAM ALLEN. — The subscriber will be obliged to those Agents for the above work who have not yet forwarded names to do so immediately. He has obtained from a few p.l.e. about half the required number of subscribers, and believes that the remainder can be procured with a little effort. Without this, the work will be given up, and those who wish it will have to pay nearly double the sum for English copies, as there will be no other American edition. All therefore who wish the work will please write immediately or send their names through Agents, as the second volume has reached this country, and it is desirable to commence it at once. Both volumes may be ready within two months if a sufficient number of subscribers should be obtained.

HENRY LONGSTRETH,
247 Market st., Philadelphia.

H. L. has just published a small edition of Maria Fox's life, at one dollar and fifty cents—either in sheep or muslin binding. Those who wish to secure copies for themselves or libraries will please remit the amount as soon as possible. He has also published a large edition of Sumner's clear and very forcible oration on the "True Grandeur of Nations," which he will sell at one dollar for ten copies or eight dollars for one hundred—less the cost. The friends of Peace have now an opportunity of procuring this valuable work at about one third the price of the Boston edition. The amount may be forwarded by mail with directions how to send them. Please direct to

HENRY LONGSTRETH, 247 Market st., Philadelphia.

Free Labour Dry Goods and Groceries.

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL.

Fresh and new goods just received, consisting in part of Shirting and Sheetting Muslin, Bleached and Brown.
"Manchester" Ginghams of superior quality, various styles.
2d Quality do. assorted patterns.
Calico, do. do.
Coloured Cambrics and Canton Flannels, assorted colours.
Bleached and Brown do. do. and Table Diapers.
Coloured Table Cloth, Imitation of Linen.
Cotton Hdkts, assorted styles.
Long and Half Hose, superior and heavy.
Aprons and Furniture Check.
Cotton Twilled Pantaloons Stuff.
Kilting Cotton, various Nos., Bleached, Brown and Coloured.
Cotton Laps and Wadding, white and coloured. Also,
Refined food, Crushed and Pulverized Sugar.
Brown Sugar, good quality, of different grades, by the barrel, bag, or pound.
Sugar House and West India Molasses, good quality.
Rice, Coffee and Chocolate.
STRENGTH TEAR, SELECTED WITH CARE FOR FAMILY USE OF stores, V.L. Fine Galung, Souchong and other Black Teas; also Green Tea of superior quality.
Various Sauces and Confectionery, &c. &c. The whole stock exclusively of Free Labour Goods, in which the subscriber would invite the attention of Country Merchants, as well as his friends and the public generally.
GEORGE W. TAYLOR,
Successor to Joel Fisher,
N. W. corner Fifth and Cherry Sts.
Philadelphia, 96 no. 24th, 1847.

PRINTED AT

Merrihew & Thompson's Book & Job Office,
No. 7 Carter's Alley.

THE NON-SLAVERHOLDER.

"Whoso gives the motive, makes his brother's sin his own."

VOL. II.] PHILADELPHIA, FOURTH MONTH, 1847. [NO. 4.

SELECTIONS.

From the Tenth London Edition, 1791.

AN ADDRESS TO THE PEOPLE OF GREAT BRITAIN,

On the propriety of obtaining from West-India Sugar and Rum.

Why did all-creating Nature
Make the plant for which we toil?
Fishes must feed it, fowls must water,
Sweat of ours must dress the soil,
Think ye, masters, from the soil,
Lolling at your jovial boards,
Think how many blacks have perished
For the sweets your Cane affords.
COWPER'S NEGRO'S COMPLAINT.

The Tenth Edition.

Sold by M. GUNTER, No. 129 Holborn Hill, T. KNOTT, No. 47 Lombard Street, and G. FOSTER, No. 31 Poultry. 1791.
Price 1d. or four for 3d. nine for 6d. and sixteen for 1s. or 6d. for 2s. 6d.

Notwithstanding the late determination of the House of Commons on the Slave Trade, we may hope that the discussion it has received will not be useless; and that the public attention has not been excited in vain, to a system of cruelty which it is painful even to recite. It may be hoped that, claiming for ourselves the most perfect freedom, we shall no longer impose upon others a slavery the most oppressive; and that, enjoying a degree of felicity unequalled in any age or country, we shall no longer range the world to increase the misery of mankind.

The lust of power, and the pride of conquest, have doubtless produced instances far too numerous, of man enslaved by man. But we, in an enlightened age, have greatly surpassed, in brutality and injustice, the most ignorant and barbarous ages; and while we are pretending to the finest feelings of humanity, are exercising unprecedented cruelty. We have planted slavery in the rank soil of sordid avarice, and the produce has been misery in the extreme. We have ascertained, by a course of experiments in cruelty, the least portion of nourishment requisite to enable man to linger a few years in misery; the greatest quantity of labour which, in such a situation, the extreme of punishment can extort; and the utmost degree of pain, labour, and hunger united, that the human frame can endure.

In vain have such scenes been developed. The wealth derived from the horrid traffic, has created an influence that secures its continuance; unless the people at large shall refuse to receive the produce of robbery and murder.

The legislature having refused to interpose, the people are now necessarily called on, either to reprobate or approve the measure; for West-India slavery must depend upon their support for its existence, and it is in the power of every individual to increase, or to diminish its extent. The laws of our country may indeed prohibit us the sugar-cane, unless we will receive it through the medium of slavery. They may hold it to our lips, steeped in the blood of our fellow-creatures; but they cannot compel us to accept the loathsome potion. With us it rests, either to receive it and be partners in the crime, or to exonerate ourselves from guilt, by spurning from us the temptation. For let us not think, that the crime rests alone with those who conduct the traffic, or the legislature by which it is protected. If we purchase the commodity we participate in the crime. The slave-dealer, the slave-holder, and the slave-driver, are virtually the agents of the consumer, and may be considered as employed and hired by him to procure the commodity. For, by holding out the temptation, he is the original cause, the first mover in the horrid process; and every distinction is done away by the moral maxim, That whatever we do by another, we do ourselves.

Nor are we by any means warranted to consider our individual share in producing these evils in a trivial point of view. The consumption of sugar in this country is so immense, that the quantity commonly used by individuals will have an important effect. A family that uses five lbs. of sugar per week, with the proportion of rum, will, by the abstaining from the consumption twenty-one months, prevent the slavery or murder of one fellow-creature; eight such families in nineteen and a half years, prevent the slavery and murder of one hundred, and 38,000 would totally prevent the Slave Trade to supply our islands. Nay, so necessarily connected are our consumption of the commodity and the misery resulting from it, that in every pound of sugar used, (the produce of slaves imported from Africa) we may be considered as consuming two ounces of human flesh, besides destroying an alarming number of seamen by the slave-trade, and spreading inconceivable anguish, terror, and dismay, through an immense continent, by the burning of their villages, tearing parents from their families, and children from their parents; breaking every bond of society, and destroying every source of human happiness. A French writer observes, "That he cannot look on a piece of sugar without conceiving it stained with spots of human blood;" and Dr. Franklin adds, that had he taken in all the consequences, "he might have seen the sugar not merely spotted, but thoroughly dyed scarlet in grain."

Dreadful consideration, that our increasing happiness and prosperity has spread desolation and misery over a country as large as all Europe! For it is an indisputable fact, that it is British luxury the African slave-trade depends on for support: they have increased, and they would fall together. For our consumption of sugar is now so immense, that it nearly equals that of all Europe besides; and Jamaica now supplies more than all our West India Islands did at any period prior to 1765.

But amazingly extensive as is the increase of the culture, so far is it from keeping pace with our luxury, that (before the disturbances in the French Islands, within these two or three years) sugars have ever sold in the British market twenty or thirty, sometimes fifty per cent. dearer than in any other part of the world. Nor is it to support the old plantations, as is pretended, but to form new ones, for the supply of this our increasing luxury, that the wretched Africans are torn from their native land.

Let us then imagine our immense consumption wholly or in great part to cease, and our sugars to be thrown on the foreign markets; would additional slaves be wanted to supply an overflowing market at a falling price? No: the African Slave Trade, by whomsoever conducted, to supply sugar colonies, by whatever nation possessed, must totally cease. Horror and dismay would give place to peace and civilization, through a coast of above three thousand miles extent, and above a thousand miles inland: for so extensive are our depredations, and so extensive are the benefits which it is in our power to confer. Nor would the beneficial effects cease even here. The West India Islands, finding less demand for sugar, must appropriate less ground to the sugar-cane, and leave more for provisions: the slaves would be less worked, better fed, and in a few years consist entirely of native Creoles. Or if the planters appropriate the land to the other productions of the islands, the same beneficial effects must ensue. For Mr. Cooke tells us, "the cultivation of cotton, pimento, and coffee, is easier than sugar: the slaves look better and increase faster;" and instead of requiring additional slaves, they would be able to increase their plantations with those already in the islands. For Governor Parry says, "one acre of sugar requires as much labour as three of cotton." Thus our refraining from the consumption of the sugar-cane, even for a few years, would destroy the Slave Trade to the West India Islands, bring fresh land into culture, and place the slaves in such a situation, that they must rapidly increase.

The diminution of the consumption of West India produce, would also have a powerful effect by sinking the price of the commodity; and thereby take away the temptation to import additional slaves. The effect a small variation in the supply or demand has on the price, we have recently experienced. The disturbances in the French sugar islands, has suddenly raised some of the markets, which were twenty or thirty per cent. lower than the British, much above it; and thereby occasioned an exportation from this country to supply the deficiency: and our exportation, though only amounting to a tenth of our importation, has raised our sugars fifty per cent. And as a fall in the price would obstruct the Slave Trade, and meliorate the condition of the slaves; so this rise will produce effects the most baneful. The planter, tempted by the high price to get sugar and rum to market while that high price continues, will deprive his slaves of their provision grounds, to plant them with canes; and by the energy of the whip, they will be forced to the most extreme exertions. The murder, or, in the technical language of the West Indies, the loss of his slaves, will be to him but a secondary consideration. The large crop, and the high price, will amply compensate him: and the question now is, not merely whether we shall hold out to him an inducement to purchase additional slaves, but whether we shall tempt him to murder those he already has. We can hardly doubt, but that West India packets have already borne the murderous dispatches, expressed in language too dreadfully explicit, and to the following effect: "The price of sugar and rum still continues high. You must adopt every mode to forward as large a cargo as possible. A fortunate crisis now offers itself for extricating my estate from the difficulties in which it is involved. We must avail ourselves of it: another may never occur. Consequences, though disagreeable, must at the present moment be overlooked. The slave-market is still open for a supply. New-fangled humanity is no more!" The day hardly dawns when the whip resounds through those regions of horror; nor ceases, till darkness closes the scene, which day after day is renewed. The miserable victims, destitute of every source of comfort to body or to mind, and sinking under the three endemic diseases of our islands, hunger, torture, and extreme labour; and urged to exertions they are unable to sustain, at length expire beneath the lash, which in vain endeavours to rouse them to a renewal of their labour.

As neither the slave-dealer, nor the planter, can have any moral right to the person of him they style their slave, to his labour, or to the produce of it; so they can convey no right in that produce to us: and whatever number of hands it may pass through, if the criminal circumstances appertaining to it be known to them at the time of the transfer, they can only have a criminal possession: and the money paid, either for the slave, or for the produce of his labour, is paid to obtain that criminal possession: and can confer no moral right whatever. So, if the death of the person called a slave, be occasioned by the criminal possession, the criminal possessor is guilty of murder; and we, who have knowingly done any act which might occasion his being in that situation, are accessaries to the murder before the fact; as by receiving the produce of his labour, we are accessaries to the robbery, after the fact.

If we as individuals concerned in the Slave Trade (either by procuring the Slaves, compelling them to labour, or receiving the produce) imagine that our share in the transaction is so minute that it cannot perceptibly increase the injury; let us recollect that, though numbers partaking of a crime may diminish the shame, they cannot diminish its turpitude. Can we suppose, that an injury of enormous magnitude can take place, and the criminality be destroyed merely by the criminals becoming so numerous as to render their respective shares indistinguishable? Were an hundred assassins to plunge their daggers into their victim, though each might plead, that without his assistance the crime would have been completed, and that his poniard neither occasioned nor accelerated the murder, yet every one of them would be guilty of the entire crime. For into how many parts soever a criminal action may be divided, the crime itself rests entire and complete on every perpetrator.

But waving this latter consideration, and even supposing for a moment, that the evil has an existence from causes totally independent of us. Yet it exists, and as we have it in our power jointly with others, to remedy it, it is undoubtedly our duty to contribute our share, in hope that others will theirs; and to act that part from conscience, which we should from inclination in similar cases that interested our feelings.

For instance; let us suppose the Algerines to establish sugar plantations, and resort to the banks of the Thames for slaves, as the only place to be insulted with impunity. Suppose our wives, our husbands, our children, our parents, our brethren, swept away, and the fruit of their labour, produced with agonizing hearts and trembling limbs, landed at the port of London. What would be our conduct? Should we say sugar is a necessary of life: I cannot do without it. Besides, the quantity I use is but a small proportion: and though it is very criminal of the Algerines to enslave others, yet I am not bound to look to the nature or consequences of the transaction; and paying for the sugar, I have a right to consume it, however it may have been obtained. If such would be our language in that case, be it so on the present occasion. For let us recollect, that the only difference is, that in one case our relation to the enslaved is rather more remote, but that in both cases they are our brethren.

But it is hardly requisite to state so strong a case as that supposed. For were only one Englishman to receive injuries, that bore but the slightest resemblance to those daily committed in our islands, the nation would be inflamed with resentment, and clamorous to avenge the injury. And can our pride suggest to us, that the rights of men are limited to any nation, or to any colour? Or, were any one to treat a fellow creature in this country as we do the unhappy Africans in the West Indies; struck with horror, we would be zealous to deliver the oppressed, and punish the oppressor. Are then the offices of humanity and functions of justice to be circumscribed by geographical boundaries? Can reason, can conscience justify this contrast in our conduct between our promptitude, in the one case, and our torpor in the other?—Mr. Addison justly observes, that "humanity to become estimable must be combined with justice!" But we seem to act as if we thought that the relief of our fellow creatures, protection from injuries, communication of benefits, were works of supererogation, to be granted or withheld, as caprice, or custom, or inclination may suggest.

After the important considerations adduced, it might be reckoned a degradation of the subject to mention the national dignity; or even that might induce us to counteract a powerful body of men, who are trampling under foot the dictates of humanity, and the interest of the nation: men, who have in fifty years received for sugar alone, above seventy millions more than it would have cost at any other market. And from Mr. Botham's evidence it appears, that in Batavia, where labour is as high as in England, sugar, equal to the best West India, is sold at 1*l*. 6*s*. per pound. These are the men who are endeavouring to overflow a plan for supplying us with sugars, by means of free labour; and have the audacity to tell the British legislature, "That they cannot abolish the slave trade; for that if England refuse to furnish them with slaves, they will obtain a supply through other channels." And a governor of Barbadoes admonishes us, "From policy, to leave the islands to the quiet management of their own affairs." These nominal colonies have, it seems, been taught that we have no right to control them; that the acts of their Assemblies alone are obligatory; and that those of British legislators, are binding only on those whom they represent. The right of enslaving others, they contend for, as the most valuable of their privileges.

Thus it appears, that the legislature is not only unwilling, but perhaps unable, to grant redress; and therefore it is more peculiarly incumbent on us, To obtain from the use of sugar and rum, until our West India planters themselves have prohibited the importation of additional slaves, and commenced as speedy and effectual a subversion of slavery in their islands, as the circumstances and situation of the slaves will admit: or till we can obtain the produce of the sugar-cane in some other mode, unconnected with slavery, and unpolluted with blood.

For surely it may be hoped that we shall not limit our views merely to the abolition of the African slave trade, as the colonial slavery formed on it is in its principle equally unjust. For if it be iniquitous to force the Africans from their native land; equally iniquitous must it be, to retain them and their posterity in perpetual bondage. Though the African slave trade be the most prominent feature in this wickedness, yet it is but a feature: and were it abolished, the West Indian slavery would still exist. Our planters would breed instead of importing slaves, and shall we suffer half a million of fellow subjects and their posterity, to be held in slavery forever! I say, fellow-subjects. For undoubtedly every person born in the dominions of Great Britain is a subject, bound to obey and entitled to the protection of the common law of England; and in opposition to which, the acts of assemblies, existing merely by grant from the crown, can be of no authority.

In demanding liberty then for the persons called slaves in our islands, we demand no more than they are entitled to by the common law of the land. The most eligible mode of putting them in possession of their legal and natural right, may be a question of difficulty: but it is a question that ought to be considered with no other view, but to their happiness. The plan to be adopted, ought to be certain and speedy in its operation; without any consideration of the supposed, or even real interest, of their oppressors; and let it be remembered, that it is in the power of a small proportion of the people of England to effect it, by refusing to receive the produce. For the planters themselves would adopt the plan, were that the only condition on which we would consume the produce of their islands; nor would the legislature then be harassed with preposterous claims for compensation; which, however, unfounded in justice or reason, will be supported by influence, and enforced with clamour.

The case now fully lies before us; and we have to make our choice, either to join ourselves with the manufacturers of human woe, or to renounce the horrid association. If we adopt the former, let us at least have the candour to avow our conduct in its real deformity. Let us no longer affect to deplore the calamities attendant on the Slave Trade, of which we are the primary cause: nor let us pretend to execrate the conduct of the slave dealer, the slaveholder or the slave-driver; but apologize for them as our partners in iniquity: and be assured, that if we take our share in the transaction, we should; were we placed in a similar situation with them, with as little compunction take theirs; unless we can suppose the order of nature would be so far inverted, as that we should become virtuous, in proportion as the temptation to vice increased. Nor should we then, any more than now, be desirous of subterfuges to destroy the feelings of our minds, and the convictions of our consciences.

If ignorance and inattention may be pleaded as our excuse hitherto, yet that can be the case no longer. The subject has been four years before the public. Its dreadful wickedness has been fully proved. Every falsehood, every deception with which it has been disguised, has been completely done away; and it stands before us in all its native horrors. No longer can it be pretended, that Africa is a barbarous, uncultivated land, inhabited by a race of savages inferior to the rest of the human species. Mr. How, who was employed by government, to go up to the country, deposes, that the inland is every where well cultivated, abounding with rice, millet, potatoes, cotton and indigo plantations; and that the inhabitants are quick at learning languages, and remarkably industrious, hospitable and obliging. It appears that they possess noble and heroic minds, disdaining slavery, and frequently seeking refuge from it in the arms of death. Nor shall we be again told, of the superior happiness they enjoy under the benevolent care of the planters; Mr. Coor having deposed, "that setting slaves to work in the morning, is attended with loud peals of whipping;"—and General Tottenham, "that there is no comparison between regimental flogging, which only cuts the skin, and the plantation, which cuts out the flesh;"—Capt. Hall, "that the punishments are very shocking, much more so than in men of war;" Capt. Smith, "that at every stroke of the whip, a piece of flesh is cut out;"—and Mr. Ross, "that he considers a comparison between West India slaves, and the British peasantry, as an insult to common sense."

We are now called on to redress evils, in comparison with which all that exist in this nation sink beneath our notice; and the only sacrifice we are required to make in order to effect it, is the abandoning of a luxury, which habit alone can have rendered of importance. If we refuse, can we form the least pretence to a moral character? May it not justly be inferred, that those numerous displays of humanity, of which this kingdom boasts, have not their foundation in any virtuous or valuable principle; but that to custom and ostentation they owe their origin? And if our execration of the slave trade be any more than mere declamation against crimes we are not in a situation to commit, we shall, instead of being solicitous to find despicable distinctions to justify our conduct, abhor the idea of contributing, in the least degree, to such scenes of misery.

If these be the deductions from the most obvious principles of reason, justice, and humanity, what must be the result if we extend our views to religious considerations? It will hardly be said, that we assume a religious profession to diminish the extent of our moral duties, or to weaken the force of our obligation to observe them.

We will therefore ask, if it be meant to insult the God we pretend to worship, by supplicating him to "have mercy upon all prisoners and captives," and to "defend and provide for the fatherless, widows, and children, and all that are desolate and oppressed." But if the national religion be a mere matter of form, yet surely we may expect that the various denominations of dissenters, will think it at the least, as requisite to dissent from the national crimes, as the national religion; unless they mean to exhibit consciences of so peculiar a texture, as to take offence at the religion of their country, while they can conform without scruple to its most criminal practices. If indeed they are satisfied, after an impartial examination, that the traffic alluded to is fair and honest, and that the produce ought to be considered as the result of lawful commerce, it will become them to encourage it; it will become them to reprobate this work as an attempt to slander honest men, and to injure their property, by holding it out to the public, as the produce of robbery and murder. But, if the arguments be valid, will they presume to treat the subject with cool indifference, and continue a criminal practice? May we not also hope that the Methodists, who appear to feel forcibly their principles, will seriously consider it? They are so numerous, as to be able of themselves to destroy that dreadful traffic, which is the sole obstacle to their ministers spreading the gospel in the extensive continent of Africa; and however others may affect to degrade the Negroes, they are bound to consider thousands of them as their brethren in Christ.

But there is one class of dissenters who justly stand high in the public estimation, for their steady, manly, and uniform opposition to our colonial slavery. And can it be supposed that, after having awakened the public attention, they can refuse to contribute what is in their own power to remedy the evil? The plan proposed is a plain and obvious deduction from their uniform principle of having no concern in what they disapprove. Thus considering war as unlawful, they consider goods obtained through that medium as criminally obtained; and will not suffer any of their members to purchase prize-goods: and surely they must consider the seizure of a man's goods, as a crime far inferior to the seizing of his person.

However obvious the duty, yet the mind hardened by habit, admits with difficulty the conviction of guilt, and sanctioned by a common practice, we may commit the grossest violations of duty without remorse. It is therefore more peculiarly incumbent on us in such situations to examine our conduct with the utmost suspicion, and to fortify our minds with moral principles, or the sanctions of religion. In proportion as we are under their influence, we shall exert ourselves to remedy these evils, knowing that our example or admonitions, or influence, may produce remote effects, of which we can form no estimate; and which, after having done our duty, must be left to Him who governs all things after the counsel of his own will.

From the Emancipator.

THE COMPROMISE BROKEN.

The South the Aggressor.

CINCINNATI, March 3d, 1847.

Mr. Calhoun, in his late speech, upon those "abstractions," as Mr. Benton calls them, complains much of the "aggressive policy of the non-slaveholding States," and said "that he had done with compromises. He wanted no more of them. The South had always lost by them; always would."

What an array of facts might be adduced to show that the reverse has been uniformly true. Many of these have been made known to the people of the North, through your paper, and others opposed to slavery. But there is one remarkable fact, that has been allowed to slumber. It is a portion of the history of our government, that I have seen no public notice of.

As late as the year 1837, territory of more than one hundred miles in length, by thirty-five miles in mean breadth, containing more than 3500 square miles, being much larger than the State of Delaware, lying above thirty-nine degrees of latitude, was annexed to a slaveholding State. The line of compromise it will be remembered, was thirty-six degrees, thirty minutes, above which there was to be no slavery, except in the State of Missouri, as its boundaries were then limited.

A member of the bar of this city has been travelling over this territory recently, and informs me that it is a very fertile, beautiful region of country, that he found it settled by slaveholders, one of whom, at whose house he tarried, had sixty slaves.

The facts in this matter, are readily found in our public records. On the sixth of March, 1820, an act was passed for the admission of Missouri as one of the States of the Union. Her boundaries were distinctly marked. Her Western line was to be as straight as surveyors could make it, it was to run North and South upon a meridian line. The southern side, with the exception of a short distance, was the same as latitude 36° 30', continuing "thence along the same to a point where the said parallel is intersected by a meridian line passing through the middle of the mouth of the Kansas River, where the same empties into the Missouri river, thence from the point aforesaid north, along the said meridian line, to the intersection of the parallel of latitude which passes through the rapids of the river Des Moines."

The 8th and last section of the same act provides "that slavery and involuntary servitude, otherwise than in the punishment of crime, is hereby prohibited from all the territory North of 36° 30' not included in the limits of the State," as above bounded.

Between the Western boundary as thus settled, and the Missouri river, there is a large extent of territory, of which certain Indian tribes then held the title.

In the year 1836, on the 7th of June, it was "enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives, of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That when the Indian title to all the lands lying between the State of Missouri and the Missouri river shall be extinguished, the jurisdiction over said land shall be hereby ceded to the State of Missouri, and the Western boundary of said State shall be then extended to the Missouri river, reserving to the United States the original right of soil in said lands, and of disposing of the same.

Provided, That this act shall not take effect until the President shall by Proclamation, declare that the Indian title to said lands has been extinguished, nor shall it take effect until the State of Missouri shall have assented to the provisions of this act."

On the 16th of December, 1836, the General Assembly of Missouri did express their assent.— And then soon after the Proclamation was issued, which after reciting the above facts, concludes thus:

"And therefore, I, Martin Van Buren, President of the United States of America, do by this my proclamation, declare and make known that the Indian title to all the said lands, lying between the State of Missouri and the Missouri river has been extinguished, and that the said act of Congress of the 7th June, 1836, takes effect from the date hereof."

These proceedings admit and prove the whole thing, which it is the object of this letter to call attention to.

Under the covert of Indian Negotiations, the money of northern men has been taken from the Treasury, and paid for this land, and then in violation of the solemn decree of 1820, it has been smuggled into the slaveholder's dominions.

What a comment is this upon the untiring vigilance of our Northern Representatives! and what an illustration of the policy and tact of the slave power in grasping every inch of territory that it can bring under its sway.

This fact suggests many reflections, but my object is obtained, if it can gain publicity.

Yours, &c.,

JAMES BRUNY.

COMMUNICATIONS.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

An evil, sustained by the strong arm of the law, and by popularity, pride, and prejudice, however flagrant its character, claims but a small share of serious consideration from those who float with the current. In vain does philanthropy appeal to these in the most persuasive eloquence. In vain does argument, however clear and conclusive its demonstration, appeal to their reason. In vain does divine grace apply to their hearts, for the establishment of kindness, benevolence and justice. To these in vain are made the most heart-piercing appeals of suffering humanity for mercy, for relief from the galling yoke of oppression. They seem to be insensible of the fact, that slavery in the United States is such an evil, and that its helpless victims have long endured, and are now enduring, the bitterest sufferings—sufferings repulsive to humanity and Christianity.

But there are others, I trust, who have not entirely given themselves up to be driven by the wind of custom and popularity, who are yet susceptible of impression. Even the statesman, whose mind is not enveloped in midnight darkness, must be led to serious reflection when, for the maintenance of slavery, he sees implements of death, the bayonet, the sword, and the cannon, brought in requisition to spread devastation and ruin over a neighbouring land. The man who regards merely his own pecuniary interest, when he, too, sees the nation expending millions upon millions in a barbarous warfare for the perpetuity of the slave system, will be led to enquire into the necessity, utility, justice, and propriety of these transactions. The day of the slave's liberation may be thus advancing, and herein will be verified the declaration of the prophet, when he said, "Thine own iniquities shall correct thee, and thy backslidings shall reprove thee." While inquiry is raised in these classes, it would be uncharitable not to believe that amongst the religious professors an inquiry will also be awakened how far this system of slavery comports with the precepts of the gospel; whether it be compatible with moral justice; how much it is injurious to the enslaver and the enslaved; in what degree it furnishes all who come in contact with it; why it has been so long sustained, and wherefore it should be still tolerated with all its innumerable evils. Can inquiries of this character fail to produce beneficial results in behalf of the slave, and his master—both objects of pity? I trust they cannot, for right thinking is the proper prelude to right acting. Will not the promptings, too, of the good remembrances prove successful in the minds of some, to excite the inquiry how far they who hold no slaves, and yet willingly and voluntarily share in the products of their coerced soil, are contributing to the holding of the slave. Reader, hast thou made this inquiry with a sincerity commensurate to the occasion? Does not thy brother's blood cry from the ground?

The truth is too plain to require argument to prove it, that the purchase and consumption of slave labour products furnish the principal inducement for the holding of the slave. Why then do we not apply the axe to the root of the "corrupt" system by refusing to use these products. In this way the work of emancipation may be performed with safety and certainty, and will abundantly harmonize with, and aid all other moral and Christian modes of action.

Every Friend admits the injustice and wickedness of slaveholding; what valid reason can he then give in justification of a free and unreserved use of slave labour products, that the slaveholder might not urge in defence of holding his slaves? I confess I do not know. If I did, I might come to a better understanding of how the plaster quietens his conscience in claiming property in his fellow man. It is a serious thing for any one knowingly, and without necessity, to strengthen the hands of the oppressor.

Is there not then a large field of labour to be performed, if Friends wash their hands from the guilt of this foul system? Their participation in this business is large—their mercantile and manufacturing operations in slave labour products extensive—the amount of such products consumed by them very great. The number of Friends in the United States is probably 100,000, and nine-tenths of these, doubtless, are participants in slave labour products. To supply the market thus created by Friends, must require the labour of several thousand slaves. How long will these things be? The slaveholders are aware of these facts, and understand perfectly well how they are patronized and aided in holding their slaves.

A female Friend, who has recently been travelling in the southern States, informed me that the planters, in defending their cause, would often remind her that those who shared in slave labour products were as responsible for the existence of slavery as themselves, and derived equal, if not greater advantage from the system than the immediate holder of the slave. This unhappy circumstance of our participation in the evil seems calculated abundantly to diminish the force of any exhortations we may make with the planter to yield to the demands of justice and Christianity, and let the bondman go free. It gives him too much occasion to say, "first cast the beam out of thine own eye, then shalt thou see clearly to cast the mote out of thy brother's eye."

Oh! how I want to see Friends cleanse their own hands from the pollution of slavery—then there would be a putting shoulder to shoulder in the good work of its abolition—then the testimony on this point would be felt far and wide, shining with noon-day brilliancy. The being blessed with the requisite means for the accomplishment of our humane and Christian duties, necessarily involves deep and serious responsibility.

While each succeeding day is gradually, but surely, drawing us forward towards that bourne from whence no traveller returns, where each is to "receive a reward according to the deeds done in the body," what great wisdom it would be to bear in mind that the time will soon be passed, in which we can perform the obligations of justice and humanity which are due from us to the suffering bondman.

D. I.

For the Non-Slaverholder.

In reading Daniel Wheeler's Journal of his mission to the islands of the Pacific, I was struck with the following passage. Speaking of the gross licentiousness of the crews of numerous vessels trading in that ocean, he says: (Am. Ed., p. 303-4.) "Circumstances of this infamous nature can not be made too public. The majority of the people of England, and that of the most virtuous part of the community, little know at home the ravages their own countrymen are making abroad; nor can they possibly contemplate the depths of the misery, suffering, and aggravated distress they are inflicting upon these unhappy and helpless islanders. I have no doubt but there are many who, if they could see what we have seen, would wash their hands of the guilt of partaking of the luxuries and supposed necessary supplies for the comfort of life, furnished from distant and foreign climes through such a channel, much less be found deriving a profit through the exertions of agents of Satan, who are thus so extensively and destructively contributing to afflict the human race wherever they go."

"If they could see what we have seen." Men are far more deeply affected by the sight of sin and wretchedness than by mere report. If the sugar plantations of Brazil and Cuba and Louisiana, and the cotton and rice grounds of our southern States, could but reveal their deep iniquities, would men of tender consciences supply their families with luxuries from such a source? Would they not feel that increased demand occasions increased supply, and that increased supply of slave produce must be preceded by increased activity of the slave dealer, and severity of the driver?

Would not the purity of mind which discerns "guilt" in partaking of luxuries procured honestly, but by flagrantly immoral agents, also discern it, if fairly directed to the subject, in a participation in those articles furnished by "the crying curse of Christendom?" Slavery scourges and depopulates Africa on the one hand, and on the other, through wide realms in the western hemisphere, induces a violation of every precept of the decalogue. Shall we help by our custom to perpetuate and extend it? Vermont.

ASSOCIATED ACTION.

A REVIEW

OF A PAMPHLET ENTITLED

"An Appeal to the Public on behalf of a House of Refuge for Coloured Juvenile Delinquents."

(Concluded.)

Pauperism.

We will now recur to this subject, the consideration of which we postponed to that relating to crime and the statistics of the prisons. The first paragraph of the "Appeal," which bears immediately upon this subject, states "the ratio of coloured to white paupers in Blockley Alms House on the 3d of January, 1846, was more than one to seven." The Committee have not had the opportunity of making recent investigations as to the particular condition of the coloured population on this head. But the statistics of the "Appeal" correspond so nearly with those collected by the predecessors of this committee in 1838, that we think it quite sufficient to refer the reader to a document issued by us in that year, in which the subject is fully considered, and from which we shall subsequently present some extracts. In relation however to that document, we will briefly state that it was prepared as above stated by this Committee, which was appointed in 1838 for the express purpose of promoting the improvement and well-being of the coloured people. Their Reports, signed by Dr. Joseph Parrish, Chairman, and Edward Needles, as Secretary, were published by direction of the Abolition Society.

In respect to the statistics of the Alms House, collected by the Committee in 1838, and published in their report, "we will briefly observe that the Steward of that Institution afforded us every facility in his power for collating the information contained in the various records exhibited on that occasion, and we believe may be fully relied upon in all the particulars stated." From that pamphlet we extract the following, to wit:

"Upon the subject of Pauperism and of Crime, in respect to which we hear such severe denunciations of the coloured people, as being that class of persons who fill our alms-houses and jails, and are therefore considered to be an oppressive burden upon the community, your committee will now make a few observations, to wit:

"In approaching this part of the subject, we are well aware of the difficulties we have to encounter in obtaining a just estimate of the value of the coloured people, as a component part of the community, when the census of the alms-house is made the criterion by which they are to be judged. But when we consider that, owing to the feelings and prejudices of the community, the coloured people are almost altogether deprived of the opportunity of bringing up their children to mechanical employments, to commercial business, or other more lucrative occupations, whereby so many of our white labourers are enabled to rise above the drudgery in which they commence their career in life, and in turn to become the patrons of their younger or less fortunate fellow citizens, it is not matter of surprise that a considerable number of them should be dependant on public support.

Under these circumstances it certainly cannot be considered unreasonable that in a gross population of 1,673 individuals in our alms-house (on the 30th of Twelfth month, 1837,) there should be found 235 people of colour, being about one-seventh part of the whole.

Upon strict investigation, founded upon official documents, it will appear that out of 106 men and boys in the house at the date above mentioned, there were:

Afflicted with lunacy, paralysis, blindness, and idiocy, diseases which may be referred to no act of theirs,	16
Cripples, frost-bitten, and other diseases, the effect of exposure,	11

Cases of consumption and rheumatism, from exposure,	-
Ill of pleurisy, typhus fever, &c.	12
Destitute boys,	5
Destitute old men,	8
Properly paupers,	32
Not classed,	13

From the same source it appears that there were at the same date, 129 coloured females; amongst whom are,

Affected with lunacy, insanity, and old age	32
Lame,	2
Blind,	3
Idiot,	2
Deaf and Dumb,	1
Lying-in-women, children and orphans,	24
Affected with sickness and debility of various kinds,	32
Not classed,	8
May be considered as real paupers,	26

129

In regard to age, there were of the men and boys, under age, - - - - - 18
Between 21 and 50, - - - - - 57
" 50 and 75, - - - - - 18

93

Of the females—under age,	33
Between 18 and 40,	50
40 " 50,	9
50 " 60,	8
60 " 70,	6
70 " 80,	2
Above one hundred,	2
Not classed,	10

129

In respect to the employment of the males—
Denominated laborers, - - - - - 44
Having no trade, (of course they are also laborers or job workers,) - - - - - 29
Engaged in various occupations or trades, - - - - - 20
Not classed, - - - - - 13

From the foregoing facts is deduced the previous argument, that according to their grade in society, and their manner of occupation, it would be reasonable to expect a large proportion of their numbers would require pecuniary support.

With regard to the habits of the coloured portion of the residents of the alms-house, the documents furnish the following classifications, viz:

Of the males, set down as temperate, (besides 13 lunatics and 5 boys,) - - -	25
Moderately temperate, - - -	18
Intemperate, - - -	32
Not classed, - - -	13
Of the females marked as temperate, - - -	68
Moderately temperate, - - -	25
Intemperate, - - -	29
Not classed, - - -	7
	129

From these statements, derived from official documents, it appears that 93 are classed as temperate, exclusive of 13 lunatics, and 5 boys; being 40 per cent. temperate. Forty-three are moderately temperate. Eighty-one are intemperate, including those not classed; being nearly one-third of the whole number, and even including the forty-three denominated moderate, making 124, will not be quite one-half to be set down as intemperate. Whereas, it is asserted by the Steward, and the fact will, we believe, be admitted by any of the Managers of the house, that of the whole number of paupers admitted, eight-tenths are intemperate; giving to the coloured population a decided superiority, with regard to habits, over the rest of the residents of the house. And this character your committee think, will be sustained by the observation of disinterested persons in our streets, where it is rather uncommon to meet a coloured person intoxicated; while on the other hand, to see a drunken white, is an every day occurrence.

Upon a review of this part of the subject, therefore, the committee conclude, that, taken in connection as was said before, with their habits and manner of living, the destitution which poverty so often produces, particularly upon females, but more especially upon the poor coloured woman, and which is augmented in a terrible ratio by the increase of her family, the difficulty of providing for which must be severely felt, as means of employment are greatly diminished, there is less pauperism than might reasonably have been expected. These considerations are, to the feeling mind, arguments strongly in favour of the coloured people; and if duly weighed, would satisfy any unprejudiced person, that even without reference to the deductions of the former argument, wherein we have proved that they more than indemnify the community, even in a pecuniary point of view, for all expenses incurred in support of their proportion of the public paupers—they are, in a moral sense fully deserving of all the labour bestowed upon them, and of the place they sustain in the estimation of those who appear as their friends and benefactors."

One of the objects for which the Society whom we represent as expressed in its corporate title, was "the improvement of the condition of the African race;" to promote which this committee was originally appointed, as others of a like description had been before. How far success has attended upon our labours, and upon the exertions which the Society has made from its first organization—it is not for us to say. But it may not be amiss to recur to the state of things as they formerly existed—and then to present a brief review of the present aspect of affairs as relates to the coloured people of this city and adjacent districts.

When the Pennsylvania Society was first established, slavery existed here as in other Slave States. The blacks were for the most part held in the abject and degraded light of slave property—or had just emerged from that forlorn condition. Few of them ever having received even the rudiments of school education, and perhaps little or no instruction either in morals or religion, they were not so fully qualified to appreciate the blessings of freedom when it was conferred upon them as they would otherwise have been. They were in fact in a state little short of semi-barbarism; when the Society stepped forward, and undertook the almost hopeless task, (as many of their enemies boldly declared it to be,) to educate them. The very idea of teaching a negro, was regarded as absurd and laughed to scorn, but such men as Franklin, Benezet, Pemberton, the Parrishes, and their numerous noble minded coadjutors, believed otherwise—they regarded not the scoffs and jeers of the slaveholder nor of proslavery enemies, but persevered in their exertions for "the improvement and elevation of the African race."

And how stands the case now! Let their many private schools—their spacious churches, their literary associations, and numerous Beneficial Societies answer.* Although Pennsylvania being a free state, has become an asylum for many a poor free negro, the outcast of slave States, still the state of education, the amount of wealth, the increase of intelligence and comforts of the social condition of the coloured people amongst us, are obvious to every person of common observation. And we have no doubt, but that numerous as they are, and as degraded as too many of them yet remain, that ignorance and its concomitant vices are more rare among them at this time than the most common school learning was, when the Society espoused their cause, and sought to promote "the improvement of the African race."

* In 1837, the number of organized Societies was eighty—besides a number of similar associations not quite complete.

On all occasions wherein the liberty, or the rights and privileges of these people are invaded or endangered, or their moral character as a component part of the community unjustly assailed, the Society by its proper Committee has always been considered as their legitimate defenders. In fulfilment of these duties, the Committee has felt called upon to prepare the foregoing facts and observations, which they respectfully submit to the serious consideration of the public.

By order and direction of the Society.

EDWARD NEEDLES,
JAMES MOTT,
STEPHEN BYERLY,
SIMEON COLLINS,
BENJAMIN C. BACON,
J. MILLER McKIM,

Committee for the improvement of the coloured people.

Philadelphia, Nov: 11, 1846.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, FOURTH MONTH 1, 1847.

ADDRESS TO THE PEOPLE OF GREAT BRITAIN.—In our observations, contained in the 6th number of our first volume, on the subject of the abstinence which prevailed in England in the years 1791 and 1792, we mentioned the appearance of two pamphlets, which we supposed equally incited the moral duty of that course of action, and led to it. The pamphlets alluded to were those named by Thomas Clarkson in the subjoined passage of his history of the abolition of the slave trade, following his account of the defeat of Wilberforce's motion in Parliament in 1791. "In this state of things," said the historian, "a pamphlet written by William Bell Crafton, of Tewksbury, and called 'A sketch of the evidence with a recommendation on the subject to the serious attention of people in general,' made its appearance; and another followed it, written by William Fox, of London, 'On the propriety of abstaining from West India sugar and rum.' These pamphlets took the same ground. They inculcated abstinence from those articles as a moral duty; they inculcated it as a peaceable and constitutional measure; and they laid before the reader a truth, which was sufficiently obvious, that if each would abstain, the people would have a complete remedy for this enormous evil in their own power."

In the letter, however, of Thomas Clarkson, to the Managers of the Friends' Free Produce Association, written last year, and published in our 7th number, he speaks of "the pamphlet which occasioned the general abstinence from sugar in England," as being written by Fox, without naming the other work or its author. This discrepancy between the history and letter struck us at the time, and has led us into a research for those pamphlets, copies of which we have recently succeeded in obtaining, as also of several others issued near the same period. They all substantiate the accuracy of the letter, referring, where the abuse of sugar is adverted to, to Fox's pamphlet for its fuller and better illustration, and showing by that circumstance, as well as the dates of publication, the priority of the latter. Crafton's work bearing the imprint "London, 1792," with the initials W. B. C. at the conclusion, is a duodecimo of 23 pages, nineteen of which are devoted to the facts of the slave trade, and the four remaining ones to a recommendation of the subject to the serious attention of the people. It presses on each individual the duty to do all he can towards the removal of so terrible an evil, and urges that "no communication or assistance is too small, nor any too great to be exerted on this occasion;" but it suggests no particular course of action, excepting that which would be indicated by the sentiment, that who ever was not a friend to the liberty of the meanest subject, was not fit to be entrusted with a seat in Parliament.

The essay by Fox, of 12 pages duodecimo, bears the date of 1791, at its tenth edition; and from its first paragraph we may reasonably suppose appeared quickly following the parliamentary vote. A pamphlet, issued by a Society in Hackney, entitled "Considerations on the Slave Trade, and the consumption of West India produce," containing 16 pages, and dated October 8, 1791, refers to the former, which had then attained its sixth edition, as the basis of that portion of its remarks which relates to the obligation of abstaining from the consumption of slave produce. "An address" of 24 pages duodecimo, "to the people called Methodists, concerning the evil of encouraging the slave trade, by Samuel Bradburn, Manchester, 1792," bears this testimony to the duty of abstinence and the merits of Fox's address: "I feel it my duty as sincerely to testify against the using of sugar and rum, at present, as to preach the gospel. Among a variety of tracts which have been published against the use of those luxuries, while procured on the present plan, there is one which does peculiar honour to the principles and abilities of the writer, entitled, 'An address to the people of Great Britain on the propriety of abstaining from West India sugar and rum.' Seven of Bradburn's pages are appropriated to the discouragement of the use of these articles, and included in them is this remark:—"To say the truth, it fronts me exceedingly to think that I, who from the ground of my heart, have always abhorred slavery in every shape, and detested the thought of infringing on the just liberty of any creature, should, nevertheless, have been in some degree accessory to the bondage, torture, and death of myriads of human beings, by assisting to consume the produce of their labour, their tears, and their blood! I ask pardon of God and of them, and earnestly pray that this tract may make some restitution for my former want of attention to my duty in this respect."

It is a probable supposition that Craiton's sketch, after its publication, was used as a companion to Fox's address—the one showing the evil of slavery, the other the moral remedy for it—and that owing to this association, the historian was led into a temporary error, which was no doubt quickly corrected at home, though not so on this side the Atlantic. It is certain there remained no erroneous impressions on his own mind regarding this subject as his letter fully indicates.

Of the great influence which Fox's Address had in producing the abstinence of 300,000 persons in Great Britain from the use of slave-made sugar and rum, Clarkson's letter gives unambiguous evidence. "It was written," says the letter, "in so clear and convincing a manner that it seemed impossible for any reader of common feeling, of common sense, and of common morality, to withstand it. The reader was carried away by a stream, as it were, which he found himself unable to resist. As far as I recollect, the drift of it was, to make the consumer equally guilty with the planter. The sensation created by the reading of the book made a deep impression, so that he who read it felt himself morally bound to communicate its contents to his friend; hence it became known throughout the Island; and a flame was spread, such I believe as was never known in England on the subject. It became at length the general topic of conversation. The nobleman as well as the plebeian was affected by the work. I was travelling at this time all over the island, a tour of about 8,000 miles, to try to pick up respectable evidence to be laid before the Lords and Commons, relative to the monstrous evils attached inherently to the slave trade, in order that they might form their judgment concerning them with a view to their abolition. I had then an opportunity of seeing what was going on with respect to this subject in all parts of the kingdom. I visited scarcely a family, in the course of my rounds, where the book was not known. I found it in the families of noblemen and gentlemen of the highest fortunes. I found that the flame had even, in some cases, reached their servants, who, out of their little incomes, sent four or five shillings by way of subscription to the London Committee for the abolition of the slave trade. In the course of my journey also, I saw the book lying in a great many of the inns and coffee-houses."

The book thus highly characterized by Thomas Clarkson, we republish entire in our present number. It bears within itself the evidence that it is exactly such a book as would produce, with a people who appreciated the evils of slavery and the slave trade, the effects which the venerable Clarkson has so emphatically attributed to it. We take our copy from the tenth London edition, as the reader will perceive by the title. There were probably numerous subsequent editions. A Philadelphia edition was published by Benjamin Johnson, in 1792; the influence of which, as is well known, led many persons here into a practice of the abstinence it inculcated. Has the day of its influence passed away? We trust it has not. We feel assured that our readers will listen to it with profound attention, as to a voice from the grave of a past century, speaking a Truth which no time can impair, but which will be more and more perceived, until, under its hallowed influence, the last shackle shall fall from the last slave.

PRODUCTS OF SLAVE LABOUR.—We have read, with conflicting emotions, an article which appeared in the Liberator of the 5th ultimo under this caption, shewing the views of its respected editor on the use of those products. We regretted its emanation from one so pre-eminently distinguished as the slave's friend, and who, in early life, when his moral perceptions were fresher, and his mental powers certainly as great as they now are, held and advocated sentiments of an opposite kind. We were cheered with the evidence it afforded us that his newer views were untenable, and with the belief that in this illustration of them, we have all that can be said in vindication of the free use of the products of a system which robs the subjects of it of all their faculties—physical, moral, and religious—and among them, of the faculty of labour whence those products directly issue. We give to our readers the entire article, with remarks on each paragraph.

"PRODUCTS OF SLAVE LABOUR."

"Having been requested by several friends in Pennsylvania, to express our views in regard to the use of articles raised by slave labor, we shall endeavor to do so in a very few words, as indicative, on our part, of the comparatively small importance we attach to the discussion of a subject, which is entangled with inextricable difficulties, and which cannot, therefore, be made a test of moral character."

This exordium is scarcely worthy of its source, either in its cavalier manner or in its assumptions. The subject, it is said, is entangled with inextricable difficulties, and cannot, therefore, be made a test of moral character. Do these difficulties exist in the theory that it is wrong to use the products of robbery, or do they exist in the inconvenience of carrying that theory into practice? If the latter, the logic of the conclusion founded upon them is not apparent. We do not ourselves perceive that there are greater difficulties belonging to this, than to other questions of morality; except those which are purely selfish, and these are greatly magnified. In the path of every duty there is a lion, which, like that at the threshold of this article, scowls at the traveller, but disappears as he approaches.

"At an early period of the anti-slavery enterprise, we were led, for a time, to regard the use of slave productions as personally involving a direct support of the slave system; but we were soon satisfied that we erred in judgment on this subject, that it was wasting time upon what no man could strictly reduce to practice, and that nothing would be gained by pressing it upon public attention. There were a thousand strong and vital issues that could be made with the Slave Power, and we deemed it far more important to grapple with these, than to raise questions of conscience, which no casuistry could settle like a moral axiom. It is for this reason that we have said so little in the Liberator on this subject."

The questions regarding the use of slave products are few and plain.

Has a man a natural and moral right to the products of his labour?

Is the taking from him of those products, without his free and intelligent consent, an act of robbery?

Are the natural and moral rights of a man unchanged by being himself stolen?

Is the taking from a man, so stolen, the products of his labour, without his free and intelligent consent, an act of robbery?

Is he who receives stolen goods, knowing or suspecting the felony, equally guilty with the robber?

Is he who supplies the motive for the commission of a crime, guilty of its perpetration?

These are moral questions, put to plain, honest men, such as abolitionists profess to be. Can they be answered other than affirmatively?

The departure of our friend from his first clear view, that the use of slave products personally involved a direct support of the slave system, we have certainly great occasion to deplore. We feel it difficult to conceive how he could have written down this sentiment of his early life, and then pronounced it an error of judgment, without the trisism on which it rested staring him full in the face—that slavery exists for the express purpose of furnishing these products to the consumer. Would he say that the man was not giving a direct personal support to the system of horse stealing who bought the stolen horses, or to any other system of plunder who bought the pillage? What the thousand vital issues are, which could be made with the slave power, exclusive of that which grapples with the motive for which slavery exists, we cannot divine;—but this we know, that in any moral conflict, innocence of the wrong with which we contend, is essential to success.

"We greatly respect the truly conscientious scruples of those who endeavour to abstain from the use of slave-grown articles; and far be it from us, at any time, either to condemn them for entertaining such scruples, or to prevent them from making as many proselytes as possible. If we have given them no special encouragement, they cannot charge us with waging any opposition against them. We have felt it to be one of those cases, which do not admit of clear demonstration, and hence must be left to the individual conscience. To him that esteems anything to be unclean, to him it is unclean. He that doubteth is condemned if he eat, because he eateth not of faith. One man believeth that he may eat all things; another, who is weak, eateth herbs. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind."

We commend this respect for the conscientious scruples of those who endeavour to abstain from the use of slave-grown articles, whilst we wholly dissent from the opinion that the case they urge does not admit of clear demonstration. The duty of abstaining from the use of all dishonest acquisitions, is just as clear as the homely aphorism is true—"The receiver is as bad as the thief." The case presented by the apostle with respect to meats, is one purely of faith, and did not involve a question of the use of meats obtained by any violation of the moral law. His exhortation to the Ephesians, iv. 28, has a nearer relation to this subject.

"We have not found the same spirit of charity manifested toward those who do not see that duty requires them to abstain from the use of slave produce, on the part of those who do. In the various reports and essays, which have been given to the public by the latter, from time to time, we have seen severe criticisms of the former, as though they had little or no regard for principle, were unwilling to deprive themselves of any luxury or comfort to redeem the slave, were doing more to perpetuate than to abolish slavery, and thought more of the gratification of their appetites than of principle! To all such unkind, or at least unfounded charges, we have made no reply, but have allowed them to be freely circulated, believing that they have proceeded from a zeal not according to knowledge, however well intended, and that they needed no formal refutation. The non-abstaining abolitionists—such, for example, as the Jacksons, the Philippses, the Quineys, the Fosters, the Pillsburys, the Wrights, and the Chapmans,—need no certificate from any persons, that they are as willing as others to bear heavy burdens in the anti-slavery cause, and heroically to discharge all the duties they perceive devolving upon them. They need only to be convinced that they are on the wrong track, and, cost what it may, they will instantly rectify their course, and pursue it unflinchingly to the end."

As for the want of charity manifested by those, who see the wrong of using the productions of slavery, in their descriptions of that wrong, it is one of appearance only. They stand to the editor of the Liberator in the same relation which he stands to the slaveholder. They and he, alike, speak unwelcome truths to those who have not come into them. Those truths, however, are the best of charities, and we hope they will not cease to be uttered, till the distinguished individuals above-named, and all other non-abstaining abolitionists, shall feel no more ashamed to carry a stolen sheep on their backs, than to cover their persons with robes furnished by the toil of the driven handman; and till every slaveholder shall relinquish his tyrannic hold upon the wronged and helpless slave.

"It is, perhaps, somewhat singular—in a cause like ours, which embraces all classes of persons, without regard to sect or party,—that this zeal for total abstinence from slave-grown productions is almost exclusively confined to a particular locality, and to members of the Society of Friends. There are a very few exceptions, but they only prove the general rule. For the consciences of some of these, we entertain very little respect. They are those who strain at a gnat, and swallow a camel. They have no scruples against upholding the pro-slavery position of the Society with which they are connected, or against voting for pro-slavery Whigs or Democrats, or against supporting the oppressive and war-making Constitution of the United States. But they wear linen, instead of cotton; they eat free labour sugar and rice; and they thank God that they are not like those anti-slavery publicans and sinners, whose garments are made of slave-grown cotton, and whose tea is sweetened with slave-grown sugar. These are of the race of Pharisees and hypocrites, who flourished eighteen hundred years ago; and as no persecution is the consequence of their choice of food and wearing apparel—as it subjects them to no opprobrium—as it creates no disturbance in the community—as it leaves their cherished Society unharmed—as it calls forth no denunciations from the slaveholders—as it has the form of abolitionism (but without the power)—and as it furnishes them with a pretext to do nothing more for the slave, because they do so much (!)—they find it much easier to pursue this course, than to engage in any fanatical agitation of society, after the manner of the 'ultra' abolitionists."

The fact, if it be one, that a zeal for abstinence is almost exclusively confined to a particular locality, and to the members of a particular society, proves nothing against the truth of the abstinence principle, though it may prove much against those who are capable of receiving it, and yet do not adopt and practice it. It is not singular that a particular train of religious sentiment, in relation to war, leading to a disuse of prize goods should, in its application to slavery, also lead its professors, more than others, to a disuse of slave goods. What is really singular in the case, is, that the latter is not so commonly practised in the society referred to, as the former. But a sense of the duty of abstinence, if we have rightly appreciated the facts which have come to our knowledge from a widely extended correspondence, is more generally felt than is usually supposed. It is not confined to one locality, nor to one society, but wherever there is a heart truly impressed with a sense of the slaves' wrongs, it is there—active or suppressed! At the gloomiest period in the struggle for the abolition of the British slave trade, the address to the people of Great Britain, which we republish to day, called 300,000 people to the fulfilment of this duty. With its practice came a moral force which, operating on the national sentiment, led to a certain victory. The duty of abstinence from all participation in the wrongs of the slave was the rallying cry which brought the British people to a second successful action against slavery—the colonial abolition. John Woolman made himself a host by the simple practice of this duty; under that blessing, truly, which rests upon the pure in heart. His life was eloquent. It spoke to the life in others! Did our northern champions for the slave but add to the heavy burdens they willingly bear in the anti-slavery cause, that of the cross to their self-indulgence, it would give to their efforts an energy yet unknown. Never has a great, successful effort been made against slavery which was not largely promoted by this self-denying practice. We believe it will remain to be a constant fact in the history of the progress of the abolition of slavery.

So far as our knowledge extends—and this extensive in this department—we know of no one practising the doctrine of abstinence who upholds any society in any pro-slavery position; who votes for any pro-slavery candidates for office, or who supports any oppressive and war-making constitutions; nor do we recognize among them any of the men of Pharisees and hypocrites who flourished eighteen hundred years ago—not willing to move with one of their fingers the heavy burdens, and grievous to be borne, which they bind and lay upon other men's shoulders. If there be of this race among the ranks of the abolitionists, they must be sought, we think, amongst those who ask the slaveholder to give up his slaves, whilst they themselves will not so much as surrender the smallest indulgence they now derive from that villainous system. Well may the slaveholder say to them—Physician, heal thyself!—The other hyperboles we need scarcely notice; and yet to have garments and food clear of the blood of the slave, is something to be thankful for to our heavenly Father.

"On the other hand, there are others who abstain in the manner stated, who are among the most intellectual, the most courageous, the most self-denying, and the most sincerely conscientious anti-slavery men and women in the land. While we do not see eye to eye with them, as to the principle involved in the use of slave-grown articles, or the importance of making abstinence from the same a part of the anti-slavery movement, we nevertheless cherish toward them the highest personal esteem, and honour them for their stern fidelity to their convictions of duty. Not to obey those convictions would certainly involve them in condemnation; while we think it is no evidence of blindness of vision, or insensibility of heart, not to have any such convictions."

The above compliment is well timed and some relief to the ungracious sting which preceded it. It is well deserved, and characteristic, too, of the great mass of abstinent. Not to have their convictions, may be criminal in others who close their eyes to the light which produced it in the former.

"If whatever is raised by slave cultivation, or is tainted with fraud and oppression, is to be rejected for that reason, then there is scarcely any thing in the world that it is allowable to use, as pertaining to money, food and clothing. True, if the duty of abstinence be imperative, it is idle to talk of consequences. But that is a point neither conceded, nor to be taken for granted. Those, however, who advocate the affirmative of the question, are bound to be rigidly consistent. Are they so? They reject slave grown productions; but do they decline receiving the money obtained by the sale of those productions, if it is proffered to them as an equivalent for goods delivered to the Southern planters? All the currency in the land has been many times earned by the slave population, and many times handled by the slaveholders, and much of it is constantly in possession of the latter. Is it therefore accursed?—What man has ever rejected a dollar on that account, in the form of a quid pro quo?"

This is the only argument we have yet had, and a very imperfect one it is. It groups distinct cases—the receiving of money that never belonged to the slave, and the receiving of goods that did belong to him. It is with the latter we have to do. He who pays his money to the slaveholder, or his remotest agent, for the productions of slavery, does indeed supply a motive for the continuance of the evil, and, in that, commits a sin which attaches figuratively only to the metal, truly to his own conscience; but the question for us to settle is—Can we receive and enjoy, without a violation of the moral law, not the slaveholder's money, but the slave's goods—the productions of his toil? From these, his right has never been alienated; on these his claim is written in letters of blood.

"Again. If those productions are to be rejected, on the ground that the laborers have not been justly compensated, (for in themselves they are of great benefit to the human family,) then all those productions which come to us from the old world are to be refused, for a similar reason. The cries of the labouring classes, in all countries, are continually ascending to Heaven for redress, because they are ground down to the dust by extortion, fraud and tyranny. The earnings are more than a match for the simple; the strong are too powerful for the weak; the rich are too mighty for the poor. Yet, because English operatives are not fairly remunerated, shall we buy no English broadcloth? Because the labourers of India have scarcely the semblance of justice meted out to them, must we be deprived of the results of their industry? It is true, of all the labouring classes in the world, none are in so pitiable a condition, none are so unblushingly and completely plundered, as are the slave population; but the principle of morality is the same in all these cases, and we may not innocently sanction its violation to any extent."

The productions of slavery are not rejected on the mere ground that the laborers have not been justly compensated, but for the more comprehensive reason, that the act which takes from the slave the avails of his toil, is an act of pure robbery. To buy them is to fellowship the wrongdoer, and to sanction and perpetuate the wrong. The free labourer may work for a less equivalent than the fair value of his labour, but, done under contract, it gives him no lien on the productions of his labour. He who puts the productions of the slave's coerced toil, in the same category with the avails of free European and Indian industry, does a great injustice to the cause of Humanity. However borne down the free labourers in an overgrown population may be, by the circumstances surrounding them—the hardships of which may be enhanced by bad political institutions—still they are benefited by all demands made for their labour. With a brisk demand, wages increase; with a decaying one, they diminish; and by buying the products of their labour we take that which they have fairly and freely parted with, sanction no wrong done them, and in no respect perpetuate any wrong upon them. But we forget! our argument is with anti-slavery men, who have over and again demolished the parallelism which the enemies of freedom have sought to establish between the conditions of the driven slave, and the poor, but cheerfully toiling freeman.

"The soil of a vast portion of this great nation is cultivated by slave labour. The principal staple raised is cotton; the subordinate ones, sugar and rice. These are all good—the gifts of a beneficent Creator. If their consumption tended to injure the health and degrade the morals of the consumers, then, by the law of self-preservation and by the rule of moral obedience, they could not be innocently used. It is sad to think how much of violence and injustice enter into their cultivation; but, it seems to us,—other things being equal,—they may be innocently used by those who abhor oppression, who are earnestly endeavoring to overthrow it, and who maintain that 'the laborer is worthy of his hire;' and innocently 'by no other persons.'"

It is most lamentable that the soil of a vast portion of this great nation is cultivated by slave labour. Quick, almost as thought, would it be cultivated by men no longer slaves, did the moral sense of the people rise to the point of rejecting the productions of coerced cultivation. Does the use of these commodities really degrade the morals of the consumers? We believe it does. They gain something, or save something, by the wrong done to the slave; and perceiving this, they, for that very reason, favour the wrong. To what else can we impute the pro-slavery affections of the merchant—the manufacturer—the housekeeper—the solitary economist? Did these refuse to touch, use or handle the productions of slavery, what new zeal would it awaken on behalf of the slave? What an encouragement would it give to the rightful system of labour? What an elevation to the morality of the world?

Though the law of health is unquestionably a part of the moral law, it is not the entire; else the South-Sea Islander might justify, by it, his banquet of human flesh, and the holder of slaves, "fat and sleek," the system of slavery. God has imparted to the plants producing cotton, rice, and sugar, as he has to his other beneficent gifts, properties salutary to man, in contemplation of their rightful use. Their enjoyment he restrains, not by the miraculous conversion of these gifts into poisons, on each occasion of their wrongful use, but by laws which make man an accountable being. It is admitted that to use these gifts in a way destructive of natural health, would be a violation of "the rule of moral obedience." Much more, in view of the higher claims of Truth and Justice, would that use be such a violation, when it came to us through the invasion, by one individual of the rights of another. The moral health of man is, however, always impaired by a confederacy with wrong. And is it a trivial circumstance that our use of these plants, when cultivated by the slave, is the certain messenger to him, of physical and moral suffering and death?

But, says our friend, those gifts of a beneficent Creator can only be innocently used by those who abhor oppression and are earnestly endeavouring to overthrow it, and innocently by no other persons? We thank him for a concession which throws all his other positions to the wind. This is but worthless chaff and goes with them. Shall the preacher who should be an example of righteousness, practice that which he denounces in others? Shall we continue in sin that, through it, "grace may abound? God forbid!"

"These productions are so mixed up with the commerce, manufactures and agriculture of the world,—so modified or augmented in value by the industry of other nations,—so indissolubly connected with the credit and currency of the country,—that, to attempt to seek the subversion of slavery by refusing to use them, or to attach moral guilt to the consumer of them, is, in our opinion, alike preposterous and unjust:—therefore it is that we have refrained from entering into a discussion in our columns, on this subject, that threatened to be as interminable as it is incapable of any signal benefit to the anti-slavery movement. We have too many practical measures to carry forward,—measures, which are causing the slave system to tremble to its foundations,—to be willing to have our own attention, or desirous that the attention of others should be, diverted to one of at least such doubtful and inferior character."

That the productions of slave labour are intermixed with the commerce, manufactures, and agriculture of the world, modified or augmented in value by the industry of other nations, and intimately connected with the credit and currency of this, is an unquestionable, though not an incontestable fact. It may increase the difficulty of overthrowing slavery, but it does not diminish the guilt of the institution, nor abate our duty to seek its overthrow. It is the fact of to-day; but impress mankind with the conviction that it is their duty to withdraw from slavery the support which the use of those productions gives it, and it will not be the fact of to-morrow. As each individual, in withdrawing his support, diminishes the fact in that degree of its existence for which he is directly accountable, it is neither preposterous nor unjust to attach moral guilt to him for continuing to give it his support. As the withdrawal of persons from the use of slave productions would make slave labour unnecessary, and free labour necessary to the amount required for the supply of their wants, we cannot but see that the effect of each withdrawal by numerous persons would be a powerful instrumentality in the subversion of slavery.

We look to abstinence, then, as a means indicated by the laws of moral progress for effecting this desired subversion, and not as one of a doubtful and inferior character. The restriction and contraction of the domains of slavery, and restraints upon the slave power, in all possible modes of their accomplishment, are, unquestionably, great and desirable auxiliaries; but, as diminishing the amount of human slavery, we think they are efficient only in the degree that they make slavery unprofitable, and open and extend the opportunities for overthrowing it, by the rivalry of an opposite power. Let such an impulse be given to free labour, by the individuals who now affirm the wrongfulness of slavery and avow their determined hostility to it, as is worthy of their professions before Heaven and the world; let them demand goods untainted by slavery, at whatever cost; let them furnish the means for a first great effort at free cultivation;—Free Enterprise would rush to the task of meeting their wants, and, when accustomed to the culture, would, aided by her skill and inventive faculty, not only supply the demands of the conscientious at just prices, but eventually those of the world at prices competing with the coerced products of slavery. Years would probably elapse ere this could be fully attained, but the event is as certain as the final triumph of truth and uprightness over error and injustice. The slaveholder, taking note intermediately of the approaching event, would be learning the lesson that he must liberate his slaves to enable him to compete with the productions of freemen.

If this be a chimera; if it be impossible to close the market for the products of slave labour, whence slavery derives all its nouriture; if it be no sin of untold magnitude to buy at that market which gives slavery its breath and vitality; if no effort ought to be made to bring free labour into powerful conflict with its opposite, then what are the practical measures, and where is the moral energy which is competent to the subversion of this giant sin?—The navy of Great Britain has been found inadequate to the suppression of the slave-trade which the market for the products of slavery requires; what is the greater power, unexclusive of the high morality our theory of right demands, which can overturn both it and slavery?

BRITISH EFFORT IN FAVOUR OF THE USE OF FREE PRODUCTS.—We were glad to read in the British Friend of the 21st month last the following Circular:

"About twelve months ago a few individuals subscribed a small capital, for the purpose of trying the practicability of getting some articles manufactured exclusively of cotton grown and cultivated by free labour, and though they have met with many difficulties in the accomplishment of this object, these have not been more formidable or numerous than they anticipated. On the contrary, they have met with more inclination on the part of the manufacturers to unite with their wishes, and on that of their friends to purchase the goods, than they had reason to expect; and upon the whole, the result of the experiment encourages the belief that it will be right to extend it. The articles already made in these experiments are:

White calico;
Printing Calico, with several patterns of prints;
Yarn for Cotton Stockings;
Cotton Stockings;
Several descriptions of White Muslin;
Sewing Cotton of two sizes;

but most of these have hitherto been made in such limited quantities, that it has not been thought safe publicly to announce them for sale, lest it might lead to disappointment, from inability to supply any considerable number of applicants; the undersigned, therefore, respectfully invite thy attendance at the office of the Anti-Slavery Society, 27 New Broad Street, London, on 6th day (Friday) the 29th inst., at 2 o'clock precisely, for the purpose of considering the propriety of taking steps to increase the supply of articles manufactured from cotton exclusively the produce of free labour, and the best means of encouraging the use of other articles raised by freemen, in preference to those partially or wholly supplied by the labour of slaves, such as sugar, coffee, and rice. The duty of giving encouragement to honest industury rather than a system of the most grievous oppression, appears more urgent, in consequence of the great stimulus likely to be given to the Slave-Trade by the recent measures of Government.

Respectfully,
GEORGE W. ALEXANDER,
JOSEPH STURGE.

1st Month 26th, 1847."

We notice in the Anti-Slavery Reporter the following account of the meeting:

"On the 29th of January last, several devoted friends of the anti-slavery cause met, by invitation of Joseph Sturge and George William Alexander, to consider the propriety of taking the necessary steps to promote the use, so far as practicable, of articles the produce of free labour only. Mr. W. T. Blair, of Bath, acted as chairman on the occasion; and it was the opinion of those present, that the duty of abstinence from slave-produce, as far as practicable, should be earnestly urged on the attention of the friends of the slave throughout Great Britain, and that steps should be taken to increase the supply of goods manufactured exclusively from cotton by freemen. In accordance with these views, which entirely harmonize with our own, and with the rules of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, we entreat the serious attention of our readers to this important practical subject."

We further observe by the Reporter, that the committee of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, have petitioned Parliament against the introduction of slave grown sugars into breweries and distilleries. They did this on purely anti-slavery grounds and in consistency with the steps previously taken to prevent the introduction of slave grown products into the British markets. The memorial was introduced into the House of Lords by Lord Brougham, with appropriate remarks. A bill before Parliament to which this petition had reference allowing the use of sugars in breweries and distilleries, which it seems was before prohibited, has been adopted, and will greatly extend the demand for sugars, and be promotive of a great increase in the consumption of those which are slave grown. The Reporter remarks:

"From the information which has reached us from abroad, we are satisfied that our fears in relation to the slave-trade and the extension of slavery are beginning to be realized; but we have at least the consolation of knowing that we have done our best to prevent so great a calamity falling on the human race."

PROCEEDINGS IN CONGRESS.—The expected action of the Senate in relation to the Wilmot proviso, excluding slavery from any new acquisition of territory, took place on the 1st ult., on a bill which originated in the Senate, placing at the disposal of the President three millions of dollars for the purpose of bringing the existing war with Mexico to a speedy and honourable termination. The bill before the Senate being without the proviso, its insertion was moved by William Upham, of Vermont, who sustained his amendment by a powerful speech. It was opposed by Lewis Cass of Michigan, and Daniel S. Dickinson of New York; and on the question, shall the amendment pass? the votes stood yeas 21, including John M. Clayton, of Delaware, and nays 31, including Senators Cass and Dickinson, above named, Bright, and Hannegan, of Indiana, and Breese, of Illinois. So the proviso was lost. The bill itself was then adopted by a vote of 29 to 24, and sent to the House for its concurrence.

On the 3d, the last day of the session, the bill was considered by the House, in committee, when a motion was made to amend it, by inserting a clause extending the Missouri Compromise line to the Pacific Ocean, and lost yeas 54, nays 96. The Wilmot proviso was then moved and adopted, yeas 98, nays 80, several Southern whigs not voting. The committee then rose and reported the bill to the House with the amendment, when the question being put, shall the proviso be adopted? the vote stood yeas 97, nays 102, so the proviso was lost. And on the final passage of the bill, without the proviso, the vote stood yeas 115, nays 81.

The passage of this bill, accomplished by Northern votes, is to be regarded, we fear, as a grant of three millions of dollars from the public treasury for the extension of slavery! The National Era speaks thus of the issue:

"Freedom betrayed.—The deed is done. Executive influence has again triumphed. Freedom is betrayed. Yesterday, at half past one o'clock, Wilmot's proviso was defeated by Northern votes. The yeas were 97, nays 102. It passed the House a few weeks since by nine majority—yeas 115, nays 106. The following members from the North changed their votes, having voted yea when the proviso was under consideration before, but nay when the vote was taken yesterday. ROSSERT, and WOODRUFF, of New York; EUSALL, of New Jersey; HENLEY, of Indiana; JACOB THOMPSON, of Pennsylvania.

"What new light has dawned upon them during the last three weeks? Within that time, we must remember, the President has had some five or six hundred new offices put at his disposal. Remarkable coincidence! The truth is, with a pro-slavery Executive, with immense patronage at its disposal, it is wonderful that more changes have not taken place.

"In the Senate, it will be seen that the question has been carried against Liberty, also by Northern and Western men; Cass, of Michigan; Dickinson, of New York; BRIGHT and HANNEGAN, of Indiana; BRESEE, of Illinois. Scruple was absent. Mr. Lewis, of Alabama, who had been dangerously sick for weeks, was brought out to vote.

"Honor to J. M. CLAYTON, of Delaware, who voted for the proviso.

"But what of General Cass? The disappointment of Mr. Calhoun at the vote of General Cass, some say, was extreme. It could not have been greater than will be the disappointment that awaits the General. This vote was an act of suicide. No matter how brought out as a Presidential candidate, he can expect the support of no free States, except Michigan and Illinois, and in the south Mr. Calhoun has forestalled him.

"We cannot forbear directing attention to the course of Preston King and his associates, Brinkerhoff, Wilmot, Wentworth, and a few other fearless democrats, who maintained their integrity to the last—fighting for every inch of the ground they had taken, and boldly recording their votes in the negative on the final passage of the bill when stripped of its proviso."

THE MISSOURI COMPROMISE.—This surrender to slavery of a large portion of the national domain south of a given line, has, at least, the negative merit of being limited to then existing territory of the United States. The subsequent acquisition of Florida and Texas, was, really, a violation of that compromise; as will be any other addition of slaveholding territory to this Union. Our readers will perceive, by an article under the head of Selections, bearing the signature of James Birney, how little that compromise has been regarded, when rights north of the line were to be affected by its violation; and will thence judge how feeble are the claims of the South, on the score of fidelity to the compromise, to an extension of it into new regions, now that the original grant has been exhausted.

THE PENNSYLVANIA LAW. The Bill to which we referred in our last number as having been adopted in both branches of our legislature, where it received a unanimous vote, has obtained the signature of the Governor, and is now a law of the State. We hail the event as yielding most important safeguards to the rights and liberties of our coloured brethren. It does not indeed shield them from the action of the law of Congress, under the Constitutional provision in relation to fugitives from labour, but it confines that action to the "pound of flesh" which the bond demands, without allowing a single drop of blood to be taken with it. Hereafter the slave-laster may catch his slave in Pennsylvania, if he can, but if the latter have crossed the line to another State, there is no "right of way" over Pennsylvania soil, by which to bring him back to the house of bondage. The instant any slave, in whatever direction he is going, touches that soil with the consent of his master, or his proper representative, his shackles fall!—he is under the protection of our laws! No longer may the national road passing through our State, be the highway for carrying slaves from Baltimore and Washington City to Wheeling on the Ohio, but at the risk of making them freemen! In other particulars the law is replete with beneficent provisions. All hail to Pennsylvania, that she has done an act so worthy of her reputation for Justice and Humanity!

ABDUCTION.—A case, involving the abduction, and subsequent recovery by purchase, of a coloured man, 27 years of age, and who, since his eleventh year, has resided in Darby, a few miles south-west of Philadelphia, has occasioned considerable excitement in that usually quiet village. The individual referred to, had been the property, so-called, of a person living in Maryland, and, with his two sisters, and a half brother and sister, was advised and aided to escape from slavery, by their master's son; the goods of the master being about to be levied upon, and he probably assenting, though tacitly, to the escape. The owner died soon after, and so far as the son was interested, there had been a clear moral abandonment by him of any right which he might otherwise have had to the slaves. There were, however, one or more other heirs, whom the son-in-law of the deceased represented. And he, coming to know of the residence of the fugitives, and of the high esteem in which they were held for their thriftiness and general good conduct, which qualities would be sure to make them bring great prices, determined, though after so long an interval, to recover them back into bondage. Too much doubt as to the legal claim, probably existed, to adventure upon any open, regular process for accomplishing this purpose in Pennsylvania; subterfuge had therefore to be resorted to. There is much reason to suspect that a man, slightly coloured, who had recently come into these parts, and made himself intimate with the fugitive family, was employed as the vile agent to decoy them to Baltimore. He had married the elder sister, and was intending to take her with him to that city in a few days, probably with the purpose of surrendering her to her claimant; and was certainly the instrument, or the tool, of the abduction of the brother. He introduced to the young man, a person, apparently a gentleman, whom he professed to have formerly lived with, and whom he recommended in the highest terms, who was seeking an active intelligent servant to take with him to his residence in Ohio, and who would give to such a servant the tempting sum of fifteen dollars per month, all expenses beside, and twenty dollars in hand. The bait was successful, and Allen, with his new employer, took his departure in the cars for York, Pennsylvania, where the latter alleged that he had business to transact, whence they were to proceed, by other conveyance, via Chambersburg to Pittsburg. At York, the new master expressed great disappointment at not meeting the person he expected to find there, and said they must go on to Parkesburg, where the person lived; and they could thence proceed next morning by the cars to Chambersburg. Immediately upon their arrival at Parkesburg, which was in Maryland, a high functionary of the great city of Baltimore, arrested Allen, asserting that information had just come on by telegraph that he, with his companion, had been perpetrating a robbery in Philadelphia, and that he must take him back to that city for trial. Allen's protests of innocence, and a statement of his residence and of his purpose in travelling, were disregarded, and chains and handcuffs were at once fastened to and upon him—the pseudo-master from that instant disappearing. Allen soon found himself rapidly proceeding with the cars, under care of the officer, supposing for a while they were returning to Philadelphia, as the officer had said, till at length a passenger, to his great horror, advised him that they were on the direct route to Baltimore. Not, still, suspecting any other charge than that of theft, which he felt that he could readily rebut, he expressed to the officer his desire to be put into a public prison, there to await his trial, which was assented to. Arrived at Baltimore, he was placed in a hack, driven rapidly to a building of peculiar structure, into which he was hurried. When within its enclosure he enquired, "is this a public prison?" The answer was, "No, it is the Georgia pen!" "I felt, at that moment," said Allen, "as if I was in the midst of the great ocean, without a friend or plank to rest upon!" He was then interrogated as to his being a slave, of which, without his confession, no proof could be given, as even the claimant was unable to recognize in the vigorous man the absconding slender boy. This confession he refused to make. Flogging, by means of that well known instrument of slave-torture—the paddle—was then resorted to in order to compel it. He bore, for a while, the cruel infliction until poor humanity could no longer endure the agony, and was made ready to confess to any thing, true or false. He then yielded an assent to every question they put to him. It was the confession of the Inquisition! And it was upon this confession that his claimant doomed him to be shipped to New Orleans, under the free flag of the United States of America, to be sold for a slave!

While these proceedings were going on in the prison house, and the time and manner of the prisoner's departure was being arranged, Providence was directing a counter-movement. There was, at least, one concerned observer of the scene in the cars, and he took measures, with as little delay as possible, to send tidings to some good friends of the abdicted man. One of them went on, immediately, to Baltimore, and, arriving there, instantly proceeded to the prison where the prisoner was expected to be found. He saw the keeper of it, a man honest in his way, and always honourable in the fulfilment of a bargain, and he succeeded in making with him a contract for the delivery of the slave, upon payment by a given day, some six or eight days ahead, of eight hundred dollars: one thousand dollars being considered his New Orleans price. The time was brief, but the people poured out their money like water, and Allen was redeemed; but not until after he had undergone a new course of flagellation, to extort some desired revelations from him in regard to the manner in which the knowledge of his confinement had reached Darby. It was even more severe than the first, but nothing new to the inquisitors was elicited by it.

He was restored to his home and friends on the 24th ultimo, the day preceding the sailing of the New Orleans packet, in which he was to have been shipped, had not the arrangement for his purchase been consummated. During his confinement of nearly two weeks, his feet were chained together by heavy fetters around the ankles; and when the paddle was applied, in addition to his leg-irons, he was handcuffed, and obliged to lie down in order to receive the beating.

The village of Darby has been rather celebrated for an unwillingness to listen to anti-slavery lectures. An anti-slavery lecture, somewhat costly, has, however, been pressed upon its people; by these events, to which they have given an attentive ear, and which has reached to their inmost feelings, where it has left a deep, an indelible impression. Never was the long whip of slavery so near their firesides before. Hereafter, when some signal act of beneficence in behalf of the slave shall distinguish that village, the feelings prompting it will be traced back to those which were excited by the wrongs and sufferings perpetrated upon Allen Ricketts.

TO CORRESPONDENTS AND READERS.—The space we have devoted to an important document in the present paper has made it necessary to abbreviate one of the communications we publish, and to defer to a future number, others, including No. 3 of our correspondent Aleph.

We acknowledge the receipt of a letter from an esteemed friend at Mount Pleasant, Ohio, in which he denies the power of Congress to extend Slavery, on the ground that all rights not granted in the Constitution to the Federal Government are reserved to the states or people; and that this right, if it exist anywhere, not being granted, has been so reserved. He also combats the idea that slaves are subject to the provision of the Federal Constitution which requires the surrender of a person escaping from service or labour to the party to whom such service or labour is due, for the simple reason that, being held as goods and chattels personal, they are not competent to contract, and, therefore, cannot owe service or labour to any—a contract being essential to indebtedness. "The true English" of an instrument, and not a sinister or conventional understanding of it, he regards as its binding sense. He concludes, thence, that the clause can only justly refer to persons held under a voluntary contract for service; and he adds, in illustration of this view, that, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, he resided in North Carolina, near the coast and in the midst of slavery, where this clause was supposed wholly to refer to apprentices and to a then numerous class of emigrants, who in payment of their passage-money bound themselves to service for a term of years.

On his first position we think there cannot reasonably be two opinions. One of the declared purposes of the Constitution is to secure the blessings of liberty to the people of the United States. Beside the want of power in Congress to extend slavery, there is then the above obligation to establish its opposite; and this, each member of Congress binds himself to do, when he takes the declaration to support the Constitution. On the other point there may exist room for an honest diversity of sentiment. The tendency of ours is in the direction of that expressed by our correspondent. The constitutional provision is, that "No person held to service or labour in one state under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labour, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labour may be due." If the framers of this clause meant to include within the terms of the description, persons in the condition of slaves, which we suppose they did, they, nevertheless, must have perceived, and voluntarily incurred, the danger of a logical construction being given to the sentence which would overlook that intention—a danger much increased by the fact that the phraseology, circuitous and indistinct as to the slave, was direct and clear as to indentured apprentices and servants. The laws do not hold a slave to service or labour, though they do persons under contract. If the slave does not perform labour, they do not interfere to compel him to do it, any more than they do to compel the working of a horse, of a machine, or of any thing else regarded as property. Service or labour due to a party claiming it, supposes another party of whom it is claimed, and by whom it is due; and thus a contract between parties, which excludes the one-sided idea of slavery.

The framers of the clause were probably aware that they could not get into the Constitution any expression which should recognize slavery, and that therefore a rule for the restoration of slaves could only be obtained by means of a general proposition, which should, incidentally, include slaves. If they have failed to secure their purpose by the circumbentation used, they are but the victims of their own necessity, and of that public virtue which forbade a nearer approach to their object. In the degree that they calculated on an ignorant acceptance of the provision by the people for whom they were acting, the motive was fraudulent. Our correspondent shows that in one district, at least, and that favorable to slavery, the provision was not understood as having any relation to slaves. Thousands probably have read the provision without suspecting such an application of it.

The private intentions of the framers of a law are no guide to its interpretation. This must be especially the case when the body adopting the law is not its propounder, and can judge of its purport only by the letter. It is far more important to know the sense of the people accepting the provision, could that be arrived at, than any previous designs which were indulged concerning it: yet, even this sense is subordinate to the real sense, "the true English," which the words of "the bond" import. We think that as the people come to perceive that labour cannot be due from a slave to his claimant, the clause in question will be but a rope of sand, in the hands of the latter, with which to fasten the limbs of his escaping slave.

Our readers are requested to notice the advertisement on the last page, of the Annual Meeting of the Friends' Free Produce Society to be held at Clarkson Hall on the evening of the 20th instant. The report of the proceedings of the Managers, it is expected, will be of a very interesting character.

INTELLIGENCE.

AN ACT TO PREVENT KIDNAPPING, preserve the public peace, prohibit the exercise of certain powers, heretofore exercised by Judges, Justices of the Peace, Aldermen, and Jailors, in this commonwealth; and to repeal certain slave laws.

Section 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania in General Assembly met, and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same, That if any person or persons, shall from and after the passage of this act, by force or violence take and carry away, or cause to be taken or carried away, and shall by fraud or false pretence entice or cause to be enticed, or shall attempt so to take, carry away or entice, any free negro or mulatto from any part or parts of this commonwealth, to any other place or places whatsoever out of this commonwealth, with a design and intention of selling and disposing of, or of causing to be sold, or of keeping and detaining, or of causing to be kept and detained, such free negro or mulatto, as a slave or servant for life, or for any term whatsoever, every such person or persons, his or their aiders and abettors, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof in any court of quarter sessions of this commonwealth, having competent jurisdiction, shall be sentenced to pay at the discretion of the court passing the sentence, any sum not less than five hundred, nor more than two thousand dollars, one-half whereof shall be paid to the person or persons who shall prosecute for the same, and the other half to this commonwealth, and moreover shall be sentenced to undergo a punishment by solitary confinement in the proper penitentiary, at hard labour, for a period not less than five years nor exceeding twelve years, and on conviction of the second offence of the kind, the person so offending, shall be sentenced to pay a like fine, and undergo a punishment by solitary confinement in the penitentiary, for twenty one years.

Section 2. That if any person or persons, shall hereafter knowingly sell, transfer or assign, or shall knowingly purchase, take a transfer or assignment of any free negro or mulatto, for the purpose of fraudulently removing, exporting, or carrying such free negro or mulatto out of this state, with the design or intent by fraud or false pretences, of making him or her a slave or servant for life, or for any term whatsoever, every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof in any court of quarter sessions of this commonwealth, shall be sentenced by such court to pay a fine of not less than five hundred dollars nor more than two thousand dollars, one-half whereof shall be paid to the person or persons who shall prosecute for the same; and the other half to this commonwealth, and moreover shall be sentenced at the discretion of the court, to undergo a punishment by solitary confinement, at hard labor, in the proper penitentiary, for a period not less than five years nor exceeding twelve years.

Section 3. That no Judge of any of the courts of this commonwealth, nor any alderman or justice of the peace of said commonwealth, shall have jurisdiction or take cognizance of the case of any fugitive from labor from any of the United States or territories, under a certain act of Congress, passed on the twelfth day of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, entitled "An Act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters," nor shall any such judge, alderman, or justice of the peace of this commonwealth, issue or grant any certificate or warrant of removal of any such fugitive from labour, under the said act of Congress, or under any other law, authority or act of the Congress of the United States, and if any alderman or justice of the peace of this commonwealth, shall take cognizance or jurisdiction of the case of any such fugitive, or shall grant or issue any certificate or warrant of removal as aforesaid, then and in either case, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor in office, and shall on conviction thereof, be sentenced to pay, at the discretion of the court, any sum not less than five hundred dollars nor exceeding one thousand dollars, the one-half to the party prosecuting for the same, and the other half to the use of this commonwealth.

Section 4. That if any person or persons, claiming any negro or mulatto as a fugitive from servitude or labour, shall under any pretence of authority whatsoever, violently and tumultuously seize upon and carry away to any place, or attempt to seize and carry away in a riotous, violent, tumultuous, and unreasonable manner, and so as to disturb or endanger the public peace, any negro or mulatto within this commonwealth, either with or without the intention of taking such negro or mulatto before any District or circuit judge, the person or persons so offending against the peace of this commonwealth, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof, before any court of quarter sessions of this commonwealth, shall be sentenced by such court to pay a fine of not less than one hundred dollars nor more than one thousand dollars, with costs of prosecution, and further, to be confined in the county jail for any period at the discretion of the court not exceeding three months.

Section 5. That nothing in this act shall be construed to take away what is hereby declared to be invested in the judges of this commonwealth, the right, power and authority at all times, on application made, to issue the writ of habeas corpus, and to inquire into the causes and legality of the arrest and imprisonment of any human being within this commonwealth.

Section 6. It shall not be lawful to use any jail or prison of this commonwealth, for the detention of any person claimed as a fugitive from servitude or labour, except in cases where jurisdiction may lawfully be taken by any judge, under the provisions of this act; and any jailor or keeper of any prison, or other person who shall offend against the provisions of this section, shall, on conviction thereof, pay a fine of five hundred dollars, one-half thereof for the use of the commonwealth, and the other half to the person who prosecutes, and shall moreover therewith be removed from office, and be incapable of holding such office of jailor or keeper of a prison at any time during his natural life.

Section 7. That so much of the act of the general assembly, entitled "An Act for the gradual abolition of slavery," passed the first day of March, one thousand seven hundred and eighty, as authorizes the masters or owners of slaves, to bring and retain such slaves within this commonwealth for the period of six months, in involuntary servitude, or for any period of time whatsoever, and so much of said act as prevents a slave from giving testimony against any person whatsoever, be and the same is hereby repealed.

Section 8. That the act passed March, twenty fifth, eighteen hundred and twenty six, and all laws of this Commonwealth which are hereby altered, be and the same are hereby repealed.

JAMES COOPER,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

CHARLES GIBBONS,

Speaker of the Senate.

Approved the third day of March, one thousand eight hundred and forty seven.

FRANCIS R. SHUNK,

Secretary's Office.

Harrisburgh, March 13, 1847.

Pennsylvania ss.

I do hereby certify, that the above and foregoing is a true copy of the original act of Assembly now on file in this office.

In testimony whereof I have herewith set my hand and caused to be affixed the seal of said office, the day and year above written.

H. PERDUES,

Deputy Secretary of the Commonwealth.

CLERICAL INTERPRETATION.

A letter from Virginia to a correspondent of the Boston Courier, is authority for the following: "One of the customs of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, is to read the 'General Rules' of the 'Discipline' to the congregation once a year. On the Sunday in question, the minister preached a very severe sermon against fashion, and display in dress, specifying particularly jewelry, and most particularly breast pins, as utter abominations in the sight of the Lord! He then read the Discipline, which contains this provision, that no one who belongs to the Church shall buy or sell men with the intention to enslave them. This was too plain to pass without an explanation, and the parson stopped to remark that this had reference only to the African slave-trade, but none at all to the domestic institution of the present day; none at all, (looking up at the gallery of servants,) for as they were already in servitude, they could not be made any more so by exchanging masters!

"This is certainly (says the correspondent) one of the most successful solutions of the scriptural problem about straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel, that I have seen. I think it furnishes a satisfactory explanation of the remark of Frederick Douglass, that next to being a slave at all, the greatest curse is to be the slave of a 'religious' master."

POETRY.

For the Non-Slaverholder.

"When the news of the reduction of the sugar duties, by the British Parliament, reached Havana, the city was illuminated; the price of slaves rose twenty five percent; and twelve slavers were about to be fitted for the coast of Africa for slaves."

Letter from a friend.

Lo, a wail of hopeless sorrow
Comes from Cuba's arid plains,
And the broad Brazilian valleys
Where Oppression proudly reigns,
And his fiery demons scatter
Pestilence with lavish hand,
Like the plagues that swept in fury
Over Egypt's guilty land!

'Tis the wretched slave despairing
That his day of hope is o'er,
While a cry responsive rises
Over Africa's golden shore.
Mingled with that wail of anguish
Comes the sound of joy and mirth,
Like the mountain torrent breaking
From its darksome cavern forth.
Bark! it is the haughty Spaniard's
And the glad Brazilian's shout,
And the Universal wailing
Of the bondman, bursting out.

What can mean this strange confusion?
Are the fires of Freedom dead,
And the clouds of endless slavery
Black o'er hill and mountain head?
Are the foes of despotism
Driven from the battle-field?
Has the friend of Afric, fleeing,
Videly cast away his shield?
Where is Liberty's fair Goddess?
Has she turned to take her flight?
Or the sun of Freedom, setting,
Left the world in Slavery's night?

That the broken hearted bondman
Pours afresh his sorrows forth,
While his iron-hearted master
Revels in indecent mirth!

Creole thieves—Brazilian tyrants
Rob the Negro of his toil—
England's silver buys the plunder
English freemen share the spoil.

England, slavery-bating England,
On oppression's dainties feeds—
'Tis for this the slaver gladdens,
And anew the captive bleeds!

Pause a moment, ye who revel
O'er the toil of weeping slaves,
Tell me who has sent those slaveships
O'er the broad Atlantic's waves?

Lo in Afric scenes of murder,
Robbery and revolting crime,
Horrid deeds that stand unrivalled
In the chronicles of Time!

Mark you conflagrating village—
Hear those shrieks of wild despair—
Pause and tell me—are ye guiltless?
Who has sent those slaveships there?

Foes to slavery, who have nobly
All its thousand wiles withstood,
Friends to Freedom, the world over,
Will ye buy the price of blood?
Hear ye not the voice of Clarkson
Speaking from the silent grave,
'Will ye aid in plundering Afric!
Will ye help to rob the slave?'
Heed ye then the solemn warning,
Let the robber keep his prey,
And with firm and noble purpose,
Turn ye from the spoil away.

Richmond, Va., 13th mo. 22d, 1846.

R. T. R.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

ANNUAL MEETING.

The Annual Meeting of the "Free Produce Association of Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting," will be held at Clarkson Hall, in Cherry street, above Sixth, north side, on Tuesday evening, 4th mo. 29th, at 8 o'clock.

Friends of both sexes are invited to attend.
GEO. W. TAYLOR, Secretary.
Philadelphia, 3d mo. 29th, 1847.

Free Labour Dry Goods and Groceries.

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL.

Fresh and new goods just received, consisting in part of Shirting and Sheetting Muslins, Bleached and Brown.
"Mass House" (Rhine Island) superior quality, various styles and quality. do. do. do. do.
Coloured Cambrics and Canton Flannels, assorted colors.
Bleached and Brown do. do. and Table Linens.
Coloured Table Cloths, Linen and Cotton.
Cotton Hosiery, assorted styles.
Long and Half Hose, superior and heavy.
Aprons and Furniture Cloth.
Cotton Twilled Pantalon Stoff.
Knitting Cotton, various Nos., Bleached, Brown and Coloured.

Cotton Laps and Wadding, white and coloured. Also,
Gingham and Cheesecloth Handkerchiefs,
Muslin de Laine, plain and neatly figured, all wool,
Linen, warranted free from cotton.

Refined Loaf, Crushed and Pulverized Sugar.
Brown Sugar, good quality, of different grades, by the barrel, bag, or pound.

Sugar House and West India Molasses, good quality,
Rice, Coffee and Chocolate.

Superior Teas, selected with care for family use on stocks, viz.: Fine Oolong, Souchong and other Black Teas; also, Green Teas of superior quality.

Various Spices and Confectionery, &c. &c. The whole sold exclusively of Free Labour Goods, to which the subscriber would invite the attention of Country Merchants, as well as his friends and the public generally.

GEO. W. TAYLOR,

Successor to Joel Fisher,

N. W. corner Fifth and Cherry Sts.,

Philadelphia, 3d mo. 29th, 1847.

THE NON-SLAVERHOLDER.

Edited by ABRAHAM L. PENNOCK, SAMUEL ROGERS, and GEORGE W. TAYLOR, is published on the first of each month, at ONE DOLLAR per annum, for one copy, or FIVE DOLLARS per annum, for six copies.

All communications should be addressed and payments made to the Publisher, George W. Taylor, N. W. corner of Fifth and Cherry sts. Philadelphia. Papers per mail should be enclosed, Non-Slaverholder, Philadelphia.

THE
NON-SLAVERHOLDER.

"Whoso gives the motive, makes his brother's sin his own."

VOL. II.]

PHILADELPHIA, FIFTH MONTH, 1847.

[NO. 5.]

ASSOCIATED ACTION.

For the Non-Slaverholder.

FREE PRODUCE ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDS OF PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING.

The Second Annual Meeting of this Association was held at Clarkson Hall, on Third day evening, 20th of Fourth Month. The proceedings of the Board of Managers, as exhibited in their Report, and in the Reports of the Treasurer and the Committee on Manufactures, were approved, and the managers were encouraged to persevere in their labours. Several facts were stated to the meeting, showing the increased interest on the subject of abstinence from the productions of slavery, in various sections of our country. A wholesale store, exclusively of these productions, has recently been opened in Cincinnati; and in many other places retail stores for the same kind of goods have either been commenced, or the needful arrangements are in progress for that purpose. In one instance, a number of Friends have raised money on the security of their lands, to establish a store for the supply of themselves and others with free labour productions. In Iowa, a Free Produce Association has been formed. The numerous applications received by the Managers for free cotton goods, while indicating the progress of sound, consistent views in relation to a faithful testimony against slavery, excite feelings of regret that the means of supply are so inadequate. Of muslins, prints, gingham, Canton flannels and other goods, about 60,000 yards have been received from the Manufacturers, and upwards of 40 bales of cotton are now at the mills in process of manufacture. Various other articles have also been prepared in considerable quantities, such as handkerchiefs, stockings, laps and knitting cotton. Shirting muslins and edicoes, of a much finer quality than any heretofore made in this country exclusively of free cotton, are expected to be ready for sale in a few weeks.

The Managers have kept steadily in view the importance of furnishing goods at a price as low as possible, and hence have made arrangements to have them sold so as merely to remunerate the costs and expenses, and preserve the capital unimpaired.

The permanent fund for conducting the business does not much exceed 4,000 dollars, and consists of donations and loans without interest. The amount of merchandise sold and on hand is about 5,550 dollars, and the value of the cotton now at the mills, estimated at cost, is about 2,200 dollars. When the plan, suggested in the Report of the Board of Managers, for furnishing a few manufacturers with an amount of free cotton sufficient for a full supply of their mills, is matured and laid before the friends of the cause, we hope the means of carrying it into effect will be promptly advanced.

It was stated at the meeting that the abstinence from slave produce, which commenced in England in 1791, not only promoted the abolition of the slave-trade by directly showing the West India planters that their interests were in jeopardy, but also by introducing the subject of abolition at tens of thousands of tea-tables, and thus awakening and extending an abhorrence of the infamous traffic. A faithful, practical testimony against the use of the products of slave labour in the present day, would doubtless operate powerfully, in the same manner, to pull down the strongholds of slavery. The faithfulness of the late William Allen was adverted to as worthy of general imitation. It may be related in his own words, and, in the first instance, occurred in one of his interviews with the Emperor Alexander, at Vienna in 1822: "The Emperor asked me," says William Allen; (Life of W. A., vol. 2., page 265,) "if I would not take some tea with him, to which I readily assented; he rung his little hand bell; and the servants came and received his orders; two cups were brought in, but mine had sugar in it. The Emperor immediately ordered it to be changed, and this led me to speak of the poor Africans, &c." Subsequently, at Verona, Wm. Allen says, (vol. 2, page 284:) "The dear Emperor received me most cordially, and again asked me to take tea with him—when tea was brought in he remembered that I did not take sugar." On this occasion also, William Allen's abstinence appears to have introduced the subject of the abolition of the slave-trade, which was then engaging the attention of the Congress of Nations assembled at Vienna. He continues: "We had now some most interesting conversation in perfect confidence. I find that on the subject of the Slave-Trade, the Emperor of Austria, and the King of Prussia are with us, but their Ministers are cool, and, as the Emperor (Alexander) remarked, the French Ministers would not fail to take advantage of that. He said that he had given his own Ministers most positive orders to urge the business, and remarked, that if all stood firm, as they ought to do, he did not see why they should not carry it, intimating that France must give way."

It having been found that an annual meeting does not afford an opportunity for the Free Produce Association to be fully informed of the proceedings of the Managers, and to consider the various important subjects connected with the objects of the Association, it was concluded that quarterly or semi-annual meetings might be useful; and it was agreed to meet again on the evening of the 11th of 6th month.

Officers for the ensuing year, were appointed.—Secretary, George W. Taylor; Treasurer, M. C. Cope; Managers, Enoch Lewis, Elihu Pickering, Abraham L. Pennock, Edward Garret, Thomas Wislar, Jr., Samuel Rhoads, Samuel Allinson, Jr., and Israel H. Johnson.

The Report of the Managers was directed to be published, being as follows:

To the Free Produce Association of Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

In the report of the Managers, which they submitted last year, it was stated that among the means adopted for disseminating a knowledge of our Association and collecting information which might facilitate the attainment of our object, a letter had been addressed to the well known philanthropist Thomas Clarkson, acquainting him with our Association, and the object we have in view, together with a request for further information, if any remained in his possession, relative to the abstinence from sugar, which took place in England about the year 1792, and its effect in promoting the abolition of the Anglo-African slave trade. The hope then expressed, that a communication from him might be obtained, has since been realized. Though he was then upwards of 84 years old, nearly if not fully sixty of which had been spent in active exertions to promote the virtue and happiness of our race, and particularly of those of African descent, he did not feel himself excused from devoting a portion of his waning powers to our communication. The approbation of such a man, at his period of life, could hardly fail to encourage the members of our association to continue and increase their efforts in this noble cause.

As this remarkable man now sleeps with his fathers, we trust a few observations on his unprecedented exertions in behalf of the African race, and the astonishing effects which those exertions have produced, will not be deemed impertinent on the present occasion.

When in the year 1785, the attention of Clarkson was attracted to the African slave trade, but few of his associates appear to have thought of its abolition; and when, at a subsequent period, he began seriously to reflect on the means of annihilating that horrible traffic, the difficulties to be encountered seemed to call for the laboured labours of Hercules to surmount them. The commerce of the nation, and the revenues of the government were supposed to be closely interwoven with the trade. The cultivation of the British West Indies was represented as depending upon it; and the maintenance of the navy, the fancied pillar of the British state, was said to require that this nursery of seamen should be encouraged. The advocates of the traffic were able to show that several acts of parliament had been passed to promote it, and that the diplomacy of the nation had been employed to secure to the shipping of Great Britain the privilege of carrying slaves from Africa to foreign countries.* Yet entrenched as the traffic was, in the interests, the habits, and the prejudices of no inconsiderable number of his contemporaries, the student of Cambridge, educated for the ministry, was impelled by philanthropic and religious considerations, to leave the sacerdotal desk, and explore, during the midnight hours, the darkest recesses of dissipation and vice; to visit the taverns, the lowest of their order, in a large and crowded city, where the mates of the slave ships collected the seamen to be employed in this iniquitous and destructive occupation. By copying and arranging the muster-rolls of the vessels engaged in this traffic, he procured the names of 20,000 seamen who had been thus employed, and could tell what had become of them all; and by these accurate and extensive researches, was enabled not only to expose the abominations of the traffic to the philanthropists of the age, but to prestate in the dust all the arguments which had been raised in its defence, on the basis of mercantile and political expediency. By the facts which he brought to light, and the witnesses whom he called from obscurity, a mass of testimony was accumulated which electrified the nation, and eventually impelled the English parliament, with singular unanimity, to pronounce the doom of that abominable but long cherished commerce.

* In 1792, twenty-six acts of parliament, encouraging and sanctioning the trade, could be enumerated by its friends. By the 12th article of the treaty of Utrecht (1713,) Great Britain contracted for the introduction into the Spanish dominions of 4,800 negroes annually, during 30 years.—Falk's Appeal, p. 182.

Though the effort to expose the evils of slavery and the slave-trade did not commence with Thomas Clarkson, nor did he pursue his career of philanthropy without the aid of powerful auxiliaries, yet it may be fairly questioned whether the abolition of the slave-trade by the British parliament, could have been effected when it was, if his labours had been withheld. He furnished the facts which gave force and vitality to the arguments of statesmen, which finally produced a general concurrence in favour of the abolition.

It was during the protracted struggle, to which we have alluded, that the attention of the British nation was called to a mode of effecting the extinction of the traffic, without the aid of parliament. What John Woolman, had long before adopted, on conscientious grounds, as an essential part of his testimony against slavery and the slave-trade,—the disuse of those articles of luxury or convenience which were procured by the labour of slaves,—was presented as a moral and religious duty, in a pamphlet written by William Fox of London, and published soon after the motion for the abolition of the slave-trade was rejected by the House of Commons, in 1791. Of this pamphlet, Thomas Clarkson, in his letter above mentioned, which bears date May 1, 1846, observes, "It was written in such a clear and convincing manner that it seemed impossible for any reader of common feeling, of common sense and of common morality, to withstand it." As the principal articles then obtained from the British slave colonies were sugar and rum, the author directed the attention of his readers chiefly to those objects, but his arguments were applicable to the products of slave labour in general. It was computed that in consequence of the disclosures of Clarkson, and of the arguments of Fox, not less than 300,000 persons in England had abandoned the use of sugar. For we may recollect that little sugar except what was cultivated by slaves was then brought to the English market.

More than fifty years have passed away since this pamphlet was written; those who were then labouring for the extinction of slavery and the slave-trade, are gone to rest with their fathers; the slave-trade has been denounced as piracy, by the government which then refused to abolish it; but the traffic is still prosecuted in defiance of law, and the experience of nearly forty years has sufficiently demonstrated the inefficiency of laws or navies to suppress it, so long as its emoluments are adequate to the hazards attending it. According to uncontradicted accounts the pecuniary profits of this traffic are exorbitant, and greatly overbalance the losses from capture or casualties.

We may then justly and seriously inquire from whence, and from whom do these emoluments spring? The answer is obvious, and not to be mistaken. It is the market for the produce of slave labour which gives vitality to slavery in all its ramifications. We can neither disguise nor conceal the fact, that the consumer of the products which slave labour supplies, and for which the slaves are imported and purchased, furnishes the means and the inducement to continue the traffic.

It is greatly to be regretted that the sentiments so extensively disseminated among the people of England in 1791, were suffered to languish; for had the practice, so nobly commenced, of abstaining from the products of slave labour, been strictly maintained, even by the comparatively few who then adopted it, there can be little doubt that the example would have been gradually followed by others, and that this abstinence might have been incorporated into the habits of the generation which since that time has arisen to fill the earth. The cotton of the United States which now constitutes such an important article of commerce, and supports so great a mass of slavery on this side of the Atlantic, was then of no great importance, being estimated at three millions of pounds; whereas in 1846 the cotton crop of the United States is given at 790,479,257 lbs., of which upwards of 500,000,000 are supposed to have been exported to Great Britain. The cultivation of that part of the crop which was carried to England probably employed the labour of * This pamphlet is republished in No. 4. vol. ii. of the Non-Slaveholder.

373,000 slaves. Thus the cotton market of Great Britain, two years after the emancipation of the slaves in the West Indies, may be considered as sustaining the slavery of 373,000 labourers. Put the labourers in the cotton fields probably compose less than half the slave population of the planters; and of course that market may be estimated to sustain at least one fourth of the slavery of the Union. But we may further reflect, that the habit of dealing in the productions of slavery, most operate unfavourably upon our moral sensibilities to the evils of the system.

We may perhaps justly attribute to the benumbing effects of the familiar use of slave-grown products, the recent abolition of the high duties by which the sugars of Cuba and Brazil were excluded from the British market. But whatever causes may have led to this measure, the effect was easily foreseen. Upon the arrival of the news in Cuba, the Havana was illuminated, the prices of slaves rose, as it is asserted, twenty-five per cent., and preparations were made for despatching twelve slaves to the African coast. The consequence must necessarily be a renewed stimulus to the African trade, and an increase of the labours exacted from the slaves; whence we may reasonably infer that the waste of life, already of appalling extent, among the servile class, must be greatly augmented. It is, however, some satisfaction, that this measure was not carried without meeting with strenuous opposition, and that a forcible remonstrance against it was presented to the government, among the signers to which we recognize the names of many well known members of our Society.*

When we reflect upon the iniquitous means by which the African slave-trade is supplied with its victims; the horrors of the midnight assault upon the peaceful village, the impotent efforts of the terrified inhabitants to escape from their burning habitations, or from the no less frightful grasp of their assailants; when we view the desponding captives, bending under their burdens, working their toilsome way across the wide inhospitable deserts, to their destination on the coast; the numerous skeletons, whitening in the blast, which mark the road where the caravans have trod; when we follow the heart-stricken survivors to the hold of the slavers, and view them packed in a space such as humanity would forbid being assigned them, if they were merely to be carried over the Delaware, and remember that they are, in this suffocating receptacle, to be transported across the broad Atlantic, and eventually consigned to a slavery under which about one tenth of those who reach the Western world alive, are annually consigned to the grave; and then put the question to ourselves, what is the ultimate object of this complicated system of violence and oppression? the only rational answer that can be given must be—and it certainly is an appalling one—to procure sugar to be thrown by the planters of Cuba and Brazil into the markets of the world in competition with the sugars which are produced by the labour of freemen.

Could we behold with our own eyes, in one connected view, the whole scene of the African slave-trade, from the assault of the village in the interior of the continent to its consummation in the cane or cotton field of America, it may be fairly questioned whether any person of common feeling or common morality would consent to receive, at any price that could be named, the products of the slave-cultured soil, thus visibly and indissolubly connected with the blood of our fellow men. Let us then soberly inquire, are the abominations of the traffic less real, or less certainly known, because a considerable portion of the convex would intrude between us and the scene of action? And are we under less obligation to use our efforts to turn the stream of commerce into a less polluted channel, than we should be, if the whole system, so fully and clearly understood, was presented at once to our view?

It is true that the African slave-trade is prohibited by the laws of the United States; but it is equally true that our government has done very little towards restraining its citizens from engaging in it; and there is now probably no essential difference of sentiment as to the object of the annexation of Texas or the war with Mexico. The increase of influence and power on the side of the supporters of slavery, is the object, now scarcely disguised, for which the treasures of the Union and the lives of our citizens are sacrificed to the Moloch of war. Whatever may be the result of the present contest with our Southern neighbour, we can scarcely doubt, but the opening of Texas to the people of the United States, will give a fresh impetus to a traffic, similar in its essential characteristics, though not equally destructive in its practical operation, with the piratical traffic to the African coast. The retrograde movement of the British government, to which we have briefly alluded, and the efforts of our own to extend the area, and strengthen the influence of slavery, furnish a renewed call to the advocates of human rights, to employ such means as they possess towards improving the condition of the slave, and reducing the dominions of slavery. Among those means, one of the most effectual would unquestionably be to supply the market through the instrumentality of free-labour, with those articles which the habits of our age and country have classed among the necessities of life, and which are usually extorted from the drudgery of slaves. This was the primary object of our association; and as we noted in our report of last year, we had the satisfaction, soon after our union was attempted, to find an association for a similar object among our Friends of New York. We may now add that some Friends in Ohio have associated for a similar purpose, and it is understood that many Friends within that Yearly Meeting are seriously turning their attention to abstinence from the products of slave labour. We trust they will be encouraged to pursue the subject in its practical operation, and that as the importance of abstinence from this species of produce comes to be more fully considered and understood, the number of those who will find themselves impelled to adopt it will be greatly increased. While even the avowed advocate of slavery, speaking professedly the sense of the South, can openly declare that abstinence from the products of slave labour, on the part of those who profess to be conscientiously opposed to slaveholding, would, as certainly as day succeeds night, put an end to slavery in the United States, and that too, without doing a single thing which the nicest caviller could censure;* the advocates of freedom need not hesitate to adopt so obvious and effectual a course. From the numerous inquiries that have been made where groceries, and cotton fabrics, the exclusive produce of freemen, may be procured, we are convinced that an extensive and increasing demand for such unsullied products exists. And we now have the satisfaction to state that a store, containing a valuable assortment of dry goods and groceries, which are all the products of free labour, has been opened within the past year by George W. Taylor, at the North West corner of Fifth and Cherry Streets in this city. So far as the supply of that store extends, purchasers may confidently rely upon their being what they purport to be, the exclusive results of compensated labour. The great and growing demand in the West for goods untouched by servile hands, has in our neighbourhood induced several Friends to agree upon mortgaging their estates, for the purpose of raising money to set up a free produce store.

* For a copy of this protest see Non-Slaveholder, vol. i. pp. 130—1—2.

There is one branch of the subject to which we desire to attract the particular attention, not only of the members of this association, but of all who conscientiously believe that the slavery of our fellow men is offensive in the divine sight, and who desire to see the fetters of the slave dissolved by peaceable means. A correspondence has been maintained by this board, with an agent in Mississippi, who has been employed in selecting free grown cotton for our use; and there is no doubt entertained that, with the necessary capital at our command, a large supply could be obtained. Application for cotton has been made to us by several manufacturers of cotton goods, whose supplies of the raw material have been heretofore drawn chiefly from the product of slavery; but who are anxious to confine their operations to free cotton. As they have not the means of procuring, in advance, the supplies for a year, they are obliged to make their purchases as they are needed, and of course are thrown upon the general market for the raw material. All therefore that appears needful to enable such manufacturers to bring their fabrics into the market untainted by the guilt of slavery, is that our Board should be put in possession of a sufficient fund to purchase, immediately from the cultivators of free cotton, a quantity equal to the yearly demand of those manufacturers, to be retained to them as they were ready to receive it. The goods composed of cotton thus procured might be easily marked, so as to show when they were manufactured; and the means by which the raw material was obtained, being known, all doubt would be removed as to their free character. To accomplish this important and desirable object, a capital of fifteen or twenty thousand dollars would probably be required.

If the members of our religious society could be brought to examine this subject with the attention which its importance demands, we can hardly suppose that the necessary funds would long be withheld. As the purchase of goods brought into existence by the labour of freemen, in preference to the product of servile hands, is a measure of which no man has a right to complain, even slaveholders themselves being judges, and which, if generally adopted, must inevitably put an end to slavery, we cannot believe that this case being properly understood, we shall long solicit in vain the means which would be required to accomplish the object in view. The present generation of Friends may be said to have imbibed an abhorrence of slavery in their very infancy; few of them can remember having ever entertained any other sentiments respecting it than those of disapprobation. As Friends, considered as a body, are not only a wealthy, but a practical people, we must indulge a hope that, at no distant day, the means above suggested, or some other equally effectual, will be adopted for supplying the demand for free cotton goods; and that we at least may be redeemed from the reproach of supporting in practice the very slavery which in theory we denounce as a palpable violation of the Divine law.

* See the letter of L. E. Morse, M. G., from Louisiana, Non-Slaveholder, vol. i. p. 179.

Signed by direction of the Board of Managers,
SAMUEL RHOADS, Sec'y.
Philadelphia, 4th mo. 16th, 1847.

COMMUNICATIONS.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE SCRIPTURAL DEFENCE OF SLAVERY.

If a heathen philosopher could adduce the concurrent opinion of all nations, as satisfactory evidence of the existence of a God, we may perhaps urge a similar concurrence of opinion in favour of personal freedom. For although slavery, in some form and under some modification, may be traced to the highest antiquity, and to almost every region of the globe, yet the common sense of mankind revolts at the assertion that man can become the absolute proprietor of his fellow-man. Our ideas of property are evidently founded on the express or tacit admission that every man is the indisputable proprietor of his own mental and physical powers. Take away this admission, and the foundations of property are removed; no man can give a satisfactory reason why the coat on his back is his own. When the fathers of the American revolution were about proclaiming to the world, the principles upon which they chose to rest the justification of their resistance to the parent state, the noble doctrine which they avowed was not adopted because they were more liberal or enlightened than their contemporaries, but because prescription and precedent being against them, they were driven to seek their justification in the natural and inherent rights of man. In other words, they were compelled to appeal to the common sense of mankind, not to the refinements of law, or the usages of governments, to vindicate their rejection of the metropolitan authority. And certainly no person of common intelligence requires to be informed, that if the practice of the people of the United States had conformed to the principles announced in the Declaration of Independence, slaves and slavery must have been, to us, words of exotic application.

Such being the case, we should hardly have imagined that any man who admits that the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments were given by Divine inspiration, and that they clearly point out the way to life and salvation, would believe that slavery, as it now exists in half the states of the Union, can be defended upon scriptural grounds.

If an author who was desirous of prostrating the character of the sacred volume, should employ his labour and ingenuity in averring, as some professors of Christianity have done, to prove that the slavery of our age is quite compatible with the precepts and tenor of the Bible, we should readily agree that the effort was entirely consistent with the object. Being myself but very slightly acquainted with the works of infidel writers, I am confessedly ignorant of many of the arguments which they may have adduced in opposition to the Divine authority of the Holy Scriptures; yet as I have no recollection of ever hearing that their sanction of slavery has been advanced, by any of them, as an evidence that the Bible is not what Christians believe it to be, a declaration of Divine Truth, I must suppose that they have not had the perspicacity to discover, or the hardihood to assert, that such sanction is to be found in the sacred volume. It seems to have been left for the advocates of the Bible to furnish their opponents with an argument, which, if it could be fairly supported, would certainly be the most formidable that has ever been brought to bear upon the truth and Divine authority of the Holy Scriptures.

As I fully assent to the doctrine that the Scriptures, both of the Old and New Testaments, were given by inspiration of God, and are profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for instruction in righteousness; and believe that even where they are not known, the sincere enquirer after truth is furnished with evidence sufficiently clear, if properly regarded, to produce a conviction that personal slavery is a violation of the Divine law, I shall endeavour in the following pages to prove that negro slavery, as it exists in our age and country, is not only at variance with the whole spirit and tenor of the New Testament, but that it can obtain no sanction from the records of the patriarchal age, or the institutions of Moses. If this can be done, we not only deprive the Christian professor of excuse for supporting the system of slavery, but we also strip the opponent of scriptural revelation of the arms which some, who even profess to be ministers of the gospel, have placed in his hands. Happily for the cause of religion and humanity, the defence of the Bible against the imputation of supporting the slavery of our day, has not been left to the writer of this essay. The subject has already engaged the attention of abler hands. Of the arguments and illustrations of my predecessors, when they lie in my path, I shall make liberal use.

A preliminary observation may be advanced, which ought to be kept in view, throughout the enquiry, viz: That the servitude of a former age, however it may have been established or authorized, can afford no sanction to the slavery of the United States, when the principles on which it was founded and maintained were totally different from ours. It may also be remarked that the acts or practices of the patriarchs, which are recorded without censure or approbation, are not to be taken as scriptural authority for us; but must be judged by the positive maxims or general tenor of the sacred volume.

Let us then enquire what the slavery of our age and country naturally is.

The incidents of American slavery are enumerated by Judge Stroul, in his treatise on the slave laws, in the following terms:—

1st. The master may determine the kind, and degree, and time of labour, to which the slave shall be subjected.

2d. The master may supply the slave with such food and clothing only, both as to quantity and quality, as he may think proper, or find convenient.

3d. The master may, at his discretion, inflict any punishment upon the person of his slave.

4th. All the power of the master over his slave, may be exercised, not by himself only in person, but by any one whom he may depute as his agent.

5th. Slaves have no legal rights of property in things, real or personal; but whatever they acquire, belongs, in point of law, to their masters.

6th. The slave being a personal chattel, is at all times liable to be sold, absolutely, or mortgaged, or leased, at the will of the master.

7th. He may also be sold, by process of law, for the satisfaction of the debts of a living, or the debts or bequests of a deceased man, at the suit of creditors or legatees.

8th. A slave cannot be a party before a judicial tribunal, in any species of action, against his master, no matter how atrocious may have been the injury received by him.

9th. Slaves cannot redeem themselves, nor obtain a change of masters, though cruel treatment may have rendered such change necessary for their personal safety.

10th. Slaves being objects of property, if injured by third persons, their owners may bring suit, and recover damages for the injury.

11th. Slaves can make no contract.

12th. Slavery is hereditary, and perpetual.

The condition of the slave, when considered as a member of civil society, is stated in the work last cited, as follows:—

1st. A slave cannot be a witness against a white person, either in a civil or criminal cause.

2d. He cannot be a party to a civil suit.

3d. The benefits of education are withheld from the slave.

4th. The means of moral and religious instruction are not granted to the slave; on the contrary, the efforts of the humane and charitable to supply their wants are discountenanced by law.

5th. Submission is required of the slave, not to the will of his master only, but to that of all other white persons.

6th. The penal codes of the slave-holding states bear much more severely upon slaves than upon white persons.

7th. Slaves are prosecuted and tried upon criminal accusations, in a manner inconsistent with the rights of humanity.

These propositions are severally discussed by Judge Stroul, and their correctness clearly proved, from the laws and usages of the slaveholding states. In some of them, indeed, there are provisions on the statute book, ostensibly designed to limit the power of the master; yet, as it is an inflexible principle in slave-legislation, that a slave cannot be a witness against a white person, those provisions must, in general, lose their power from want of testimony to enforce them. Though, perhaps, in very atrocious cases, the abuses of the master may be sometimes restrained by legal prosecution, it is obvious, from the general tenor of the laws, that the slave is commonly indebted, for such security as he enjoys, much more to the humanity of the master, than to the protection of law. But, unhappily, on large plantations, the slaves are very frequently, if not generally, entrusted to the superintendence of an overseer, who has not the same interest as the master in their life and health.*

The first part of my labour then is to prove that this slavery can derive no sanction from the records of the patriarchal age.

The scriptural advocates of slavery have, upon very slender authority, claimed Abraham as a slaveholder; and in support of their hypothesis have cited a passage, which, to a common reader, must appear to have very little if any connection with slavery. "And Abram took Sarai his wife, and Lot, his brother's son, and all their substance that they had gathered, and the souls that they had gotten in Haran; and they went forth to go into the land of Canaan." Gen. 12: 5. A late author informs us that all the ancient Jewish writers, of note, and Christian commentators, agree that by the souls that they had gotten in Haran, are meant their slaves, or those persons they had bought with their money in Haran.* But he has not yet quoted a solitary passage to show what those writers and commentators are, or upon what basis they have erected their theory. A little attention to the text must suggest the belief that those souls, whatever their relation to the patriarch may have been, were not considered as any part of his estate, for they were mentioned separately from the substance which they had gathered. To state that Abram took all his substance, and then add that he also took that part of it which consisted of slaves, would not have been consistent with the brevity of Moses.

*A large portion of the slaves of the United States are hired of their masters by persons who have no interest in their life or health.—E. L.

If we are to be influenced by the opinions of Jewish and Christian commentators, we shall find that they do not at all agree that these souls were slaves who had been purchased with money. In the Targum of Onkelos it is rendered, "The souls whom they had brought to obey the law in Haran." The Targum of Jonathan has it, "The souls whom they had made proselytes in Haran."† Jarchi, an able Jewish commentator, "The souls whom they had brought under the Divine wings."‡ Jemmo, a celebrated Christian father, "The persons whom they had proselyted." The Persian, Vulgate, the Syriac, the Arabic, and the Samaritan all render it, "All the wealth which they had gathered, and the souls which they had made in Haran." Meuschenius, "Those whom they had converted from idolatry." Paulus Fagius, "Those whom they had established in religion." Luke Francke, a German commentator, "Those whom they had brought to obey the law."§ Anthony Purver, who translated the scriptures about a hundred years ago, writes in the opinion that these souls were such as left their idolatrous country to accompany the patriarch on account of his religion.

Hence we may safely dismiss this part of the patriarchal history as having no connection with servitude, and consequently furnishing it no support.

*T. Stringfellow's brief examination of Scriptural testimony on slavery.

†Anti Slavery Examiner, No. 6. New York, 1838, page 50, 51.

In the first place, where the kind of property which Abraham possessed is mentioned, sheep, oxen, asses and camels are enumerated. It is true that servants, both male and female, are noted in the same connection, but nothing is said relative to the nature or duration of their service, and of course the supposition that these servants were slaves, held by purchase or by hereditary succession, as a part of Abraham's property, is entirely gratuitous. But slender as our information in this case must be considered, the supposition that the servants of Abraham were slaves, held to involuntary servitude, is not supported by probable conjecture. The advocates of patriarchal slavery appear to forget that Abraham was not a citizen of a powerful and populous state, with laws and military force to sustain his authority, but the head of a family travelling about through a sparsely settled country, with no means of supporting his power but what was supplied by his influence over his adherents. The service must have been voluntary, for there were none but the servants themselves to enforce obedience. The three hundred and eighteen whom he armed to pursue the plunderers of Sodom, are said to have been born in his house, but the word servants, on which the supposition that they were slaves appears to be founded, is not in the original, but is an interpolation of the translators. They were unquestionably a part of Abraham's family, as their parents had been before them; but to infer that they were slaves, we must first admit, what certainly cannot be proved, and ought not to be admitted without proof, that the children born in Abraham's house, were necessarily slaves. From their being said to be trained or instructed, and this in immediate connection with the notice of their being employed in military service, it seems reasonable to infer that they were instructed in the use of arms, for the purpose of defending the patriarchal possessions from the depredations of the isolated and nomadic tribes, which then occupied the country. The circumstances of their being armed in such an emergency, and their fidelity when divided by oight into separate companies, furnish no inconsiderable evidence that their service in Abraham's family was voluntary. My proposition however is sustained, if they are not proved to have been slaves.

It may furnish some illustration of our subject, if we briefly advert to the object of this military expedition, the only one, as far as we know, in which Abraham ever engaged. Chedorlaomer had reduced several of the neighbouring tribes to subjection; but after twelve years of submission they asserted their freedom. This brought on a war of aggression, in which the nephew of Abraham, and probably many others, were taken captive and carried away. After Abraham and his associates had defeated these plunderers, and recovered the property and prisoners, the King of Sodom proposed that he should retain the spoils which he had recovered, and deliver the persons. What then was Abraham's determination? He solemnly declared that he would take nothing, of course neither persons nor spoils, not even a shoe latchet which belonged to the King of Sodom. He had broken the arm of the oppressor, had released the captives from thralldom, and would take nothing for his trouble and exposure, except what his young men had eaten while engaged in the rescue. His ardor was probably increased by the caprice of his nephew, yet the transaction evidently indicates the opposition of the patriarch to compulsive servitude. The blessing pronounced by Melchisedek implies that Abraham had performed a service which was acceptable in the Divine sight. And that service evidently was the redemption from servitude of a number who had been reduced to it.

We find it stated in the early part of Abraham's history that he was very rich; but his wealth consisted, not of slaves but of cattle, of silver and of gold.* Yet he must have had servants, for we immediately find that a contest had arisen between his herdsmen and those of his nephew.

The nature of the patriarchal servitude is illustrated by a passage which is not often quoted by the advocates of slavery. And Abraham said, Lord God, what wilt thou give me, seeing I go childless, and the steward of my house is this Eliezer of Damascus. And Abraham said behold to me thou hast given no seed; and to one born in my house is mine heir.† We do not know whether this Eliezer was the man whom Abraham afterwards commissioned to procure a wife for his son Isaac, but we readily perceive that his office was the same; for all the goods of his master were in his hand.‡ Yet this man announced himself, at the house of Bethuel, as Abraham's servant§. A servant who ruled over all that the master possessed, and whose control evidently extended to the favourite son, at the age of forty,|| and who, in case Abraham had died childless, would have inherited his estate, was in a condition very different indeed from that of an American slave. That the descent of property to the principal servant, on failure of issue, was not peculiar to the patriarchal *Gen. xv. 23.    †Ibid. xxiv. 10.    ‡Verse 24.

§Ibid. xxiv. 5.    ||Ibid. xxv. 20.

age, may be inferred from one of Solomon's proverbs.*

When Abraham afterwards received the seal of circumcision, he was commanded to bring the members of his family into the same covenant. The children born in his house, or bought with money, of any strangers, were all brought into the same covenant with the head of the family. We should reflect that superstition and idolatry were then spreading over the earth, and that a very depraved morality was the consequence. Abraham was called as the head of a family in which the knowledge and worship of the true God was to be preserved. Hence one law was prescribed for him and his house. The natives of that family, or the strangers introduced into it, could retain their stations there, only on condition of submitting to that law.† This implied no compulsion, but a simple alternative; the adoption of the religion maintained in the family, or separation from their community.

The expression, bought with money, which we find several times repeated, suggests to the slaveholder the idea of a purchase of slaves; but to those unacquainted with slavery, it as readily implies the purchase of service for a limited time, or a payment in advance, to the persons by whom the service is to be rendered. The object of the historian evidently was to show, that idolaters were not to compose any part of the patriarchal community, not to explain the relation in a pecuniary view between the servants and their master.

Of the equivocal meaning of the word buy, more will appear in subsequent parts of this essay. It will be sufficient at present to observe, that nothing appears in the history of Abraham which is incompatible with the supposition, that the services of those who were born in his house or bought with money, were voluntary and fully compensated. If the affirmative of this supposition cannot be proved, we are not bound to prove it. My proposition that American slavery can derive no sanction from the example of Abraham, is fully sustained unless the negative of the above supposition can be established.

We are informed that on one occasion Abimelech gave sheep and oxen, and men servants and women servants to Abraham,‡ and that on another Abraham presented seven ewe lambs to Abimelech;§ but no instance appears in which he either sold or gave away any servants to others. As we have no account in what way the servants received from Abimelech were treated, or how long they were held, no argument in support of slavery can be drawn from the narrative.

*Prov. xx. 23.    †Gen. xv. 14.
‡Gen. xxi. 14.    §Ibid. xxi. 30.

Upon a review of the patriarchal history from Abraham to Joseph, I do not find a solitary instance in which the servitude, such as it was among them, is mentioned with any expression of Divine approbation. The utmost that can be said is, that no condemnation is expressed. The law given to Abraham, in regard to the servants born in his house, or bought with his money, did not establish the relation; it applied to a relation previously existing. But, it will be said, the relation of master and servant is mentioned without censure. If we insist that this implies approbation, we admit a principle which will involve some startling results. The concubinage of Abraham; the polygamy of Jacob; the falsehoods of Isaac respecting his wife, and of Jacob when he imposed upon the blindness of his father, are all mentioned without comment, and consequently without censure. Shall we conclude that such acts were divinely approved then, or that they would be safe examples for Christians now? The trick which Tamar played upon her father-in-law, is mentioned without condemnation. The sacred historian relates the actions of the patriarchs in the sale of their brother, without any expression of censure; and Joseph told them afterwards, it was not they but God that sent him there—and this, no doubt, was literally true. They sold him, to be carried they knew not, and cared not where; but an overruling hand directed his course; yet the criminality of the outrage was not diminished by the consequence which followed. So conscious were the sons of Jacob of their guilt, that after all the kindness which Joseph had shown them, they still apprehended he must feel a lurking inclination to retaliate. Where neither censure nor approbation is expressed, we are left to judge of actions by the application of the general principles which the Scriptures exhibit.

Imagining the authority held by the patriarchs over their servants, to approximate much more closely than we can reasonably suppose it did, to that which is possessed at this day, in the southern states; and considering the absence of censure as indicative of Divine approbation, we may still find reason for intrusting, to such men as Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, a species and extent of authority, which was not intended to be always purchased with money. The testimony given of Abraham, by the Almighty himself, that he would command, not his children only, but his household after him, and they should keep the way of the Lord to do justice and judgment; and the obligation laid on him to bring all that were born in his house, or bought with his money, into the same covenant with himself; sufficiently prove that his authority was likely to be exercised under a deep and abiding sense of religious responsibility; and that a primary object of his paternal government, was the preservation of those who were subject to it, from the vices and idolatry of their day. The incidents of slavery as enumerated by Judge Stroud, clearly demonstrate, that American slavery is conducted on totally different principles.

It may be proper to remember that the word servant, in the Hebrew Scriptures, is of extensive application, and is used to designate very different conditions. It is, therefore, a great mistake to imagine, that wherever we find servants mentioned, slaves, in the modern sense of the term, must be understood.

Joseph told the Egyptians he had bought them and their land for Pharaoh;* and they promised to be Pharaoh's servants.† Their money and cattle were gone before; leaving nothing but their bodies and their land.‡ This then looks something like modern slavery. But the difference of the systems immediately appears, for we are distinctly informed, what their service was. They were required to render one-fifth of the produce to Pharaoh, and keep the other four themselves. Could fertile land, such as the valley of Egypt then was, be rented upon easier conditions now? Yet these farmers were servants, according to Scripture phraseology. "Am not I a Philistine, and ye servants to Saul?"§ "And who is so faithful among all thy servants, as David, which is the king's son-in-law?"||

Previously to entering upon the consideration of the Mosaic institutions, a passing notice may be taken of the servitude to which the Israelites were subjected in Egypt. This slavery was evidently rather national than personal. The family of Jacob was settled in the land of Goshen, the best of the land, and took their flocks and herds with them.¶ And there they and their descendants remained tillled out by Moses.** There is nothing on record from which we can infer, that they were stripped of their property, or compelled to labour for the emolument of individual Egyptians. The cities which they built were for Pharaoh,‡‡ the task masters who oppressed them were Pharaoh's officers.††. When Moses was sent to demand their liberation, he did not apply to the Egyptian people to give up their slave prop-

* Gen. xlvii. 23.

† 1 Sam. xvii. 8.

‡ Gen. xlvii. 7.

†† Ex. i. 11.

† Ibid. 25.

‡ Ibid. xii. 14.

§ Ex. ix. 26.

|| Ibid. v. 14.

¶ Ibid. 18.

erty, but made his demand upon Pharaoh himself. The obvious inference therefore is, that the services which they were compelled to perform, were exacted from drafts of men which were rigidly enforced, and that Hebrew officers were urged by stripes and abuse to extort from their brethren the fulfilment of their allotted tasks. Hence a larger share of the burden of providing for their own families, than is usually allotted to the feebler sex, must have fallen on the Hebrew women. This, therefore, accounts for their superior hardihood and fertility. The more they oppressed them the more they multiplied and grew. That their oppression did not rise, as the repartimientos of the Spanish colonies, or the slavery of the negroes in the British West Indies afterwards did, to the point at which population is retarded, clearly appears from the astonishing increase of their numbers during their residence in Egypt. The Israelites seem to have been placed in the condition of tributaries, and the tribute demanded was labour. Yet they appear to have retained a species of government among themselves, for Moses and Aaron, previous to demanding their liberation from Pharaoh, assembled their elders and explained their mission to them.

This political servitude then, was the bondage so frequently mentioned in scripture, which drew upon those who imposed it a succession of judgments, to which history has scarcely furnished a parallel. We should, therefore, reasonably expect to find the code of laws which the Israelitish leader was divinely authorized to prepare for the government of that chosen people, carefully purged of every offensive ingredient which characterized the bondage from which they were so miraculously delivered. If we compare the slavery of the United States with that to which the Israelites were subjected in Egypt, we can scarcely resist the conviction, that ours is much more degrading than theirs. It would, therefore, appear an anomaly, not to be expected in a divinely inspired legislator, if Moses had admitted into his institution a species of servitude more galling in its nature than the one which he so frequently and emphatically denounced. Yet unless this inconsistency can be discovered, the slavery of our age and country can derive no authority from the Mosaic laws. It will, however, be easily shown, that no such error is chargeable upon the venerable legislator of Israel.

When we attempt to investigate the principles of the Mosaic institutions, we ought to remember that the promulgation of the law constitutes an important era in the history of man: that the law was addressed to a people who were deeply in-fectured with the vices of their day: that it was intended as a school-master to lead them to Christ: that it was designed to prepare them for a more perfect dispensation: that the morality of the law and the prophets was designed to centre in the pure morality of the gospel. Now our Lord has given us, in a few words, the point to which the law and the prophets converge. "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them, for this is the law and the prophets." Here is a general principle of morality, including the sum and substance, both of the law and the prophets. Consequently, every provision of the law ought to be construed as tending ultimately to this point; and every apparent exception must be considered as arising from the peculiar nature of the case, and the existing condition of the people.

One conspicuous portion of the injunctions of Moses, relates to the treatment of strangers. The people were frequently reminded of their own bitter experience, both as strangers and bondmen, to inculcate the duties of humanity. "Thou shalt neither vex a stranger nor oppress him, for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt."* "Thou shalt not oppress a stranger, for ye know the heart of a stranger, seeing ye were strangers in the land of Egypt."† Their own servitude in Egypt was called oppression: those passages, therefore, plainly imply, they were not permitted to treat strangers as they had themselves been treated in that land. "If a stranger sojourn with thee in your land, ye shall not vex him. But the stranger that dwelleth with you, shall be unto you as one born among you, and thou shalt love him as thyself: for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt."‡ Consistent with this is the declaration of the prophet. "Is not this the fast that I have chosen? to loose the bands of wickedness, to undo the heavy burdens, and to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke?"§ It would be easy to swell my pages, by quotations from the prophets, to show that the morality of the legal dispensation was opposed to the imposition of involuntary servitude. Nations were frequently punished for their iniquities, in such manner as God in his wisdom saw meet to permit or direct. In some cases, whole nations were ordered to be exterminated by the sword; yet those cases could furnish no example for others to adopt. If in any instance a special command was given which to us appears inconsistent with the leading principle above noticed, the law of love, it must * Ex. xxii. 21.

Lev. xix. 33, 34.

† 16. xxiii. 9.
§ Isaiah lviii. 6.

be taken in its special relation, not as a general example.

The provisions in relation to servants clearly show that the wise legislator justly appreciated the great object of law, the protection of the weak from the encroachments of power.

The reduction of a freeman to servitude, by violent means, was declared a capital offence. He that stealeth a man and selleth him, or if he be found in his hand, shall surely be put to death.* This provision appears to have been intended to include the holder of the stolen servant as well as the kidnapper. Again, the exercise of undue severity was restricted. If a man smite the eye of his servant, or the eye of his maid that it perish, he shall let him go free for his eye's sake; and if he smite out his man servant's tooth, or his maid servant's tooth, he shall let him go free for his tooth's sake.† The Mishnic doctors, regarding the spirit rather than the letter of this precept, construe it as applying not only to all cases of actual mutilation, but to those minor injuries by which the use or beauty of any part was permanently impaired. As the servants were purchased, or in other words, their services paid in advance, their liberation, for the sake of the member destroyed or impaired, was substantially a pecuniary forfeiture.

The rigorous treatment of servants was further restrained by a remarkable provision in this code. Thou shalt not deliver unto his master the servant which is escaped from his master unto thee: he shall dwell with thee, even among you, in that place which he shall choose, in one of thy gates where it liketh him best: thou shalt not oppress him.‡ Whatever pecuniary claim the master may have had on account of the unexpired time of service, the person of the servant could not be forcibly delivered. By this provision the unnatural relation of an irritated master and a discontented servant, was broken, and a voluntary character secured to the services rendered. This law was evidently designed for the benefit of servants.

The care manifested by the Israelitish legislator to prevent the people from idolatrous mixture, by having the whole population, strangers as well as others, instructed in the Divine law, appears in various passages. When he was teaching this law to the people a short time before his death, he addressed himself to the stranger as well as to the Israelite. And he commanded them, in future, to gather the strangers as well as their own people, to be instructed in the law of the Lord.* In compliance with this injunction, the strangers were assembled with the people of Israel, to hear the reading of the law, in the time of Joshua.†

Purchased servants, when converted to the Israelitish faith, were allowed to eat of the passover, though a foreigner and hired servant were not.‡

With regard to purchased servants Maimonides gives the following exposition of the Mosaic law: Whether a servant be born in the power of an Israelite, or whether he be purchased from the heathen, the master is to bring them both into the covenant. But he that is born in the house is to be entered on the eighth day, and he that is bought with money, on the day on which the master receives him, unless the slave be unwilling. For if the master receives a grown slave, and he be unwilling, his master is to beat with him, and to seek to win him over by instruction, and by love and kindness, for one year; after which, should he refuse so long, it is forbidden to keep him longer than the twelvemonth, and the master must send him back to the strangers from whence he came, for the God of Jacob will not accept any other than the worship of a willing heart.§

The servants were excused from labour during a considerable portion of their time. First, the Sabbath was required to be strictly observed by servants as well as others.¶ There were three annual feasts of seven days each, at which all the males were required to be present.¶ That this included servants as well as others is obvious; for it is expressly stated that the purchased servant, when he is circumcised, may eat of the passover; and at the feast of weeks, and at the feast of tabernacles, men servants and maid servants are specified.** And these feasts were to be kept, not at home, but at the place which the Lord should choose, hence time for going and returning must have been allowed. There were also the new moons, of which there could not be less than twelve in a year. According to Josephus, two days were observed at each, and a circumstance related in the life of David, seems to confirm it.†† That the usual business was suspended on one day at least, is obvious from the language of the prophet. When will the new moon be past, that we may sell corn, and the Sabbath, that we may set forth wheat. The first and tenth days of the Seventh month were also to be observed as Sab-* Deut. xxxi. 12. † Josh. viii. 33.

† Ex. xii. 44, 45. ‡ Quoted from Stroud.
§ Ibid. xx. 10. ¶ Ibid. xxi. 17. Deut. xvi. 16.
** Deut. xvi. 11, 14. †† 1 Sam. xx. 26, 27.

* Ex. xxi. 16. † Ibid. xxi. 26, 27.
‡ Deut. xxvii. 15, 16. § Deut. xxi. 11.

bath's, in which no work was to be done.* These days when collected, exhibit a portion of time exempted from labour, to which the slaves of our day are total strangers.

That legal protection was afforded to servants no less than to their masters, is clear from various passages. Judge righteously between every man and his brother, and the stranger that is with him. Ye shall not respect persons in judgment, but ye shall hear the small as well as the great. Thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honour the person of the mighty: but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbour.

In the servitude which existed among the people of Israel, we find no traces of that degrading distinction between masters and servants which constitutes a prominent feature in modern slavery. We find Shesham giving his daughter to an Egyptian servant; and Samuel assigning to Saul and his servant the chief place among them that were hidden.†

As the Israelites were permitted to buy servants of the heathens who were round about them, and Abraham had servants bought with his money, the advocates of slavery naturally conceive that the servants thus bought, became the property of the purchasers. This however does not necessarily follow. The Hebrew word, kana, translated buy, is also used where the idea of property, in the usual acceptance of the term, would be absurd. Thus Eve said, I have gotten (bought) a man from the Lord. And Solomon, He that honoureth reproof getteth (buyeth) understanding, and he that getteth (buyeth) wisdom loveth his own soul.‡ The practice of buying wives appears to have prevailed during the patriarchal age and under the Mosaic laws. Thus when Abraham's servant went to Mesopotamia in search of a wife for his son, he took ten camels with him. We are not informed whether any part of their burden, if burden they had, was intended as the price of espousal; but we are told that he gave to her brother and to her mother precious things.§ But when Jacob went to the same place, on a similar errand, he offered seven year's service for Rachel. When Shochem wished to marry the daughter of Jacob, he told her father and brethren, ask me never so much dowry and gift, and I will give as ye shall say unto me; but give me the damsel to wife.¶ Though the king's daughter was promised to the man who should kill the champion of Gath, yet when David had slain the Philistine, he hesi-tated to claim the promised alliance, on the ground of his poverty.* But when a military enterprise was substituted for a dowry, he was well pleased to be the king's son-in-law. And when he subsequently demanded of Ishbosheth the restoration of his wife, he urged this service in support of the demand.† Boaz also told the elders that he had purchased Ruth the Moabitess to be his wife.‡ Whether the purchase money was paid to her or to her mother-in-law is not stated. In these cases it would be absurd to suppose that the purchased wife became the property of the purchaser in any other sense than a wife in our day becomes the property of her husband. The word is also used where the transfer of property was possible. The Lord shall set his hand to recover (to buy) the remnant of his people.§ He brought them to the mountain which his right hand had purchased.¶

That persons who were bought did not necessarily become, in any sense, the property of the purchaser, is shown in the case of Joseph. He told the Egyptians he had bought them and their land for Pharaoh; yet we hear of no service exacted, except a rent for the land of one fifth of its produce.

In the early settlement of Virginia, a number of young women were sent over to the colony and sold for wives to the planters. The price of a wife was, at first, one hundred pounds of tobacco, and it was afterwards raised to one hundred and fifty. This was unquestionably done to defray the expense of transportation. And a debt contracted for a wife took preference to others. Yet these wives did not become servants or slaves.

(To be continued.) E. L.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

BIBLICAL INVESTIGATIONS—NO. III.

The Precept to Noah.

In the discussions which relate to the propriety of punishing by death persons guilty of murder, the precept given to Noah and his sons, recited in the sixth verse of the ninth chapter of Genesis, is frequently brought into view in vindication of that punishment. Its English, protestant version is in this language,—"Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the image of God made he man."

The advocates of the death punishment assert that, under this precept, the penalty of death for the crime of murder was established, not for the period only during which the earth was being repopled, or until the coming in of a new dis-

* Lev. xxi. 24, 26, 28.
† Sam. ix. 22; Chron. ii. 34, 35.
‡ Prov. xix. 8. § Gen. xxiv. 53.
¶ Ibid. xxxiv. 12.

* 1 Sam. xviii. 23. † 2 Sam. iii. 14.
‡ Ruth iv. 10. § Isa. xi. 11.
¶ Psalms lxxviii. 54.

penation, but during all time in which the reason for the precept shall be true. This reason being that man was made in the image of God and therefore a constant truth, they infer that the precept is of perpetual obligation, and incapable of repeal, even by the merciful provisions of the gospel of an atoning Saviour.

If, then, there be any error in this translation, or any doubt, even, as to its accuracy, that error should be shown, and that doubt expressed, as well in view of the application made of the precept, as also of preserving uncorrupted the truth of the sacred volume.

In criminal jurisprudence, all doubtful points in relation to the intentions of a law, are to be resolved in favor of the criminal. He who hath said "Vengeance is mine, I will repay," and has omnipotent power in Himself to carry out His own behests, does not require of fallible man the violation of a principle of immutable justice in the infliction of punishment under an uncertain law, upon his guilty brother.

In this consideration, and making a momentary concession of the accuracy of the translation in other particulars, I briefly suggested in my introductory number that the precept in question would have been more safely, and thus, to fallible man, more truly rendered by employing the auxiliary may or will in place of shall which now appears in the translation. The effect of using the first would be to allow to man the exercise of the death punishment as a means of defence against the malignant shedder of blood, whenever necessary, but not requiring its employment, and even holding him accountable for its unnecessary use; of the other to admonish him of the natural consequences of blood-shedding—one offence leading to the perpetration of another—just as the Saviour, looking through the vista of cause and effect, said in Peter, "Put up again thy sword into its place; for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword."

The reader may have inferred, from my suggestion, that there was nothing peculiar to the Hebrew expression, which required the use of the imperative shall in preference to the other and less injunctive senses of the future. Such is the true situation of the case. If there be a propriety in this preference, it must be collected from collateral circumstances, not from the text itself. There is no intensity given to the verb shall, by prefixing the infinitive, nor any other means employed for giving emphasis to it. One of these means is suggested by the fourth and fifth verses of the same chapter, where the particle ya, ak, denoting strength of purpose, and respectively rendered but and surely, makes the assertion in each of those verses positive and obligatory, and which, inserted in this, would have given it like energy.

There being nothing, then, in the verb or its immediate appendages which stamps it as injunctive of the retaliatory shedding of blood, let us see what there is in the collateral circumstances which should lead us to the idea of such a duty.

The reason assigned for the precept appears to be substantially this,—that man being created in the image of God, his blood or life is made inviolable by that peculiarity. But this alike distinguishes the offender and the victim and should be protective of each. There is nothing then in this reason to warrant the conclusion that the image of God is to be violated in either of the parties.

There is nothing in the context of this passage found in the verses which precede or succeed it, indicating the intention of the Divine Speaker then to institute a penal code to be enforced by human instrumentality, much less one having death for its penalty. On the contrary, the exhortation is exhortative to the preservation of human life, and though it indicates an accountability for the violation of it, that accountability is to God, and not to man. The fifth verse makes every beast, every man, and every man's brother, the guardian and not the destroyer of man's life, and immediately responsible to God himself for every violation of the trust. It literally reads thus—"And surely your blood to your lives will I enquire for: of the hand of every beast will I enquire for it, and of the hand of man: of the hand of man his brother will I enquire for the life of man."

There is nothing in contemporary or proximate history which indicates that the precept was understood to be an injunction for the taking of the blood-shedder's life. Else what had been Abraham's condition, "after his return from the slaughter of Chedorlaomer and of the kings that were with him at the valley of Shaveh," though blessed of Melchizedek—"the priest of the most high God"?—Where had been Simeon and Levi, guilty as they were of the most cruel massacre, and condemned for the offence by the voice of prophecy, not to the penalty of death, but to be divided in Jacob and scattered in Israel?—Where had been the Jewish priesthood, which, proceeding from the loins of Levi, were preserved under this actual condemnation to officiate at the altar of Jehovah?—Where had been Moses, Israel's great pioneer to the land of promise, who, when looking on the burdens of his brethren "spied an Egyptian smiting an Hebrew, one of his brethren. And he looked this way and that way, and, when he saw that there was no man, he slew the Egyptian and hid him in the sand?"

If the precept as construed was as perpetual as is claimed for it, and therefore not alterable by the law of Moses, what was the incumbent penalty upon Israel's leaders through battle and blood to victory and conquest?—what the penal situation of the administrators of the Mosaic code?—what even the validity of that code, though uttered amid thunders and lightnings from Mount Sinai, and held to be binding upon God's people up to the period when its penalties and ceremonies were nailed to the cross on Mount Calvary?

It cannot have escaped the observation of most of the readers of the ninth chapter of Genesis, that from the first to the fifth verse, inclusive, God, in the first person, addresses his auditors in the second person, that suddenly in the sixth verse the third person wholly is used, as if the words were a quotation or proceeded from another voice, and that then, in the seventh verse, the former mode of address is resumed until the seventeenth inclusive, when the communication of God to Noah and his sons terminates.

We can scarcely account for this circumstance but on the supposition of the pre-existence of the precept, and that this utterance of it was merely its re-annunciation in its original terms. We are led to the conclusion of its pre-existence by a further consideration. If the fact of man being made in God's image caused the precept, and made it of perpetual obligation, it caused and made it so from the commencement of the fact.

We are then to infer that the precept, especially if a penal one, was known to man contemporary with his fall. Did Cain accept it as a divine requirement that his blood should of necessity be shed in atonement for the blood of his murdered brother?—If he did, his views of it must have instantly changed when God relieved him of his fears that every one finding him should slay him, by threatening a seven-fold vengeance upon any one who should do so.—Did Lamech, who committed the second recorded homicide, accept it as such a requirement, when he took up the argument that if Cain, who committed a murder of the highest grade, should be defended from human retaliation by a sevenfold retribution, he, Lamech, who probably acted in self defence when he took the life of another, would be shielded by a seventy and seven fold protection?—They each knew of a principle, deeply written in man's fallen nature, which would lead it to seize on the sceptre of the Almighty, and administer justice in its own summary and short-sighted way; but they looked to God for protection against it. Could they have done this, if the precept was a law for the inevitable taking of the life of the blood-shedder?—Can we consider the precept to be such a law, without supposing the Almighty to have acted in contravention of his own will, when he made those who might seek to enforce this law, the subjects of his seven-fold, perhaps seventy and seven-fold vengeance?

Little support is given to this construction of the precept by translations into other languages, contemporary with our version, and none by the ancient versions which have reached us. The Septuagint, a Greek translation made about 286 years before the Christian era, and held both by the Jews and first Christians in such high esteem as to be constantly read in the synagogues and churches, wholly omits the human retaliatory instrument. The Vulgate, a Latin version originating in the wants of the Christian church in the first century, and based on the Septuagint, was revised in the fourth, by Jerome, who was conversant with the scriptures in their original language, and had commenced their direct translation from the Hebrew into the Latin. This version, pronounced "authentic" by the Council of Trent, and deservedly held in high general estimation down to the present day, makes the same omission. Both the Greek and Latin use the unobscure mood passive voice and future tense (the Greek the first future) to express the verb "shall" in its second occurrence in the precept, making it simply to signify will be shed. As more imperative forms of expression might have been resorted to, had the import of the text been stronger, we are not allowed to assume that a higher signification was attached to it. These variations are reasonable evidence that the expressions "by man," and "shall be shed" in the mandatory sense, were not known, as parts of the precept, to the numerous Jews who read their law in the Greek language, nor to the early or even the later Christians, up to the modern period when the Scriptures came to be rendered into the present European languages, as it was through the Greek and Latin that these came to a knowledge of them. Can it be that an important rule of action, as this is claimed to be, was hidden from the church during successive centuries; in the absence of a knowledge of which, primitive Christianity was known to be as much averse to capital punishment as it was to war?

Notwithstanding these views, an attempt has been made to show, that the Jews, who were familiar with their Scriptures in the native language, accepted the precept in the strong sense attached to our version of it, by an extract from the Chaldean Targum of Onkelos, a Jewish teacher, who is supposed, but with little certainty, to have been contemporary with Christ. We are furnished by George B. Cheever, in his essay on "Punishment by Death," with the following passage as a paraphrase of the precept by Onkelos. "Whoso sheddeth man's blood by man, that is, by witnesses, with the sentence of the judges, shall his blood be shed." If I have rightly extracted the passage from Bishop Walton's polyglot, the words "by man," were not used by Onkelos, and if I have been rightly furnished with a translation of the transcript, by a distinguished Chaldean scholar, the following is a just rendering of it. "He that sheddeth the blood of man, through witnesses, by the decision of judges, his blood will be shed." This targum is so evidently adjusted to the structure of the Jewish law, as to divest it of any authority as a textual explanation. With the judicial association, a new character is certainly given to this rule, making it inoperative on the judges to pass sentence of death on the criminal, when the facts proven by the witnesses should make it appear that the case required that punishment. The reader will however perceive that the executioner of the sentence, he who sheds the blood, is just as much unnoticed in the Targum as in the Septuagint or Vulgate.

To account for the omission of any equivalent for the words "by man," in the ancient versions, it has been suggested that באדם bahom, literally meaning in the man, and which is rendered in our version "by man," had no existence, or at least, did not exist in its whole extent, in the copies from which the Septuagint was translated. Another suggestion is, that bahom was considered to belong to the first clause of the sentence, and to designate in connection with the preceding "man," the same individual, he whose blood was first effused באדם באדם adom b'adom, the man in the man; denoting, by this amplification, the human, indwelling vitality, or distinguishing, as John Calvin conjectured, the voluntary homicide from that which was non-voluntary.

On the assumption of the entire absence of באדם bahom, from the Hebrew copies whence the Greek translation was made, the preposition ἀντι, anti, in that translation, meaning against, for, instead of, must have been supplied. If, however, the א aleph, was merely absent, we would have בדם b'dem, in the blood, for a residue, or if אדם adom, was absent, the remaining particle being carried to the next noun, we would still have בדם b'dem, in the text, and supposing ב beth, to have been taken in the sense of for, the expression for the blood which occurs in the Greek, according to the following literal rendering, will be fully accounted for; the words in parenthesis being supplied.

"The shedding (of the) blood of man, for the blood of him there will be a shedding, because in (the) image of God have (I) made the man."

We cannot avoid the conclusion that some difference existed between the copies whence the Septuagint was taken, and the Jewish copies now extant. On the supposition that the expression in the former was בדם b'dem, we may suppose it the genuine text, for the tendency to error would be in the direction of the corruption of the language itself, which was towards the Chaldean, in which dialect בדם adom, means blood.

There being no special equivalent for the Hebrew bahom in the Vulgate, we are to infer its non-existence in the fourth century, in any of the Hebrew copies used by Jerome in its revision, or else, which is to the same purpose, its non-existence, in contemplation of the church, in a sense indicating a separate individual from the one first named. The Douay Bible gives us this rendering of the vulgate, using shall, obviously, in the sense of will, and leaving undetermined the instrument of the implied punishment—

"Whoever shall shed man's blood, his blood shall be shed; for man was made to the image of God."

Having fully occupied the space which the editors will probably be content to allow me at the present time, I must defer to another number or numbers, my remarks on the modern versions, and other examinations of a text, the true import of which it is important to arrive at.

ALPH.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, FIFTH MONTH 1, 1847.

PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING OF FRIENDS.—The Annual Meeting of this religious body was numerously attended. It assembled in this city on the 19th, and adjourned on the 24th ult.

Among the measures adopted by the Meeting for Sufferings, which represents the Yearly Meeting during its recess, was the appointment of a committee of twelve to take into renewed consideration the subject of the slave-trade and slavery. The appointment having been recent, no action had yet resulted. We hope the committee will give due attention to the fact that slavery is indebted for its continuance to a demand for the products of slave labour, just as the slave-trade is indebted for its continuance to a demand for slaves. The last of these demands is contingent on the first, and both on the will of the users of those products. We were glad that the connection of the Mexican war with the extension of the men of slavery was clearly perceived by Friends, and that it was fully and impressively noticed in the epistle to London Yearly meeting. If this war shall issue in the double wrong of wresting from Mexico large portions of her empire, and of substituting, in them, slave cultivation for the existing system of free labour, as now seems probable, there will be a strong case of conscience presented to the solution of those who are opposed both to war and slavery, in reference to the use of the products of a soil so procured, and so cultivated.

BIBLE DEFENCE OF SLAVERY.—We not unfrequently meet with persons who admit, with great candour, the manifold evils of slavery, but who qualify the concession by saying that the Bible sanctions the system, and that, therefore, they do not care to denounce it in the terms their feelings would otherwise dictate. With the efforts which have been made by the clerical attachés of slavery to propagate the sentiment that a system which, according to our natural conception, is the very antipodes of all that is just and excellent, has nevertheless the countenance and support of the Bible, we are not surprised they should have made some converts to their doctrine. We do not doubt then that the view adverted to, is innocently entertained by many who express it, opposed as it is to that pure and undefiled religion which has given us this rule of action, under the prevalence of which slavery could not exist for one hour: "Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them, for this is the law and the prophets." Matthew vii. 12.

We have thought a clear exposition of those scriptural points, on the misapplication of which the religious vindication of slavery is made to depend, would be acceptable to our readers, who have probably met with the same class of persons to whom these remarks have reference. A correspondent, whose well known initials always command attention to the articles written over them, has furnished us with all that could be desired in such an exposition.

MANUAL LABOUR SCHOOL IN OHIO.—We have been asked by the individual named in the following article, to give it an insertion in our journal.

We do so with great pleasure, and commend to the favourable notice of our readers the institution it refers to. We have seen the testimonials of our friend Wilkerson, and among the signatures recognize one familiar to us, that of Joshua R. Giddings, of Ohio. Of the genuineness of the others we are without a doubt. We know of no mode in which we can better subserve the interests of the people of colour than by encouraging them in such efforts for their self-elevation.

MANUAL LABOUR SCHOOL.—Some time since, the African Methodist Episcopal church of the United States, resolved to establish a manual labour school in the West, for the education of the coloured youth of the country, in all useful branches. For this purpose, a farm of 200 acres has been purchased in Ohio, near the capital of the state, and other incipient measures adopted. Among these is the appointment of the Rev. M. J. Wilkerson, as agent of the Trustees of the church. This gentleman is now in the city for the purpose of raising funds. He has secured enough to pay off three instalments upon the purchase of the farm, and wants about $840 more to pay the balance. Mr. W. has shown us his credentials, and we have no doubt of their genuineness, nor of the desirableness of such an institution as he is labouring to establish.—Penn. Freeman.

WAR IN MEXICO.—The accounts which have reached us of the progress of the war since our last notice of it, announce the occurrence of a battle at Buena Vista, on the 22d, 23d and 24th of the Second month last, in which the United States forces, under command of General Taylor, triumphed over those of Mexico, commanded by General Santa Anna; also, that the city of Vera Cruz, and Castle of San Juan de Ulloa, were invested by the United States army under General Scott, aided by the Navy under Commodore Perry, and surrendered to the assailants on the 29th of the third month. These results, emblazoned in the newspapers as "Glorious Victories," were only achieved at the expense of the loss of many thousand human lives, attended by such heart-rending circumstances of suffering, both to combatants and non-combatants, as should make the lover of his species feel any other sentiment than that of exultation. Who could, then, have believed that the bells of Christian churches (!) would have rung merry peals of rejoicing, or the city of William Penn, with its still deeply impressed habits of thoughtfulness, have exhibited one great blaze of illumination, with many honourable exceptions truly, in commemoration of these events? Yet these demonstrations of joy were exhibited in Philadelphia on the evening of the 19th ultimo! We subjoin extracts from other journals, showing some revolting particulars of the late battles, and commenting on the illumination.

La Patria, the Spanish paper, published at New Orleans, in relating the occurrences at Vera Cruz during the siege, gives the following incident:

"A bomb from the American camp fell upon a church, passed through the roof, and exploding near the altar, killed fifteen women who had there taken refuge, and were engaged in prayer."

An officer on board the steamship Princeton, writes thus:

"The bombardment lasted three days and a half. The city was greatly injured, the shell and round shot striking all over the town. One part, near a small battery of five guns, which fought most gallantly, was entirely destroyed, and from the stench in the neighbourhood, it is to be feared that the bodies of very many poor women and children are buried in the ruins."

"I was in the Governor's Palace, a very fine building occupying one side of the Plaza, in which Gen. Scott has his headquarters, and was looking into a very handsome room, where it was evident a shell had struck, when a Mexican gentleman came up and offered to show me over the house. I followed him, and directly we came to what had evidently been a superb room, but then almost entirely torn to pieces, he pointed to a place beside the door which was blown out. 'There,' said he, 'sat a lady and her two children; they were all killed by the shell which has wrought the injury you see.'"

Another writer says:

"During the early part of last evening, the town was lighted up by a building on fire which was ignited by the bomb shells. It was impossible to tell what building it was, but it was supposed by the engineers to be the barracks. As soon as the fire was discovered from our mortar battery, I was very much gratified to observe the cessation of our fire—for notwithstanding we were endeavoring to destroy the town or compel them to surrender it, with their other strongholds and fortifications, still humanity would seem to require that a temporary cessation of hostilities should take place under such circumstances. War is most terrible in its most modified form; but the besieging of a city like Vera Cruz, when we know that we are battering down the houses over some fellow creatures' heads but cannot tell whether we are destroying the soldiers, our real antagonists, or the women and children, and then to witness the burning houses lighting up the church spires and domes of the prominent buildings, with the families moving about on the tops of the houses in the utmost consternation and apparent despair, cannot do otherwise than excite a feeling of commiseration."

The following extract is from a letter written by an officer in the fleet off Vera Cruz:—

"The most interesting event of the day, which has touched my heart more than any other, is the fate of a Mexican officer who was killed yesterday, from whose pocket Mr. Kendall, of the Picayune, took a letter which had been written about an hour before the engagement."

"The letter was read at our breakfast table this morning. There was a tone of touching sadness about it, which made my heart leap into my mouth. He speaks of our landing, and regrets that the ladies of his family (naming particularly one by name) were so alarmed as to determine upon removing to a safer place. Poor fellow, the ink was scarcely dry upon the paper before his blood was flowing on the field of battle, and his spirit had passed away from the scene of conflict. One cannot help remembering his own tender ties at home, when such a sad story, so fresh, so recent in its occurrence, brings them home to him. Alas! that we cannot be satisfied with the necessary and inevitable misfortunes of life, but must create others; and band ourselves together for mutual destruction; that the tenderest and happiest of ties must be severed to decide a question, the merits of which could be settled in one hour by the common sense of any three honest men."

Such are a few of the thousand tales of horror which the barbarous invasion of Mexico has occasioned; and which are commemorated with illumination and other manifestations of joy by a people professing the Religion of the Prince of Peace!

In the Pennsylvania Freeman we find the following communication under the head of "The Illumination."

"As we profess to be rational and accountable beings, it may be well for us to contemplate for a moment, the moral aspect of this subject."

In the name of righteousness and humanity we ask, what is the occasion for that general rejoicing of the inhabitants of the city which has been manifested? A thousand voices are eager to reply, the glorious achievements of American arms, the victories we have obtained over our enemies. But what are these glorious achievements? What are these victories? What are the plain matters of fact which have been celebrated with such magnificent splendor? They are mangled and murdered corpses, brother slaughtering brother. The exhibition of rage and fury of man against man, which demons never manifest towards each other! The glory of American arms is the glory of murdering helpless women and children, and the glory of severing the most endearing ties of humanity! Ourselves being judges, our honor is the honor of success, in an unrighteous cause. It is the honor of the strong triumphing over the weak, by invasions and usurpation—by carnage and by blood. These—these brethren are the true matters of fact which you have been celebrating. These constitute the brilliancy of the scene you have been admiring. You have rejoiced, while angels, widows and orphans have mourned. Would it not have been more honorable to your humanity, to your rationality, to your professed christianity, to have wept with those who weep?

Tell me not, that you rejoice not at the miseries of your brethren, but in the military skill and power of the warriors. That there is some truth in this assertion, I do not deny. But the question is, is it proper to rejoice in the manifestation of skill and power in the cause of unrighteousness, in the brutal, cruel and diabolical scenes of the battle field? Be consistent then, and rejoice in the skill and prowess of the murderous highway-man, who has invaded the house of his fellow beings, with by his superior courage and physical strength, left father and mother, brother and sister, mingling their blood in all the agonies of the death struggle. Aye, be consistent, and rejoice in the glorious skill and amazing power of him, who 'was a murderer from the beginning.'

Are these appropriate developments of our christianity? What affinity then has such a christianity with the spirit, the precepts, the example of the Prince of Peace, who prayed for his murderers, when he might have displayed his superior skill and power at the head of 'twelve legions of angels'? Never, never have we so learned Christ.

We may cease to wonder, that the heathen so generally turn away from such christianity, as did the Emperor of China, when he told the missionaries, that by their murderous wars they had whitened the plains with the bones of their brethren.

When God shall make inquisition for blood, we shall discern the true character of the diabolical scenes which have been celebrated. At that awful tribunal, to which we are all hastening, the illusive fascinations of military glory which now hide the guilt of its atrocities, will have no place. We shall then know, what we might have known before, that 'all such rejoicing is evil.'"

SELECTIONS.

"DIVERS GOOD QUALIFICATIONS OF ZEAL IN CONTENDING FOR THE TRUTH."

From the Diary of Alexander Jeffrey, dated 7th mo. 14th, 1820.

1st. Right zeal in contending for any truth of God, would be accompanied with much love to those with whom we contend.

2d. It would be carried on with much meekness, without heat or passion: "for the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God."

3d. There is much need of the exercise of humility and fear; for the best know but in part, 1 Cor. xiii. 9, 12; and frequent experience, doubtless, hath taught every one that is observant, to be wary in asserting so positively what now they think to be truth in these doubtful matters, about which good men are so much divided.

4th. When zeal in these matters is not accompanied with much exactness in trying ourselves, and does not begin at our own bosom, in finding out the errors either of our judgment and practice, and in abandoning them; then may we justly suspect our zeal to be "not according to knowledge," Rom. x. 2.

Again. Right zeal is equally carried out, in all points, where God's honour is concerned. Again. Our calling to appear in such matters, would be well examined, and that we be not thereby made negligent in things more necessary. Again. Although there be truth in the matter of difference betwixt you and good men, it should be well examined whether it will carry all the weight of what may follow on your appearing in it. Again. All the consequences of the opinions maintained by your opposer, would not be imputed unto him, except you know that he owns them, but in charity you would think the best; for charity "thinketh no evil." 1 Cor. xiii. 5.

And further. Where you cannot agree, you would tolerate and bear with your weak brother, until God reveal what is wanting to him. Phil. iii. 15, 16.

Lastly. It would be well examined, that there be no siding with any party or interest, but simply the glory of God, that makes you appear in such a matter.

THE SHOE-MENDER OF PORTSMOUTH.

One day, in passing along the streets of London, I was arrested by a crowd at a print-shop window. It is perhaps not altogether 'respectable' to be seen forming one of these assemblages; but every man has his failings, and one of mine is, to take a peep at any very nice-looking prints which the sellers of these articles considerately put in their windows for the public amusement. On the present occasion, in taking a survey of the print-seller's wares, I was much interested in observing a print which differed considerably from any thing in the window. Hanging between an opera dancer and a general—both pets of the public—was the representation of an old cobbler, sitting professionally in his booth, with a shoe in one hand and knife in the other, while, with spectacles turned up over his brow, and head averted, he was apparently addressing a ragged urchin who stood beside him, with a book. In the back-ground was a miscellaneous collection of books, lasts, old shoes, and bird cages, interspersed with the heads and faces of a crowd of children—the whole forming an unique combination of a school and cobbler's. Beneath, was the inscription, 'John Pounds and his school.' I was, as I have said, interested, and I resolved to know something, if possible, of John Pounds and his seminary. On making inquiries accordingly, I discovered, through the agency of a little pamphlet, (sold by Green, 50 Newgate street) who John Pounds was, and what kind of school he conducted.

John Pounds was born of parents in an humble rank of life, in Portsmouth, in the year 1766. In early life, while working with a shipwright in the dockyard, he had the misfortune to have one of his thighs broken, or so put out of joint as to render him a cripple for life. Compelled, from this calamity, to choose a new means of subsistence, he betook himself to the shoe-making craft. The instructions he received in this profession, however, did not enable him to make shoes, and in that branch of the art he was diffident in trying his hand. Contenting himself with the more humble department of mending, he became the tenant of a small weather-boarded tenement in St. Mary street in his native town.

John was a good-natured fellow, and his mind was always running on some scheme of benevolence; and like all other benevolent self-helpful people, he got enough to do. While still a young man, he was favoured with the charge of one of the numerous children of his brother, and to enhance the value of the gift, the child was a feeble little boy, with his feet overlapping each other, and turned inwards. The poor child soon became an object of so much affection with John, as thoroughly to divide his attention with a variety of tame birds which he kept in his stall. Ingenious as well as kind hearted, he did not rest till he had made an apparatus of old shoes and leather, which untwisted the child's feet, and set him fairly on his legs. The next thing was to teach his nephew to read, and this he undertook also as a labour of love. After a time, he thought the boy would learn much better if he had a companion—in which, no doubt, he was right, for solitary education is not a good thing—and he invited a poor neighbour to send him his children to be taught. This invitation was followed by others; John acquired a passion for gratuitous teaching, which nothing but the limits of his booth could restrain. "His humble work-shop," to follow the language of his memoir, "was about six feet wide, and about eighteen feet in length; in the midst of which he would sit on his stool, with his last or lap-stone on his knee, and other implements by his side, going on with his work and attending at the same time to the pursuits of the whole assemblage; some of whom were reading by his side, writing from his dictation, or showing up their sums; others seated around on forms or on boxes on the floor, or on the steps of a small staircase in the rear. Although the master seemed to know where to look for each, and to maintain a due command over all, yet so small was the room, and so deficient in the usual accommodations of a school, that the scene appeared, to the observer from without, to be a mere crowd of children's heads and faces. Owing to the limited extent of his room, he often found it necessary to make a selection from among several subjects or candidates, for his gratuitous instruction; and in such cases always preferred, and prided himself upon his taking in hand, what he called, "the little blackguards," and taming them. He has been seen to follow such to the town quay, and hold out in his hand to them the bribe of a roasted potato, to induce them to come to school. When the weather permitted, he caused them to take turns in sitting on the threshold of his front door, and on the form on the outside for the benefit of the fresh air. His modes of tuition, were chiefly of his own devising. Without having ever heard of Pestalozzi, necessity led him into the interrogatory system. He taught the children to read from handbills, and such remains of old school books as he could procure. Slates and pencils were the only implements for writing, yet a creditable degree of skill was acquired; and in cyphering, the Rule of Three and Practice were performed with accuracy. With the very young, especially, his manner was particularly pleasant and facetious. He would ask them the names of different parts of their body and make them spell the words and tell their uses. Taking a child's hand, he would say, "What is this? Spell it." Then slapping it, he would say, "What did I do? Spell that." So with the ear, and the act of pulling it; and in like manner with other things. He found it necessary to adopt a more strict discipline with them as they grew bigger, and might have become turbulent; but he invariably preserved the attachment of all. In this way some hundreds of persons have been indebted to him for all the schooling they have ever had, and which has enabled many of them to fill useful and creditable stations in life, who might otherwise, owing to the temptations attendant on poverty and ignorance, have become burdens on society, or swelled the calendar of crime.

Will the reader credit the fact, that this excellent individual never sought any compensation for these labours, nor did he receive any! Of no note or account, his weather-boarded establishment was like a star radiating light around; but of the good he was doing, John scarcely appeared conscious. The chief gratification he felt, was the occasional visit of some manly sailor or mechanic, grown out of all remembrance, who would call and shake hands and return thanks for what he had done for him in his infancy. At times also he was encouragingly noticed by the local authorities; but we do not hear of any marked testimony of their approbation. Had he been a general, and conquered a province, he would doubtless have been considered a public benefactor, and honoured accordingly; being only an amateur schoolmaster, and a reclainer from vice, John was allowed to find the full weight of the proverb that virtue is its own reward. And thus obscurely, known principally to his humble neighbours, did this hero—for was he not a hero of the purest order!—spend a long and useful existence; every selfish gratification being denied, that he might do the more good to others. On the morning of the 1st of January, 1839, at the age of seventy-two years, when looking at the picture of his school, which had lately been executed by Mr. Sheaf, he suddenly fell down and expired. His death was felt severely. The abode of contented and peaceful frugality became at once a scene of desolation. He and his nephew had made provisions on that day for what was to them a luxurious repast. On the little mantle-piece remained uncooked a mug-full of fresh sprats, on which they were to have regaled themselves in honour of the new year. The children were overwhelmed with consternation and sorrow: some of them came to the door the next day, and cried because they could not be admitted; and for several succeeding days, the younger ones came, two or three together, looked about the room, and not finding their friend, went away disconsolate. John Pounds was, as he had wished, called away without bodily suffering from his useful labours. He has gone to await the award of Him who has said, "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these, ye did it unto me."

JOHN GASPARD LAVATER AND THE POOR WIDOW.

It was a practice with Lavater to read, every morning, several chapters of the Bible, and select from them one particular passage for frequent and special meditation during the day. One morning, after reading the fifth and sixth chapters of the Gospel of St. Matthew, he exclaimed, "What a treasure of morality! How difficult to make choice of any particular portion of it!" After a few moments' consideration, he threw himself upon his knees, and prayed for Divine guidance. When he joined his wife at dinner, she asked him what passage of Scripture he had chosen for the day.

"Give to him that asketh of thee; and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away," was the reply.

"And how is this to be understood?" said his wife.

"Give to him that asketh of thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away," are the words of him to whom all and every thing belongs that I possess," rejoined Lavater. "I am the steward, not the proprietor. The proprietor desires me to give to him who asks of me; and not to refuse him that would borrow of me; or, in other words, if I had two coats, I must give one to him that has none; and if I had food, I must share with him who is an hungered and in want. This I must do without being asked. How much more, then, when asked?"

This, continued Lavater in his diary, appeared to be so evidently and incontrovertibly the meaning of the verses in question, that I spoke with more than usual warmth. My wife made no further reply, than that she would take these things to heart. I had scarcely left the dining-room a few minutes, when an aged widow desired to speak with me, and she was shown into my study.

"Forgive me, dear sir," she said; "excuse the liberty I am about to take. I am really ashamed, but my rent is due to-morrow, and I am short six dollars. I have been confined to my bed with sickness, and my poor child is nearly starving. Every penny that I could save, I have laid aside to meet this demand, but six dollars are yet wanting, and to-morrow is term-day." Here she opened a parcel, which she held in her hand, and said: "This is a book, with a silver clasp, which my late husband gave me the day we were married. It is all I can spare of the few articles I possess, and sore it is to part with it. I am aware it is not enough, nor do I see how I could ever repay it. But, dear sir, if you can, do assist me."

"I am very sorry, my good woman, that I cannot help you," I said, and putting my hand into my pocket, I accidentally felt my purse, which contained about two dollars. These, said I to myself, cannot extricate her from her difficulty—she requires six—besides, even if they could, I have need of this money for some other purpose. Turning to the widow, I said: "Have you no friend, no relative, who could give you this trifle?"

"No, not a soul! I am ashamed to go from house to house, I would rather work day and night. My excuse for being here is, that people speak so much of your goodness; if, however, you cannot assist me, you at least will forgive my intrusion, and God, who has never yet forsaken me, will not surely turn away from me in my sixty-sixth year?"

At this moment, the door of my apartment opened, and my wife entered. I was ashamed and vexed. Gladly would I have sent her away, for conscience whispered, "Give to him that asketh of thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away." She came up to me and said with much sweetness—

"This is a good old woman. She has certainly been ill of late. Assist her if you can."

Shame and compassion struggled in my darkened soul. "I have but two dollars," I said, in a whisper, "and she requires six. I'll give her a trifle in the hand, and let her go."

Laying her hand on my arm, and smiling in my face, my wife said aloud, what conscience had whispered before, "Give to him that asketh of thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away."

I blushed, and replied, with some little vexation, "would you give your ring for the purpose?"

"With pleasure," answered my wife, pulling off her ring.

The poor widow was either too simple or too roddest to notice what was going on, and was preparing to retire, when my wife called her to wait in the lobby. When we were left alone, I asked my wife—

"Are you in earnest about the ring?"

"Certainly. How can you doubt it?" she said.

"Do you think I would trifle with clarity? Remember what you said half an hour ago. Oh! my dear friend, let us not make a show of the Gospel. You are in general so kind, so sympathizing, how is it that you now find it so difficult to assist this poor woman? Why did you not, without hesitation, give her what you had in your pocket? And did you not know there were yet six dollars in your desk, and that the quarter will be paid to us in less than eight days?" She then added, with much feeling, "Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat or what ye shall drink, nor yet for your body what ye shall put on. Behold the fowls of the air; they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; yet your Heavenly Father feedeth them."

I kissed my wife, while tears ran down my cheeks. "Thanks, a thousand thanks, for this humiliation!"

I turned to my desk, took from it six dollars, and opened the door to call in the poor widow. All darkened around me at the thought that I had been so forgetful of the omniscience of God as to say to her, "I cannot help you." Oh! thou false tongue, thou false heart! If the Lord should mark iniquities, O Lord! who shall stand?

"Here is what you need," I said, addressing the widow. At first she seemed not to understand what I meant, and thought I was offering her a small contribution, for which she thanked me, and pressed my hand; but when she perceived I had given her the whole sum, she could not find words to express her feelings. She cried—

"Dear sir, I cannot repay it. All I possess is in this little book, and it is old."

"Keep your book," I said, "and the money too, and thank God, and not me, for verily I deserve no thanks, after having so long refused your entreaties. Go in peace, and forgive an erring brother."

I returned to my wife with downcast looks, but she smiled and said—

"Do not take it so much to heart, my friend. You yielded at my first suggestion; but promise me, so long as I wear a gold ring on my finger, (and you know that I possess several besides,) you will never allow yourself to say to any poor person 'I cannot help you.'"

She kissed me, and left the apartment. When I found myself alone, I sat down and wrote this account in my diary, in order to humble my deceitful heart—this heart which no longer than yesterday dictated these words:

"Of all characters in the world, there is none I would more anxiously avoid being than a hypocrite. To preach the whole moral law, and fulfil only the easy part of it, is hypocrisy. Merciful Father! how must I wait, and reflect, and struggle, ere I shall be able to rely on the perfect sincerity of my professions!"

I read over once more the chapter I had read this morning with too little benefit, and felt more and more ashamed and convinced that THERE IS NO PEACE EXCEPT WHERE PRINCIPLE AND PRACTICE ARE IN PERFECT ACCORDANCE. How peacefully and happily I might have ended this day, had I acted up conscientiously to the blessed doctrine I professed. Dear Saviour, send thy Holy Spirit into this benighted heart! Cleanse it from secret sin, and teach me to employ that which thou hast committed to my charge to thy glory, a brother's welfare, and my own salvation!

THE LIFE OF BENJAMIN LUNDY.

This work which has been announced several times as in progress, is at length completed and offered to the public. It is a neat duodecimo volume of 316 pages, with a mezzotint likeness of Lundy, and a colored map of Texas and Mexico. The title page reads thus: "The Life, Travels and Opinions of Benjamin Lundy, including his Journeys to Texas and Mexico; with a sketch of cotemporary events, and a notice of the Revolution in Hayti. Compiled under the direction and on behalf of his children. Published by Wm. D. Parish, No. 1 North Fifth St., Philadelphia." Price 75 cents.

Of course such a volume must possess much interest. Benjamin Lundy was the pioneer in the modern anti-slavery movement, and, more than any other man, its originator. He devoted himself to the cause of the slave at an early age; and with the most admirable self-sacrifice, and extraordinary endurance, labored to the day of his death for its prosecution. His frequent visits to Texas and Mexico, though of no avail in the immediate advancement of the cause, were of immense service in the developments which they enabled him to make of the plots and plans which resulted in the Texas rebellion. To the facts brought out by Benjamin Lundy, John Quincy Adams was mainly indebted for the material of his early and able anti-Texas speeches in Congress.

The book before us is mainly a compilation, the editor being "solicitous," as he says in his preface, "to avoid giving offence to any class of emancipationists," by mixing up his own opinions with the facts recorded. Possibly—for we have not yet read the whole of the work—this may be no disadvantage in the present case, but ordinarily a biography is indebted for at least one half of its value to the comments, reflections and deductions of its editor.

The book, however, contains sufficient of interest to make it amply worth its price, and we should be glad, on account of those more immediately interested in its proceeds, to hear of its finding a ready sale.—Pennsylvania Freeman.

POETRY.

From the National Era.

SONNET.

TO ORIENT SMITH.

Written on hearing that he had contributed ten thousand dollars for the relief of the starving poor of Ireland.

No civic honours deck thy lofty brow,
Nor laurel wreaths won in the bloody fight;
Far nobler prizes glitter in thy sight,
And crown thy holy labours. Even now
Thy country owns thee as the poor man's friend,
And not thy country only; that green isle
Across the ocean, with a grateful smile,
Accepts thy bounty. Freely dost thou lend
What God hath given thee; freely dost thou cast
Thy bread upon the waters; but we know
It is not lost: each floating seed shall grow,
And yield abundant fruit. Bright o'er the past
With growing lustre shall thy virtues glow,
And on thy name a deathless glory cast.

April 5, 1847.

GUTHRIE.

WHAT THE VOICE SAID.

BY JOHN G. WHITTIER.

Maddened by Earth's wrong and evil,
"Lord!" I cried in sudden ire,
"From thy right hand, clothed with thunder, Shake the bolted fire!"

"Love is lost, and Faith is dying;
With the brute the man is sold;
And the dropping blood of labour
Hardeneth into gold."

"Here the dying wail of Famine,
There the battle's groan of pain;
And, in silence, smooth-faced Mahanon
Reaping men like grain."

"Where is God, that we should fear him?"
Thus the earth-born Titans say;
"God! if thou art living, hear us!"
Thus the weak ones pray.

"Thou, the patient Heaven upbraiding," Spake a solemn voice within;
"Weary of our Lord's forbearance, Art thou free from sin?"

"Fearless brow to Him uplifting,
Canst thou for his thunders call,
Knowing that to guilt's attraction
Evermore they fall?"

"Know'st thou not all germs of evil
In thy heart await their time?
Not thyself, but God's restraining,
Stays their growth of crime."

"Couldst thou boast, oh child of weakness!
O'er the sons of wrong and strife,
Were their strong temptations planted
In thy path of life?"

Thou hast seen two Afreale's gushing
From one fountain, clear and true,
But by widely varying channels
Searching for the sea.

"Gledest one through greenest valleys,
Kissing them with lips still sweet;
One, mad-roaring down the mountains,
Stagnates at their feet."

"Is it choice whereby the Parsee,
Kneels before his mother's fire;
In his black tent did the Tartar
Choose his wandering sire?"

"He alone, whose hand is bounding
Human power and human will,
Looking through each soul's surrounding,
Knows its good or ill."

"For thyself, while wrong and sorrow
Make to thee their strong appeal,
Coward wert thou not to utter
What the heart must feel."

" Earnest words must needs be spoken
When the warm heart bleeds or burns
With its scorn of wrong, or pity
For the wronged, by turns.

" But, by all thy nature's weakness,
Hidden faults and follies known,
Be thou, in rebuking evil,
Conscious of thine own.

" Not the less shall stern-eyed duty
To thy lips her trumpet set,
But with harsher blasts shall mingle
Wailings of regret."

Cease not, Voice of holy speaking,
Teacher sent of God, be near,
Whispering through the day's cool silence,
Let my spirit hear!

So, when thoughts of evil doors
Waken scorn or hatred move,
Shall a mournful fellow feeling
Temper all with love.

National Era.

[Our aged and respected friend, now in his 80th year, to whom we were indebted some ten months since for the fable of "the Clock," witnessed, for a few minutes, from his quiet home on the evening of the 19th ultimo, the painful reality of the sky red-dened in the far distance by the illumination of Philadelphia, on account of the issue of a bloody conflict in which thousands of his fellow beings had fallen, ignorant and innocent of the cause of the war, but scarcely the better prepared for the dread account to which they were so suddenly called. Saddened by the view, he withdrew to his room to shut out the scene; and there penned the following effusions of a heart oppressed by a sense of the wrong and outrage which were involved in the occasion of this thoughtless, this wicked rejoicing.—BARRONS.]

For the Non-Slaveholder.

THE ILLUMINATION, OR GLORIFICATION OF WRONG AND OUTRAGE.

My heart is sick with disappointed hopes,
This robber-war has loosen'd all its props,
I fondly hoped the public heart and mind
Were feeling brotherhood for all mankind,
That Christian principles of love and peace
Were wide diffused, and that all wars would cease;
That these pure principles, opposed to strife,
Had set just value on the human life;
But the low standard of our public presses,
Decks robber-war in patriotic dresses,
Shouts a glorious victory—"with joyful cry—
At wholesale murder of the deepest die!

For what was this vile robber-war began,
But to make room for trafficking in man,
To spread the hateful curse of slavery o'er
Wide fertile plains where freedom reigned before?
But we can now exult o'er thousands slain,
O'er wounded thousands agonized with pain,

And o'er desponding hearts of thousands more,
Bereft of all that sweetened life before.

Can Christians glory in the deep distress,
Of brethren in their utter hopelessness?—

In early times, true Christian conyers strove
To bless mankind through offices of love.

If pressed to war, they then could answer right,
I am a Christian, therefore cannot fight;

The term admits but one interpretation,
True love to God, and man in every station.

Now Christians, called, can fight in vilest cause,
And for their murders ask the world's applause:

Get up illuminations, shout huzzas,
And bid defiance to Christ's holy laws.

Your shining lights are but portentous gloom—
A dark foreboding of the times to come,

When the dire evils of this murderous war,
And robber-slavery must be answered for.

Then, all these impious pageantrics will cease,
These daring insults to the Prince of peace.

Ah! when will that bright gospel day break in,
When men will cease to glorify their sin!

Upper Derby, 4th mo. 19th, 1847. G. S.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Free Labour Dry Goods and Groceries.

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL.

Fresh and new goods just received, consisting in part of Shirting and Sheeting Muslin, Bleached and Brown.
"Manchester" Ginghams of superior quality, various styles.
2d Quality do. assorted patterns.
Calico do. do.
Coloured Cambrics and Canton Flannel, assorted colours.
Bleached and Brown do. do. and Table Diapers.
Coloured Table Cloths, Imitation of Linen.
Cotton Hosiery, assorted styles.
Long and Half Hose, superior and heavy.
Aprons and Pocket Handkerchiefs.
Cotton Twilled Pantaloons Stuff.
Knitting Cotton, various Nos., Bleached, Brown and Coloured.

Cotton Laps and Wadding, white and coloured. Also:
Gingham and Cheesemore Handkerchiefs,
Muslin de Laine, plain and neatly decorated, all wool.
Lace, warranted free from cotton.
Refined Lard, Cracked and Polished Sugar.
Brown Sugar, good quality, of different grades, by the barrel, bag, or pound.
Sugar House and West India Molasses, good quality.
Rice, Coffee and Chocolate.

SUPPERIOR TEAS, SELECTED WITH CARE FOR FAMILY USE OR STONES, viz. Fine Oolong, Souchong and other Black Teas; also, Green Tea of superior quality.

Various Spices and Confectionery, &c. &c. The whole stock exclusively of Free Labour Goods, in which the subscriber would invite the attention of Country Merchants, as well as his friends and the public generally.

GEORGE W. TAYLOR.

Successor to Joel Fisher.

N. W. corner Fifth and Cherry Sts.,

Philadelphia, 2d mo. 25th, 1847.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

Edited by ABRAHAM L. PENNOCK, SAMUEL RUARDS, and GEORGE W. TAYLOR, is published on the first of each month, at ONE DOLLAR per annum, for one copy, or FIVE DOLLARS per annum, for six copies.

All communications should be addressed and payments
made to the Publisher, George W. Taylor, N. W. corner of Fifth and Cherry sts. Philadelphia. Papers per mail should be endorsed, Non-Slaveholder, Philadelphia.

PRINTED AT

Merrihow & Thompson's Book & Job Office.
No. 7 Carter's Alley.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

"Whoso gives the motive, makes his brother's sin his own."

VOL. II.]

PHILADELPHIA, SIXTH MONTH, 1847.

[NO. 6.]

COMMUNICATIONS.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE SCRIPTURAL DEFENCE OF SLAVERY.

(Continued.)

It remains to be inquired, what was the condition of the purchased servants under the laws of Moses; and what was the duration of their servitude?

These purchased servants were evidently of two descriptions.—Hebrews, and strangers. Of whom were they respectively bought? That they were not bought, as many of the African slaves unquestionably were, of kidnappers, is very clear from the provision, "He that stealeth a man and selleth him, or if he be found in his hand, he shall surely be put to death."* And if the stealing of a man was a capital offence, those more violent methods of procuring slaves, by which the slavery of the United States was supplied, could not be allowed. The servants must have been purchased of those who had a right to sell them. That they sometimes, if not generally, sold themselves, is fairly deducible from various passages of scripture. "If a sojourner or stranger wax rich by thee, and thy brother that dwelleth by him wax poor, and sell himself unto the stranger or sojourner by thee, or to the stock of the stranger's family, after he is sold he may be redeemed again; or if he be able he may redeem himself."† The provisions of the Mosaic law in this case, evidently indicate that the sale was nothing more than a payment in advance for services to be rendered; and that the agreement might be cancelled by the repayment of such part of the money advanced as remained due.
In the same chapter, mention is made of a Hebrew waxing poor and being sold to one of his own nation; yet the verb is the same, and in the same form, as that translated here sell himself.
"Thus saith the Lord where is the bill of your mother's divorcement whom I have put away!

and which of my creditors is it to whom I have sold you? Behold for your iniquities have ye sold yourselves, and for your transgressions is your mother put away.* For thus saith the Lord, ye have sold yourselves for nought; and ye shall be redeemed without money."† Here we have a manifest allusion to the principle of the Mosaic rule, that the price of redemption should be regulated by the cost of the purchase; the seller and the one sold being the same. If the contracts which were termed selling themselves had not been usual among the Israelites, it is not likely the expression would have been so frequently used. The prophet told Ahab he had sold himself to work evil in the sight of the Lord.‡ "There was none like unto Ahab, which did sell himself to work wickedness in the sight of the Lord, whom Jezebel his wife stirred up."§ The people of Israel are said to have sold themselves, to do evil in sight of the Lord.|| That slavery, according to its modern acceptation, could not originate in a sale made by the person sold, is too evident to require discussion. In American slavery, not only the person of the slave, but all the property which he may acquire, is deemed to belong to the master. A man who should sell himself into American slavery, would emphatically and literally sell himself for nought. The purchase money would go with the purchase.

That persons among the Israelites were sometimes sold for debt, is at least probable. The expression above quoted from Isaiah, "which of my creditors is it to whom I have sold you?" seems to allude to such a practice. The complaint of the prophet's widow, whose sons were in danger of being taken as servants to pay the debts of their father, shows that this usage was not unknown at that time.¶ The parable of our Saviour, in which he represents a creditor as ordering a debtor and his family to be sold for a debt, indicates the existence of the practice.** But as * Lev. i. 1.

† I. Kings, xx. 26.

‡ II. Kings, xvii. 17.

§ Is. lii. 3.

|| Is. xli. 25.

¶ Is. lv. 1.

** Mat. xiii. 25.

* Ex. xxi. 15. † Levit. xix. 47—51. ‡ Verse 39.

such sale is nowhere authorized by the institutions of Moses, we may consider it as one of the corruptions of later years. It is, however, not improbable that those who sold themselves were induced so to do in consequence of debt; as the purchase money, or in other words, the payment in advance for services to be rendered, might furnish the means of satisfying an importunate creditor.

In the case of theft, restitution was to be made, in some cases five-fold;* but if the thief had not property to satisfy the demand, he was to be sold for the theft. But the nature of the case clearly intimates that the sale would be according to the amount of the penalty. The object was not vengeance, but restitution.

We find, indeed, mention of a man selling his daughter, to be a maid servant;† but it would be a strange construction of the text, to infer that any servitude beyond what the father himself might exact from his daughter, was authorized by the legislator. As parental authority over the services of their children, was limited among the Israelites in case of females to the age of twelve years; the sale of a daughter, as far as servitude was concerned, could not extend beyond that age. But we find conditions annexed to the case, which plainly show that marriage, not servitude, was the object of the sale. Jarchi, the Jewish commentator, observes that the money of her purchase is that of her espousals. If the purchaser refused to marry her, he was said to have dealt deceitfully with her, and was prohibited from selling her to a stranger. That wives were sold both during the patriarchal ages and under the Mosaic law, is, as I have heretofore observed, manifest from several passages of scripture. This case of a man selling his daughter to be a maid-servant, when viewed in connection with the accompanying conditions, clearly implies that the transaction is supposed to occur before the girl has arrived at marriageable age; and that she is domesticated in the family to which she is to be permanently united by marriage with the purchaser or his son. The provision that if she does not please her master, he shall let her be redeemed, appears applicable to the period of her minority; and the direction to let her go free without money, in case she is not received as a wife, to the nubile period. There is a passage in the Mosaic code, which, to a superficial observer, may appear to sanction the purchase and detention of servants in a manner somewhat analogous to American slavery. "Both thy bondmen and thy bondmaids, which thou shalt have, shall be of the heathen that are round about you; of them shall ye buy bondmen and bondmaids. Moreover of the children of the strangers, that do sojourn among you, of them shall ye buy, and of their families that are with you which they begat in your land; and they shall be your possession. And ye shall take them as an inheritance for your children after you, to inherit them for a possession; they shall be your bondmen forever. But over your brethren, the children of Israel, ye shall not rule one over another with rigour."‡

As these bondmen were to be bought, before they were required to perform any service, it certainly cannot be presumed they were to be purchased of those who had no authority to sell them. If bought of third persons, and reduced to involuntary servitude how could the vendors obtain the power to dispose of them? Can we suppose that the divinely inspired legislator, after so repeatedly and emphatically warning the people against oppressing the strangers that were among them, and appealing to their own bitter experience to impress his admonition more deeply, would encourage the seizure and sale of the strangers, whom they were enjoined to love as themselves, or of the heathen who were round about them? Is it to be imagined that Moses would make stealing a man a capital crime, and yet authorize the people to encourage the practice among their neighbours? It may be observed that in the case of stealing a man and selling him, or holding him for sale, the essence of the crime is the reduction of a man into servitude without just compensation. Consequently the prohibition must have included, not only the act of stealing a man, but all other modes of reducing men into servitude without a just and equitable return for the services required. If we advert to the principle, noted in the former number, which forms the basis of the right to property; that every man is the original and proper owner of the powers both of body and mind which have been conferred upon him by the Creator, and consider the solicitude manifest in every part of the Mosaic institutions to guard the weak against the encroachments of the strong, we can scarcely conceive in what manner, consistent with the principles of those institutions, the servants whom the Israelites were permitted to buy of their heathen neighbours, or of the strangers residing among them, could become objects of sale, unless they first sold themselves. To suppose that they were to be bought of third persons, as the * Ex. xxi. 1-5.

† D. xxi. 7.

* Lev. xix. 44-46.

slaves in the United States now are, is to suppose the vendors possessed of an authority which could not be acquired without violence or fraud. To preserve consistency in the Mosaic code we must consider the servants themselves as parties to the contract. What then was the condition of the servants when bought, and what was the duration of their service?

We have seen, in the preceding number, that the purchased servants were to attend the religious festivals, and be thus excused from their usual labour during a considerable time in each year. It is obvious that the purchased servant was to be incorporated with the family of the master, to be proselyted to the Israelitish religion, and entitled to the general privileges of the native Israelites. "And the Lord said unto Moses and Aaron, This is the ordinance of the passover: There shall no stranger eat thereof; But every man's servant, that is bought with money, when thou hast circumcised him, then shall he eat thereof. A foreigner and an hired servant shall not eat thereof.* There shall no stranger eat of the holy thing; a sojourner of the priest, or an hired servant, shall not eat of the holy thing. But if the priest buy any soul with his money, he shall eat of it, and he that is born in his house; they shall eat of his meat."† See, also, Deut. xii. 12, 18.

That the condition of the purchased servant was greatly superior to that of the hired one, is clearly deducible from the parable of the prodigal son. When our Lord was about to present to our view a vivid portrait of a sinner deeply humbled under a conviction of his vice and follies, he represents the returning prodigal as determining to request his father to make him as one of his hired servants.‡

With regard to the duration of servitude, the Mosaic code is sufficiently clear in relation to Hebrew servants. Six years constituted the utmost period of servitude. But in this case special provision is made to prevent the abuse, which forms so glaring a feature of American slavery—the separation of families. "If he came in by himself, he shall go out by himself; If he were married, then his wife shall go out with him."§ Which seems to imply that a married man was not to be bought without his wife. But if the master have given him a wife, and she have borne him sons and daughters, the wife and her children shall be her master's, and he shall go out by himself. The mother was not to be separated from her children. Under these circumstances, it was hardly to be expected that the husband would incline to leave the service of his master, unless his condition there was disagreeable. A way is therefore made to keep the family together. "If the servant shall plainly say, I love my master, my wife, and my children, I will not go out free. Then his master shall bring him to the judges; he shall, also, bring him to the door, or to the door post, and his master shall bore his ear through with an awl; and he shall serve him forever."¶ This provision is evidently designed to favour the servant, by providing him with a permanent home, under the same roof with his wife and children. If he chooses to go free at the expiration of the sixth year, the master cannot detain him; but if he determines to remain, it does not appear that the master has any authority to discharge him. But the determination to continue in the service of the former master must be openly declared. He must be brought to the judges. Would a provision like this, in the slave laws of the southern states, be any thing more than an unmeaning letter? Or would any freeman willingly become an American slave merely because his wife and children were held in slavery? We shall hereafter see that the expression, he shall serve him forever, must be construed in a limited sense.

When the Hebrews sold themselves, the only legitimate sale which appeared consonant to the spirit of the Mosaic laws, the purchase money was, as already observed, a payment in advance; if, indeed, the purchase money was paid at the time of sale. But we find that a farther payment or gratuity was required at the expiration of the time. "And when thou sendest him out free from thee, thou shalt not let him go away empty: thou shalt furnish him liberally out of thy flock, and out of thy floor, and out of thy wine-press: of that wherewith the Lord hath blessed thee, thou shalt give unto him."‡ This seems like assisting him to set up for himself. Hence we may reasonably infer that servants were expected to be able, during their servitude, to acquire property, either by wages received from their masters, or from other available sources. We find, indeed, that they did sometimes attain considerable wealth. Thus Ziba, who is called the servant of Mephibosheth, and who seems, also, to have been the servant of Jonathan, must have had no trivial amount of property, for we find he had twenty servants, besides his fifteen sons to manage it. His present to David, on a sudden emergency, indicates the command of * Ex. xii. 43-45. † Levit. xxii. 10, 11.

‡ Luke, 15, 19.* Ex. xxi. 2-6. † Deut. xv. 13, 14.
‡ 2 Sam. ix. 9, 10.

resources, which the poor do not possess.* It seems that his servitude was similar to that of Eliezer, in the family of Abraham, who was considered as the heir as well as steward of his master. When David, upon a false charge of disloyalty, too hastily pronounced the property of Mephibosheth forfeited, Ziba, the servant, was viewed as the proper successor.†

An important trait in the character of the Israelitish servitude, was its limited duration. An engagement to serve during life, unless that service was to be compensated by wages, of which the servant should have the entire control, could hardly be made by a rational being. And, as already stated, the only method compatible with the principles of the Mosaic institutions, by which a person would become an object of sale, was the sale of himself. Hence we have prima facie evidence, that the servitude was of limited duration.

But the testimony on this subject, found in the law itself, appears to me conclusive. "Ye shall hallow the fiftieth year, and proclaim liberty throughout all the land, unto all the inhabitants thereof: it shall be a jubilee unto you; and ye shall return every man unto his possession: and ye shall return every man unto his family."‡ Though the Hebrew servant, who refused to leave his master's family at the expiration of his six years' service, and had his ear bored as an evidence of the perpetuity of his servitude, is said to be required to serve forever, yet it is agreed on all hands, that he became free on the year of jubilee. He then returned to the possession of his fathers. But the language is general, freedom was to be proclaimed to all the inhabitants of the land.

It is farther observable that in the passage which authorizes the purchase of servants from the heathen, there is no intimation of hereditary servitude in the family of the purchased servants.

From this review I apprehend the proposition announced in the former number is fully sustained; that American slavery can derive no sanction from the usages of the patriarchal age, or the institutions of Moses.

E. L.

(To be continued.)

For the Non-Slaveholder.
JOHN WOOLMAN.

The name of John Woolman is intimately connected with the history of the abolition of slavery in the society to which he belonged. He stands enrolled as one of the efficient pioneers in the progress of emancipation. Yet it may be fairly questioned whether posterity has even yet appreciated the extent of his labours, or fathomed the spring from which his abhorrence of slavery was drawn.

* Sam. xvi. 1. † Ib. xvi. 4. ‡ Levit. xxv. 10.

He seems to have been prepared, even in childhood, for the part which in maturer life he took in this momentous cause. The simple but impressive tale which he tells, of killing a robin in the thoughtlessness of juvenile sport, and of the painful sensations which ensued, gives evidence of a mind delicately-sensitive to the sufferings of the inferior race; and clearly shows that the Divine influence, which afterwards led him to sympathise so deeply with all the creatures, rational and irrational, whom the Creator had endowed with feeling and life, had then begun its salutary work. The child who deplored the miseries of the nestlings perishing for want of their dam, was not likely, when he became a man, to regard with indifference the sufferings of men, women and children, crowded in the suffocating holds of a slave ship. Viewing the whole human race as the offspring of one common parent, and as equally the objects of the grace which comes by Jesus Christ, he was early instructed to believe that slavery, even in its mildest form, was inconsistent with the purity of the Christian religion. What then was the course which he pursued? Having become convinced that holding the descendants of the African race in slavery was incompatible with christianity, he considered himself bound to abstain, as far as practicable, from sustaining the practice. In his movements we find no countenance given to gradualism, except the gradual illumination of his own mind, and that of others on the subject. When directed by his employer, with whom he was hired by the year, to write an article by which a negro woman, already in slavery, was to be transferred to another master, he obeyed, as he says, through weakness, and wrote it. Her buyer was one of his own religious society; and we have no intimation that the situation of the woman was changed for the worse by the sale; yet he was disturbed on account of the part he had taken in the transaction; and would never afterwards consent to write either a will or article of sale, in which slaves were bequeathed or transferred as property. And his frugeness and Christian demeanor, in this respect, had so much influence over others, that in two instances, wills which he refused to write when slaves were designed to compose a part of the bequests, were eventually made giving them their freedom.

When he was afterwards engaged on a religious visit to the southern provinces, where slaves were then more numerous, and their general condition, no doubt, more unfavourable than in his native land, his sympathetic mind was often turned toward this suffering class. He observes, "when I ate, drank, and lodged, free of cost, with people who lived in ease on the hard labour of their slaves, I felt uneasy; and as my mind was inward to the Lord, I found from place to place this uneasiness return upon me, at times, through the whole visit. Where the masters bore a good share of the burthen, and lived frugally, so that their servants were well provided for, and their labour moderate, I felt more easy; but where they lived in a costly way, and laid heavy burthens on their slaves, my exercise was often great, and I frequently had conversation with them in private, concerning it." This was in the 26th year of his age. He does not then appear to have seen any way of bearing his testimony against slavery, further than by private remonstrance with the masters where they were living at ease and in luxury upon the labour of their slaves. But upon visiting the South, ten or eleven years afterwards, his views upon this subject were evidently enlarged. Where he believed that his entertainment was extorted from the severe drudgery of slaves, he did not consider himself quite clear of participating in the gain of oppression, if he accepted it without cost. He therefore usually offered some pieces of silver to the master of the family, requesting him to give them to such of his negroes as he thought most likely to make a good use of them; or he presented to the slaves themselves a remuneration for his entertainment. If he, as a minister of the Gospel, travelling in the service of his Master, was accounted worthy of his meat, he also intimated, by this proceeding, the lesson, that the labourer in temporal things was also deserving of his hire.

He relates, in one place, with implied approbation, the circumstance of a Mennonist, who, being on business with his wagon at a distance from home, and night coming on, had thoughts of going for entertainment to the house of an acquaintance, who lived near where he then was; but passing by his field, and seeing the distressed appearance of his slaves, he kindled a fire in the woods, and spent the night there.

When attending the Yearly Meeting of Virginia in 1757, the meeting was engaged in the consideration of queries to be answered in the several monthly meetings. One of the queries adopted with general consent was, "Are any concerned in buying or vending goods unlawfully imported, or prize goods?" This implied that members were expected to keep clear of this species of traffic. Another query, offered by the committee for the acceptance of the meeting was, "Are there any concerned in the importation of negroes, or buying them to trade in?" This, of course, left their members at liberty to purchase slaves, from the slave ships, provided they were designed for the service of the purchasers, and not as objects of traffic. On these queries thus placed in contiguity, John Woolman judiciously remarked, that "as purchasing merchandise taken by the sword was always allowed to be inconsistent with our principles; negroes [slaves] being captives of war, or taken by stealth, these circumstances make it inconsistent with our testimony to buy them; and their being our fellow creatures who are sold as slaves, adds greatly to the iniquity." This unequivocal testimony, delivered ninety years ago, that purchasing slaves, obtained and imported as they usually are, is a more glaring violation of our peaceable principles, than the purchase of merchandise taken in war, will, no doubt, be generally admitted at the present day. From this admission the conclusion seems inevitable, that purchasing the products which these slaves are imported to bring into existence, and which are actually the result of their extorted and uncompensated labour, cannot be quite accordant with those principles. To this conclusion, it is manifest, John Woolman eventually arrived, as will appear in the sequel.

It is stated above that John Woolman gave no countenance to gradualism, except the gradual illumination of his own mind and that of others on this subject. This is forcibly illustrated by a passage in his journal under date of 1758.

In that year the subject of purchasing slaves was brought before the Yearly Meeting to which he belonged, on which occasion he remarks:

"Many friends appeared to be deeply bowed under the weight of the work, and manifested much firmness in their love to the cause of Truth and universal righteousness on the earth. Though none justified the practice of slave-keeping in general, yet some appeared concerned, lest the meeting should go into such measures as might give uneasiness to many brethren; alleging that if Friends patiently continued under the exercise, the Lord in time to come might open a way for the deliverance of these people. Finding an engagement to speak, I said, 'My mind is often led to consider the purity of the Divine Being, and the justice of his judgments; and herein my soul is covered with awfulness. I cannot omit to hint of some cases, where people have not been treated with the purity of justice, and the event hath been lamentable. Many slaves on this continent are oppressed, and their cries have reached the ears of the Most High. Such are the purity and cerclarity of his judgments, that he cannot be partial in our favour. In infinite love and goodness, he hath opened our understandings, from one time to another, concerning our duty toward this people, and it is not a time for delay. Should we now be sensible of what he requires of us, and through a respect for the private interest of some persons, or through a regard to some friendships which do not stand on an immutable foundation, neglect to do our duty, in firmness and constancy, still waiting for some extraordinary means to bring about their deliverance, it may be that God may answer us, in this matter, by terrible things in righteousness.<sup>24</sup>

He appears to have thought that when they were furnished with light enough on this subject, to see their way, it was presumptuous to wait for more.

The species of gradualism, which existed at that time in the Society of Friends, is illustrated by a circumstance related immediately after the passage just quoted. "Several Friends, who had negroes, expressed their desire that a rule might be made, to deal with such Friends as offenders, who bought slaves in future." This, evidently, did not satisfy John Woolman, for he observes, "it was answered," though he does not tell us by whom, probably by himself, "that the root of this evil would never be effectually struck at until a thorough search was made into the circumstances of such Friends who kept negroes, with respect to the righteousness of their motives in keeping them, that impartial justice might be administered throughout."

That Friends who held slaves themselves, whom, or whose ancestors they or their fathers had bought, should advocate the formation of a rule to deal with such of their brethren as should do a similar act in future, would appear, at the present day, too closely bordering on the ludicrous, to constitute a part of a Yearly Meeting's procedure. This was keeping too near the surface for such a mind as John Woolman's. He was for going to the bottom of the matter. And where did he find that bottom? If we examine his own biography we shall readily find an answer to the question.

Near the beginning of 1770 he opened to his friends an apprehension that his duty required him to be resigned to pay a visit to some parts of the British West Indies. His concern in relation to the use of slave-grown products, and the traffic to them, is explained in the following extract from his journal, which, though long, is worthy of a serious perusal.

"Some years ago, I retailed rum, sugar and molasses, the fruits of the labour of slaves; but they had not much concern about them, save only that the rum might be used in moderation; nor was this concern so weightily attended to, as I now believe it ought to have been. But of late years, being further informed respecting the oppressions too generally exercised in these islands, and thinking often on the degrees there are in the connexions of interest and fellowship with the works of darkness, Epho. v. 11; and feeling an increasing concern to be wholly given up to the leadings of the Holy Spirit, it hath appeared to me, that the small gain I got by this branch of trade, should be applied in promoting righteousness on the earth; and was the first motion toward a visit to Barbadoes. I believed the outward substance I possess should be applied in paying my passage, if I got, and providing things in a lowly way for my subsistence; but when the time drew near, in which I believed it required of me to be in readiness, a difficulty arose, which hath been a continued trial for some months past; under which, I have with abatement of mind, from day to day, sought the Lord for instruction; and often had a feeling of the condition of one formerly, who bewailed himself, for that the Lord hid his face from him. During these exercises, my heart hath been often contrite; and I have had a tender feeling of the temptations of my fellow-creatures, labouring under those expensive customs distinguishable from the simplicity that there is in Christ, 2 Cor. ii. 3, and sometimes in the renewings of Gospel love, I have been helped to minister to others.

"That which hath so closely engaged my mind in seeking to the Lord for instruction is, whether after so full information of the oppression which the slaves who raise the West India produce lie under, as I had in reading a caution and warning to Great Britain and her colonies, written by Anthony Benezet, it is right for me to take a passage in a vessel employed in the West India trade.

"To trade freely with oppressors, and, without labouring to dissuade from their unkind treatment, seek for gain by such traffic, tends, I believe, to make them more easy respecting their conduct, than they would be, if the cause of universal righteousness was humbly and firmly attended to, by those with whom they have commerce. That complaint of the Lord by his prophet, 'They have strengthened the hands of the wicked,' hath very often revived in my mind; and I may here add some circumstances preceding any prospect of a visit there. The case of David hath often been before me of late years; he longed for some water in a well beyond an army of Philistines, at war with Israel; and some of his men to please him, ventured their lives in passing through this army, and brought that water.

"It doth not appear that the Israelites were then scarce of water, but rather, that David gave way to delicacy of taste; but having thought on the danger these men were exposed to, he considered this water as their blood, and his heart smote him that he could not drink it, but poured it out to the Lord. The oppression of the slaves which I have seen in several journeys southward, on this continent, and the report of their treatment in the West Indies hath deeply affected me; and a care to live in the spirit of peace, and minister just cause of offence to none of my fellow-creatures, hath, from time to time, livingly revived on my mind; and under this exercise, I have for some years past, declined to gratify my palate with those sugars.

"I do not censure my brethren in these things; but believe the Father of mercies, to whom all mankind by creation are equally related, hath heard the groans of these oppressed people; and is preparing soon to have a tender feeling of their condition; and the trading in, or frequent use of any produce known to be raised by the labours of those who are under such lamentable oppression, hath appeared to be a subject which may yet require the more serious consideration of the humble followers of Christ, the prince of peace.

"After long and mournful exercise, I am now free to mention how things have opened in my mind, with desires that if it may please the Lord, further to open his will to any of his children in this matter, they may faithfully follow him in such further manifestation.

"The number of those who decline the use of the West India produce, on account of the hard usage of the slaves who raise it, appears small, even amongst people truly pious; and the labours in Christian love on that subject, of those who do, are not very extensive.

"Were the trade from this continent to the West Indies to be quite stopped at once, I believe many there would suffer for want of bread.

"Did we on this continent, and the inhabitants of the West Indies generally dwell in pure righteousness, I believe a small trade between us might be right. Under these considerations, when the thoughts of wholly declining the use of trading vessels, and of trying to hire a vessel to go in ballast have arisen in my mind, I have believed that the labours in Gospel love, yet bestowed in the cause of universal righteousness, are not arrived to that height.

"If the trade to the West Indies was no more than was consistent with pure wisdom, I believe the passage money would, for good reasons, be higher than it is now; and under deep exercise of mind, I have believed that I should not take the advantage of this great trade and small passage money; but as a testimony in favour of less trading, should pay more than is common for others to pay, if I go at this time."

By this extract we find that he had for some years declined the use of West India sugar, on account of the source from which it was obtained. That he endeavoured to avoid the use or consumption of other articles which were obtained by the oppression of slaves, is clearly shown by several incidents related in his journal. Being frequently at dinner where drink was set on the table, in vessels of silver, and in no others, he declined satisfying his thirst out of such vessels; but tenderly requested that some other might be furnished him.

When lying on the bed from which he was never to rise, and the application of medical aid was suggested, he made it a condition that no medicine should be given him which came through polluted channels or oppressive hands. And when he felt the progress of disease impairing his powers of thought, he requested that in case his understanding should be further affected, nothing should be administered to him which his attendants knew he had a testimony against. From the general tenor of his life, it is readily inferred, that he alluded, in this case, to the products of slave labour.

In a life of John Woolman, recently published as part of a volume* which may probably be introduced as a reading book into many of our schools, his testimony with regard to the products of slave labour is entirely overlooked. This, I consider as just cause of regret, and would willingly hope that in case a second edition should be issued, this omission may be supplied.

E. L.

SELECTIONS.

ELIZABETH HEYRICK'S PAMPHLET.

The annexed pamphlet, written by ELIZABETH HEYRICK, of Leicester, England, was published and extensively circulated in 1824. It proved greatly advantageous to the cause of Emancipation in the British West Indies. Until this time, Wm. Knapp and the other leading abolitionists in Great Britain, had directed all their energy towards the abolition of the Slave Trade, under an impression that when this was accomplished the evils of slavery would be gradually mitigated; and the whole system would soon come to an end—in a word, they were gradualists. This pamphlet changed their views; they now attacked slavery as a sin to be forsaken immediately, and the result is known. A limited edition was published that same year in this city, and within the sphere of its circulation excited so much feeling and interest, as induces the belief that a republication will be attended with very beneficial consequences. A third edition is now offered to the American public. It is commended to the attentive, serious perusal of the reader, as the same principles and duties that apply to slavery in the West Indies, are equally applicable to that which exists in the United States.—Philadelphia Edition, 1836.

IMMEDIATE, NOT GRADUAL ABOLITION;

OR,

An Inquiry into the shortest, safest, and most effectual means of getting rid of West India Slavery.

It is now seventeen years since the Slave Trade was abolished by the Government of this country—but Slavery is still perpetuated in our West India Colonies; and the horrors of the Slave Trade are aggravated rather than mitigated by making it felony for British subjects to be concerned in that inhuman traffic, England has only transferred her share of it to other countries. She has, indeed, by negotiation and remonstrance, endeavoured to persuade them to follow her example. But has she succeeded? How should she, while there is so little consistency in her conduct? Who will listen to her pathetic declamations on the injustice and cruelty of the Slave Trade, whilst she rivets the chains upon her own slaves, and subjects them to all the injustice and cruelty which she so eloquently deprecates when her own interest is no longer at stake? Before we can have any rational hope of prevailing on our guilty neighbors to abandon this atrocious commerce,—to relinquish the gain of oppression,—the wealth obtained by rapine and violence,—by the deep groans, the bitter anguish of our unoffending fellow creatures,—we must purge ourselves from these pollutions:—we must break the iron yoke from off the neck of our own slaves, and let the wretched captives in our own islands go free. Then, and not till then, we shall speak to the surrounding nations with the all-commanding eloquence of sincerity and truth; and our persuasions will be backed by the irresistible argument of consistent example. But to invite others to be just and merciful whilst we grasp in our own hands the rod of oppression,—to solicit others to relinquish the wages of iniquity whilst we are putting them into our own pockets—what is it but cant and hypocrisy? Do such preachers of justice and mercy ever make converts? On the contrary, do they not render themselves ridiculous and contemptible?

* Historical Memoirs of Friends, by Wm. Hodgson, Jr.—Esq.

But let us, individually, bring this great question closely home to our own bosoms. We that hear, and read, and approve, and applaud the powerful appeals, the irrefragible arguments against the Slave Trade, and against Slavery,—are we ourselves sincere, or hypocritical? Are we the true friends of justice, or do we only cant about it? To which party do we really belong?—to the friends of emancipation, or of perpetual slavery? Every individual belongs to one party or the other; not speculatively or professionally merely, but practically. The perpetuation of Slavery in our West India colonies, is not an abstract question, to be settled between the Government and the Planters,—it is a question in which we are all implicated; we are all guilty, (with shame and compunction let us admit the opprobrious truth,) of supporting and perpetuating slavery. The West Indian planter and the people of this country, stand in the same moral relation to each other, as the thief and the receiver of stolen goods. The planter refuses to set his wretched captive at liberty—treats him as a beast of burden—compels his reluctant, unremunerated labour under the lash of the cat-whip—why?—because we furnish the stimulant to all this injustice, rapacity, and cruelty, by purchasing its produce. Heretofore, it may have been thoughtlessly and unconsciously done, but now this palliative is removed; the veil of ignorance is rent aside; the whole nation must now divide itself into the active supporters and the active opposers of slavery; there is no longer any ground for any neutral party to stand upon.

The state of slavery in our West India islands, is now become notorious; the secret is out; the justice and humanity, the veracity also, of slave owners, is exactly ascertained; the credit due to their assertions, that their slaves are better fed, better clothed,—are more comfortable, more happy than our English peasantry, is now universally understood. The tricks and impostures practised by the colonial assemblies, to hoodwink the people, to humbug the government, and to bamboozle the gentry, (as the friends of emancipation are scornfully termed,) have all been detected, and the cry of the nation has been raised, from one end to the other, against this complicated system of knavery and imposture, of intolerable oppression, of relentless and savage barbarity.

But is all this knowledge to end in exclamations, in petitions, and remonstrances? Is there nothing to be done, as well as said? Are there no tests to prove our sincerity, no sacrifices to be offered in confirmation of our zeal? Yes, there is one, (but it is in itself so small and insignificant, that it seems almost burlesque to dignify it with the name of sacrifice)—it is ABSTINENCE FROM THE USE OF WEST INDIAN PRODUCE, sugar especially, in the cultivation of which slave labour is chiefly occupied. Small, however, and insignificant as the sacrifice may appear, it would, at once, give the death blow to West Indian slavery. When there is no longer a market for the productions of slave labour, then, and not till then, will the slaves be emancipated.

Many had recourse to this expedient about thirty years ago, when the public attention was so generally roused to the enormities of the Slave Trade. But when the trade was abolished by the British legislature, it was too readily concluded that the abolition of slavery, in the British dominions, would have been an inevitable consequence; this species of abstinence was therefore unhappily discontinued.

But (it will be objected) if there be no market for West India produce, the West Indian proprietors will be ruined, and the slaves, instead of being benefitted, will perish by famine.* Not so,—the West Indian proprietors understand their own interests better. The market, though shut to the productions of slave labour, would still be open to the productions of free labour, and the planters are not such devoted worshippers of slavery as to make a voluntary sacrifice of their own interests upon her altar; they will not doom the soil to perpetual barrenness rather than suffer it to be cultivated by free men. It has been abundantly proved that voluntary labour is more productive, more advantageous to the employer, than compulsory labour. The experiments of the venerable and philanthropic Joshua Steel, have established the fact beyond all doubt; but the planter shuts his eyes to such facts, though clear and evident as the sun at noon day. None are so blind as those who will not see. The conviction, then, must be forced upon these infatuated men. It is often asserted, that slavery is too deeply rooted an evil to be eradicated by the exertions of any principle less potent and active than self-interest; if so, the resolution to abstain from West Indian produce, would bring this potent and active principle into the fullest operation,—would compel the planter to set his slaves at liberty.*

But were such a measure to be ultimately injurious to the interest of the planter, that consideration ought not to weigh a feather in the scale against emancipation. The slave has a right to his liberty, a right which it is a crime to withhold, let the consequences to the planters be what they may. If I have been deprived of my rightful inheritance, and the usurper, because he has long kept possession, asserts his right to the property of which he has defrauded me; are my just claims to it at all weakened by the boldness of his pretensions, or by the plea that restitution would impoverish and involve him in ruin? And to what inheritance, or birthright, can any mortal have pretensions so just, (until forfeited by crime) as to liberty? What injustice and rapacity can be compared to that which defrauds a man of his best earthly inheritance, tears him from his dearest connexions, and condemns him and his posterity to the degradation and misery of interminable slavery?

In the great question of emancipation, the interests of two parties are said to be involved,—the interest of the slave and that of the planter. But it cannot for a moment be imagined that these two interests have an equal right to be consulted, without confounding all moral distinctions, all difference between real and pretended, between substantial and assumed claims. With the interest of the planters, the question of emancipation has (properly speaking) nothing to do. The right of the slave, and the interest of the planter, are distinct questions; they belong to separate departments, to different provinces of consideration. If the liberty of the slave can be secured not only without injury, but with advantage to the planter, so much the better, certainly; but still the liberation of the slave ought ever to be regarded as an independent object; and if it be deferred till the planter is sufficiently alive to his own interest to co-operate in the measure, we may for ever despair of its accomplishment. The cause of emancipation has been long and ably advocated. Reason and eloquence, persuasion and argument, have been powerfully exerted, experiments have been fairly made, facts broadly stated in proof of the impolicy as well as iniquity of slavery,—to little purpose; even the hope of its extinction, with the concurrence of the planter, or by any enactment of the colonial or British legislature, is still seen in very remote perspective,—so remote that the heart sickens at the cheerless prospect. All that zeal and talent could display in the way of argument, has been exerted in vain. All that an accumulated mass of indubitable evidence could offer in the way of conviction, has been brought to no effect.

* It has been ascertained, that the abstinence of meat of the inhabitants of this country from West India sugar, would abolish West Indian slavery.

It is high time, then, to resort to other measures—to ways and means more summary and effectual. Too much time has already been lost in declamation and argument,—in petitions and remonstrances against British slavery. The cause of emancipation calls for something more decisive, more efficient than words. It calls upon the real friends of the poor degraded and oppressed African to bind themselves by a solemn engagement, an irrevocable vow, to participate no longer in the crime of keeping him in bondage. It calls upon them to "wash their own hands in innocence,"—to abjure for ever the miserable hypocrisy of pretending to commiserate the slave, whilst, by purchasing the productions of his labour, they bribe his master to keep him in slavery. The great Apostle of the Gentiles declared, that he would "eat no flesh whilst the world stood, rather than make his brother to offend." Do you make a similar resolution respecting West Indian produce. Let your resolution be made conscientiously, and kept inviolably; let no plausible arguments which may be urged against it tempt you from your purpose,—and in the course of a few months; slavery in the British dominions will be annihilated.

"Yes, (it may be said) if all would unite in such a resolution,—but what can the abstinence of a few individuals, or a few families do, towards the accomplishment of so vast an object?" It can do wonders. Great effects often result from small beginnings. Your resolution will influence that of your friends and neighbours: each of them will, in like manner, influence their friends and neighbours; the example will spread from house to house, from city to city; till, among those who have any claim to humanity, there will be but one heart, and one mind,—one resolution, one uniform practice. Thus by means the most simple and easy, would West Indian slavery be most safely and speedily abolished.

"But, (it will be objected) it is not an immediate, but a gradual emancipation, which the most enlightened and judicious friends of humanity call for, as a measure best calculated, in their judgment, to promote the real interests of the slave, as well as his master; the former, not being in a condition to make a right use of his freedom, were it suddenly restored to him?" This, it must be admitted, appears not only the general, but almost universal sentiment of the abolitionists: to oppose it, therefore, may seem a most presumptuous, as well as hopeless attempt. But truth and justice are stubborn and inflexible; they yield neither to numbers or authority.

The history of emancipation in St. Domingo, and of the conduct of the emancipated slaves for thirty years subsequent to that event (as detailed in Clarkson's admirable pamphlet, on the necessity of improving the condition of our West Indian slaves,) is a complete refutation of all the elaborate arguments which have been artfully advanced to discredit the design of immediate emancipation. No instance has been recorded in these important annals, of the emancipated slaves (not the gradually, but the immediately emancipated slaves) having abused their freedom. On the contrary, it is frequently asserted in the course of the narrative, that the negroes continued to work upon all the plantations as quietly as before emancipation. Through the whole of Clarkson's diligent and candid investigations, of the conduct of emancipated slaves, comprising a body of more than 500,000 persons, under a great variety of circumstances, a considerable proportion of whom had been suddenly emancipated—with all the vicious habits of slavery upon them; many of them accustomed to the use of arms; he has not, throughout this vast mass of emancipated slaves, found a single instance of bad behaviour; not even a refusal to work, or of disobedience to orders; much less, had he heard of frightful massacres, or of revenge for past injuries, even when they had it amply in their power. Well might this benevolent and indefatigable abolitionist arrive at the conclusion, "that emancipation (why did he not say immediate emancipation?) was not only practicable, but practicable without danger." All the frightful massacres and conflagrations which took place in St. Domingo, in 1794 and 1795, occurred during the days of slavery. They originated, too, not with the slaves, but with the white and coloured planters; between the royalists and the revolutionists, who, for purposes of mutual vengeance, called in the aid of the slaves. Col. Malenfant, in his history of the emancipation, written during his residence in St. Domingo, ridicules the notion that the negroes would not work without compulsion,—and asserts that on one plantation, more immediately under his own observation, on which more than four hundred negroes were employed, not one in the number refused to work after their emancipation.

In the face of such a body of evidence, the detaining our West Indian slaves in bondage, is a continued acting of the same atrocious injustice which first kidnapped and tore them from their kindred and native soil, and robbed them of that sacred unalienable right which no considerations, how plausible soever, can justify the withholding. We have no right, on any pretext of expediency or pretended humanity to say—"because you have been made a slave, and thereby degraded and debased; therefore, I will continue to hold you in bondage until you have acquired a capacity to make a right use of your liberty." As well might you say to a poor wretch, gasping and languishing in a pest-house, "here will I keep you, till I have given you a capacity for the enjoyment of pure air."

You admit that the ills of the slave, as well as his miseries—his intellectual and moral, as well as corporeal degradation, are consequent on his slavery; remove the cause, then, and the effect will cease. Give the slave his liberty,—in the sacred name of justice, give it him at once. Whilst you hold him in bondage, he will profit little from your plans of amelioration. He has not, by all his complicated injuries and debasements, been disinherited of his organs;—this will teach him to give no credence to your admonitory lessons—your Christian instructions will be lost upon him, so long as he both knows and feels that his instructors are grossly violating their own lessons.

The enemies of slavery have hitherto ruined their cause by the senseless cry of gradual emancipation. It is marvellous that the wise and the good should have suffered themselves to have been imposed upon by this wily artifice of the slaveholder, for with him must the project of gradual emancipation have first originated. The slaveholder knew very well that his prey would be secure, so long as the abolitionists could be cajoled into a demand for gradual instead of immediate abolition. He knew very well that the contemplation of a gradual emancipation, would beget a gradual indifference to emancipation itself. He knew very well, that even the wise and the good, may, by habit and familiarity, be brought to endure and tolerate almost any thing. He had caught the poet's idea, that—

"Vice is a monster of such frightful mien,
As to be hated, needs but to be seen;
But, seen too oft, familiar with her face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace."

He caught the idea, and knew how to turn it to advantage. He knew very well, that the faithful delineation of the horrors of West Indian slavery, would produce such a general insurrection of sympathetic and indignant feeling, such abhorrence of the oppressor, such compassion for the oppressed, as must soon have been fatal to the whole system. He knew very well, that a strong moral fermentation had begun, which, had it gone forward, would soon have purified the nation from the foulest of its corruptions; that the cries of the people for emancipation would have been too unanimous, and too important for the Government to resist, and that slavery would, long ago, have been exterminated throughout the British dominions. Our example might have spread from kingdom to kingdom, from continent to continent, and the slave-trade and slavery might by this time have been abolished all the world over: "A sacrifice of a sweet savour," might have ascended to the Great Parent of the Universe: "His kingdom might have come, and his will (thus far) have been done on earth, as it is in Heaven."

But this GRADUAL ABOLITION has been the grand marplot of human virtue and happiness; the very master-piece of sordid policy. By converting the cry for immediate, into gradual emancipation, the prince of slaveholders transformed himself, with astonishing dexterity, into an angel of light, and thereby deceived the very elect. He saw very clearly, that if public justice and humanity, especially, if Christian justice and humanity, could be brought to demand only a gradual extermination of the enormities of the slave system; if they could be brought to acquiesce, but for one year, or for one month, in the slavery of our African brother, in robbing him of all the rights of humanity, and degrading him to a level with the brutes; that then they could imperceptibly be brought to acquiesce in all this for an unlimited duration. He saw very clearly that the time for the extermination of slavery, was precisely that, when its horrid impiety and enormity were first distinctly known and strongly felt. He knew that every moment's unnecessary delay, between the discovery of an imperious duty, and the setting earnestly about its accomplishment, was dangerous, if not fatal to success. He knew that strong excitement was necessary to strong effort; that intense feeling was necessary to stimulate intense exertion; that, as strong excitement and intense feeling are generally transient, in proportion to their strength and intensity, the most effectual way of crushing a great and virtuous enterprise, was to gain time, to defer it to "a more convenient season," when the zeal and ardour of the first conviction of duty had subsided; when our sympathies had become languid; when considerations of the difficulties and hazards of the enterprise, the solicitations of ease and indulgence, should have chilled the warm glow of humanity, quenched the fervid heroism of virtue; when familiarity with relations of violence and outrage, crimes and miseries, should have abated the horror of their first impression, and, at length, induced indifference.

The father of lies, the grand artificer of fraud and imposture, transformed himself, therefore, on this occasion, pre-eminently "into an angel of light," and deceived, not the unwary only, the unsuspecting multitude, but the wise and the good, by the plausibility, the apparent force, the justice, and above all, by the humanity of the arguments propounded for gradual emancipation. He is the subtlest of all reasoners, the most ingenious of all sophists, the most eloquent of all declaimers. He, above all other advocates, "can make the worse appear the better argument;" can most effectually pervert the judgment and blind the understanding, whilst they seem to be most enlightened and rectified. Thus, by a train of most exquisite reasoning, has he brought the abolitionists to the conclusion, that the interests of the poor, degraded, and oppressed slave, as well as that of his master, will be best secured by his remaining in slavery. It has, indeed, been proposed to mitigate, in some degree, the miseries of his interminable bondage, but the blessings of emancipation, according to the propositions of the abolitionists in the last session of Parliament, were to be reserved for his posterity alone, and every idea of immediate emancipation is still represented, not only as impolitic, enthusiastic, and visionary, but as highly injurious to the slave himself,—and a train of supposed apt illustrations is continually at hand, to expose the absurdity of such a project. "Who (it is asked) would place a somnolent banquet before a half-finished wretch, whilst his powers of digestion were so feeble that it would be fatal to partake of it? Who would bring a body benumbed and half-frozen with cold, into sudden contact with fervid heat? Who would take a poor captive from his dungeon, where he had been immured whole years in total darkness, and bring him at once into the dazzling light of a meridian sun? No one, in his senses, certainly. All these transitions from famine to plenty,—from cold to heat,—from darkness to light, must be gradual in order to be salutary." But must it therefore follow by any inductions of common sense, that emancipation out of the gripe of a robber or an assassin—out of the jaws of a shark or a tiger, must be gradual? Must it, therefore, follow, that the wretched victim of slavery must always remain in slavery? That emancipation must be so gradual that the blessings of freedom shall never be tasted by him who has endured all the curses of slavery, but be reserved for his posterity alone?

There is something unnatural, something revolting to the common sense of justice, in reserving all the sweets of freedom for those who have never tasted the bitter cup of bondage,—in dooming those who have once been compelled to drink it, to drink it to the very dregs. Common equity demands that relief should be administered first to those who have suffered most; that the healing balm of mercy should be imparted first to those who have smarted most under the rod of oppression; that those who have borne the galling yoke of slavery, should first experience the blessings of liberty. The cause of emancipation loses more than half its interest, when the public sympathy is diverted from its natural channel,—turned from the living victims of colonial bondage to their unborn progeny.

It is utterly astonishing, with such an object as West Indian slavery before us, rendered palpable, in all its horrors, almost to our very senses, by a multitude of indubitable facts, collected from various sources of the highest authority, all uniting in the same appalling evidence;—with the sight of our fellow creatures in bondage so rigorous,—in moral and physical degradation so abject;—under a tyranny so arbitrary, wanton and barbarous—it is utterly astonishing, that our compassion and sympathy should be so timid and calculating—so slow and cautious.

Under the contemplation of individual suffering, comparatively trifling, both in nature and duration, our compassion is prompt and quick in its movements,—our exertions spontaneous and instinctive; we go the shortest way to work, in effecting the relief of the sufferer. But, in emancipating eight hundred thousand of our fellow creatures and fellow subjects from a worse than Egyptian bondage, we advance toward the object by a route the most indirect and circuitous; we petition Parliament year after year, for gradual emancipation: to what purpose? Are we gaining or losing ground by these delays? Are we approaching nearer, or receding farther from the attainment of our object? The latter, it is too evident, is, and must be the case. The evil principle is more subtle and active in its various operations, than the good principle. The advocates of slavery, are more alert and successful in insinuating into the public mind, doubts and fears, coldness and apathy on the subject of emancipation, than the abolitionists are in counteracting such hostile influence; and the desertions from the anti-slavery standard, in point of zeal and activity if not in numbers, since the agitation of the question in Parliament last year, are doubtless very considerable.

Should the numerous petitions to Parliament be ultimately successful; should the prayer for gradual emancipation be granted; still, how vague and indefinite would be the benefit resulting from such success. Should some specific time be appointed by government, for the final extinction of colonial slavery, that period we have been informed from high authority, will not be an early one. And who can calculate the tears and groans, the anguish and despair, the tortures and outrages which may be added, during the term of that protracted interval, to the enormous mass of injuries already sustained by the victims of West Indian bondage? Who can calculate the aggravated accumulation of guilt which may be incurred by its active agents, its interested abettors and supporters? Why, then, in the name of humanity, of common sense, and common honesty, do we petition Parliament, year after year, for a gradual abolition of this horrid system?—this complication of crime and misery? Why petition Parliament at all, to do that for us, which, were they ever so well disposed, we can do more speedily and more effectually for ourselves?

It is no marvel that slaveholders should cry out against immediate emancipation, as they have done against all propositions for softening the rigors of colonial slavery. "Insurrection of all the blacks—massacre of all the whites," are the bugbears which have been constantly conjured up to deter the British Parliament from all interference between the master and his slave. The panic was the same, the outcry just as violent, when an attempt was made about forty years ago, to abate the horrors of the middle passage, by admitting a little more air into the suffocating and pestilential holds of the slave ships; and a noble duke besought Parliament not to meddle with the alarming question.* Confident predictions, from this quarter, of rebellion and bloodshed, have almost uniformly followed every proposition to restrain the power of the oppressor and to mitigate the sufferings of the oppressed.

It is therefore no wonder that West Indian proprietors and slaveholders should exclaim against immediate emancipation; that they should tell us, the slaves are so deprived as well as degraded, as to be utterly incapacitated, for the right use of freedom; that emancipation, instead of leading them into habits of sober, contented industry, would be inevitably followed by idleness, pillage, and all sorts of enormities; in short, that they would rise in a mass, and massacre all the white inhabitants of the islands.

That slaveholders should say, and really believe all this, is perfectly natural; it is no wonder at all, that they should be full of the most groundless suspicions and terrors; for tyrants are the greatest of all cowards. "The wicked fleeeth when no man pursueth;" he is terrified at shadows, and shudders at the spectres of his own guilty imagination.

But that the abolitionists should have caught the infection,—should be panic-struck; that the friends of humanity,—the wise and the good—should be diverted from their purpose by such visionary apprehensions; that they should "fear where no fear is;" should swallow the bait so manifestly laid to draw them aside from their great object; that they should be so credulous, so easily imposed upon, is marvellous.

The simple inquiry, what is meant by emancipation? might have dissipated at once all these terrible spectres of rapine and murder. Does emancipation from slavery imply emancipation from law? Does emancipation from lawless tyranny, from compulsory, unremunerated labour, under the lash of the cart whip, imply emancipation from all responsibility and moral restraint? Were slavery in the British colonies extinguished, the same laws which restrain and punish crime in the white population, would restrain and punish crime in the black population. The danger arising from inequality of numbers would be more than counteracted by the wealth, influence, and the armed force, possessed by the former. But independent of such considerations, the oppressed and miserable, corrupt as is human nature, do not naturally become savage and revengeful when their oppressions and miseries are removed. As long as a human being is bought and sold,—regarded as goods and chattels,—compelled to labour without wages,—branded, chained, and flogged at the caprice of his owner; he will, of necessity, as long as the feeling of pain, the sense of degradation and injury remain, he will, unless he have the spirit of a Christian martyr, be vindictive and revengeful. "Oppression (it is said) will make (ever) a wise man mad." But will the liberated captive, when the iron yoke of slavery is broken; when his heavy burdens are unbound; his bleeding wounds healed; his broken heart bound up; will he then scatter vengeance and destruction around him?

(To be continued.)

THE INEXPEDIENCY OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT PROVED BY STATISTICS DERIVED FROM OFFICIAL SOURCES.—1846.

Within the last fifteen or sixteen years, the infliction of death has been discontinued in England for sheep-stealing, robbery, house-breaking and burglary, horse-stealing, and many other kinds of crime. Indeed, of 100 offences which were punishable with death in the reign of George the Third, only one—Willful Murder—now virtually remains capital.

Now if it can be shown that offences which were capital, but are no longer, did decrease upon the partial or entire discontinuance of the extreme penalty, whilst other crimes remained on the increase, then it follows, as an irresistible and unanswerable conclusion,—That the pain of death did no good as regarded those offences, and was wisely abolished.

Well, this decrease of crime can be shown:—shown, not as regards one particular offence, but as regards various offences for which the capital penalty has been repealed:—shown, not in a dubious form, but in the most clear and indisputable manner.

The Government Returns prove, that there were fewer highway robberies in seven consecutive years, (ending 1840,) with 5 executions, than in the preceding seven years, with 58 executions;—that there were fewer acts of burglary and house-breaking in the same seven years, with only 2 executions, than in the preceding seven years, when 37 persons suffered death for those crimes:—that there was less horse-stealing in the same seven years, without any execution, than in the preceding seven years, during which for that offence alone, 22 convicts were sent to the scaffold.

* See the Debate on this subject in 1786.

Let us now advert to another crime,—one for which the capital penalty was almost sure to follow upon conviction. We refer to the crime of infanticide. For this single offence, in the seven years ending with 1836, no fewer than 64 criminals were executed, and 538 committed: in the next seven years there were none executed, and only 386 committed. Here was a diminution of 28 per cent. in the crime. It will be observed that we are comparing periods of the actual and frequent infliction of capital punishment, with periods immediately following.

If from these details we turn to the state of crime in the aggregate, we find the following result presented by a Parliamentary Return, (No. 547,) printed in 1839.

The Return embraces two periods of five years, for England and Wales; and relates exclusively to such offences as were capital at the commencement, viz.:—

5 yrs. ending with 1833. Executed 255. Committed 11,569.
5 yrs. " " 1838. Executed 95. Committed 11,392.

This Return, then, shows in the aggregate a decrease of crimes that had been capital in the first period.

It may be said, perhaps, that such a result is owing to other causes:—to the spread of education, to the improved morality of the country, and to the increased vigilance of the police: that, in fact, the diminution in these particular cases was but a part of the general diminution of crime throughout the kingdom. But this argument is completely disproved by the fact that during the same time, the commitments for minor offences (i. e. offences not capital in either period,) underwent a great increase: being 85,348 in the first period, and 99,540 in the second.

We have said that Wilful Murder is the only crime now virtually remaining capital. But for murder, no less than other crimes, the penalty of death, as an example, is momentary, and of no beneficial effect:—it disgusts the good, and brutalizes the bad, who witness the spectacle of man cruelly destroyed by man: as an act of extreme violence, it teaches violence to the people: as an act of deliberate homicide, it diminishes the regard due to the sanctity of life, and renders murder less revolting to the unimpaired mind. For murder as well as other crimes, it too often leads to impunity through the suppression of evidence by the associates or acquaintances of the criminal, who recoil at the thought of becoming accessory to the death of one with whom they had formerly lived on terms of familiar intercourse.

Here are two facts upon the subject which speak volumes:—

The years 1815, 1817, 1818, and 1820, were the only years (since 1810) in which all the criminals who were convicted of murder (66 in number) were executed; and this was followed in the years respectively next succeeding by an increase in the crime of murder—an increase in the aggregate commitments amounting to 12 per cent.:

Taking four other years in which the smallest proportion of convicted murderers underwent their sentence, we find them to be 1836, 1838, 1840, and 1842. Now in these four years only 31 were executed out of 83 condemned, and the crime of murder diminished in the years respectively next succeeding—the aggregate commitments diminished 17 per cent.:

In other words, after the sanguinary penalty had been rigidly exacted, murder, the crime for which it was enforced, multiplied; and when the demoralizing exhibitions of the scaffold became fewer, and nearly two-thirds of the malefactors were spared, murders became fewer.

The Parliamentary Paper from which these results are extracted, is No. 618, of Session 1843. That document (in Table I.) also gives the commitments and executions for murder in England and Wales during the thirty years ending December, 1842, divided into five periods of six years each. They show that in the last six years, with only 50 executions, the commitments for murder were fewer by 62 than in the six years ending December, 1836, with 74 executions; fewer by 50 than in the six years ending December, 1830, with 75 executions; fewer by 56 than in the six years ending December, 1824, with 91 executions; and fewer by 92 than in the six years ending December, 1818, when the executions for this crime amounted to the large number of 122.

In the same Parliamentary Paper in which these results are presented, there are Tables which show—1. That from 1834 to 1841 (inclusive) in the counties where all who were convicted of murder were executed, the number of murders remained very nearly the same:—2. That in the counties where commutations of the extreme penalty took place (during the same period,) the years respectively following such commutations exhibited a diminution in the commitments for murder of 35 per cent.:—3. That in the counties where a large proportion of the persons committed for murder were acquitted on the ground of insanity (in the same period,) the number of the commitments in the years respectively following was fewer by 32 per cent.:—and 4. That in the counties where there were commitments and no convictions at all (during the same period,) the commitments for murder in the years respectively following were fewer by 23 per cent. These facts, let it be borne in mind, are beyond the reach of suspicion or denial: they are compiled and presented to us by our Rulers themselves—by the very men who uphold the gallows in defiance of their own published experience.

It appears, therefore, on the authority of these official Tables, that the crime of murder flourishes most under a system of invariable executions—that it prospers more than when the mercy of the Crown interposes with commutations of sentence—that it prospers more than under acquittals on the ground of insanity—and, lastly, that it even thrives better than under a total failure of justice through the acquittal of all who stand charged with the crime.

Here is another Table which shows that when there are fewest executions, there follow the fewest murders:—

Parliamentary Return, No. 48, Session 1841.

Periods of 5 years.	ENGLAND AND WALES.
	5 years ending 1828.	5 years ending 1830.	5 years ending 1835.	5 years ending 1840.
Committed - - - -	323	317	339	291
Convicted - - - -	88	74	81	87
Executed - - - -	76	65	66	40
Centesimal proportion of executions to Convictions	86	87	81	45
Centesimal proportion of convictions to Commitments	22	23	23	29

This also clearly proves that as executions for murder diminish, the certainty of conviction and punishment is greatly increased.

In the present year, 1846, another document, No. 21, has been printed by order of Parliament. It exhibits the number of executions for all crimes, in London and Middlesex, during 21 years, together with the convictions on charges of murder. In the three consecutive years 1834, 1835, 1836, no execution whatever took place, and it is distinctly stated upon official authority, that these were the only years in which there was no conviction of murder.

From the Returns of other countries similar results are obtained. The following statements will prove this:—

FRANCE.	Murder.
	Executed.	Committed.
5 years ending with 1829, . . .	352	1182
5 years " " 1834, . . .	131	1172
PRUSSIA.	Executed. Convicted of Murder
5 years ending with 1824, . . .	54	69
5 years " " 1829, . . .	33	50
5 years " " 1834, . . .	19	43

Here we see that the executions had diminished by two-thirds, and the crime by one-third; and this, too, in an increasing population.

BELGIUM.

The statistics derived from the Belgian Returns merit particular notice:—first, because Belgium is the only state in Europe which has recently tried the experiment of discontinuing the punishment of death altogether; and secondly, because in the year 1835, capital punishment was re-adopted there,—with what success we shall see.

During the five years ending with 1829, 22 persons had been executed out of 34 convicted of murder; whilst during the next five years, ending with 1834, none were executed, and only 20 were convicted of the same offence. In 1835, however, certain persons brought about a return to capital punishment, alleging (evidently in defiance of fact) that there existed an imperative necessity for making what is called "an example," or in other words, a necessity for re-erecting the guillotine. That there was no ground for this allegation is proved, not only by the figures above quoted, but by the Table which is here sub-joined.

Dividing the 35 years, 1800 to 1834, into seven successive periods of 5 years each, we have these results, viz.:—

BELGIUM. Periods.	Executed, for all crimes.	Convicted of murder.
5 years ending with 1804	235	150
5 years " " 1809	88	82
5 years " " 1814	71	64
5 years " " 1819	26	42
5 years " " 1824	23	38
5 years " " 1829	22	34
5 years " " 1834	none.	20

Now, with facts like the above before them, (observes Mr. Rowton,) say men calling themselves legislators could venture to say, in 1836, that great crimes were on the increase, and needed "the example" of the scaffold to repress them, I cannot conceive. But they did say so; and the scaffold was restored. In 1835, 2 criminals were executed, and between 1836 and 1839, some more were executed, making 4 altogether. And what followed? Why, that condemnations for murder, which in the five years from 1830 to 1834,—when there were no executions,—had been 20 in number, rose in the next five years, when there were executions, to 31—or in other words, increased about fifty per cent.

The temporary abolition, and the complete success of the abolition of death punishments in Tuscany, is almost too familiar to be quoted. That enlightened Prince, the Grand Duke Leopold, says, after trying the effect of the abolition for 23 years, that the alteration, "instead of increasing the number of crimes, considerably diminished that of the smaller ones, and rendered those of an atrocious nature very rare."

Have we not proved, then, not only that the penalty of death for secondary crimes is inefficient and mischievous, but that even as regards the crime of murder itself, its enforcement increases the offence, and its abolition represses it?

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, SIXTH MONTH 1, 1847.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.—We derive from the British Friend of the 2d month last, the valuable statistical paper which appears in our columns on the inexpediency of capital punishment. It is chiefly extracted from a pamphlet entitled "The Punishment of Death, reviewed by Frederick Rowton." To the succeeding number of that journal we are indebted for the following observations of a correspondent:

"It was gratifying to myself, and will doubtless be so to many of your readers who take an interest in the subject of capital punishment, to mark the extraordinary change which has taken place for the better in our penal laws, as evinced by the important statistics advertised in your last number. Many are discouraged at even the present state, and the present amount of punishment existing in our country, but they may be encouraged when they are made aware of this one fact, which of itself speaks volumes.—In one year of the reign of Henry VIII. no less than THREE THOUSAND human beings—criminals—were executed, or rather strangled! And be it remembered that at that period the population did not amount to 4,000,000 souls, so that it was actually equivalent to the annual execution of 14,000 of our present population!

"A few more years and we confidently anticipate, that the present comparatively small amount of legal deaths, will be looked upon with feelings not very dissimilar to those which fill our minds when we read the bloody catalogue of King Henry, three centuries ago."

Pennsylvania set, we believe, the first example of abolishing the death penalty for every other offence than that of wilful murder. This example has been followed in several other States of the American Union, and is approximated elsewhere. As the sphere of this punishment comes to be contracted, it is remarkable how the lovers of the system cluster round the previously disregarded Noachic precept, as the last citadel from which they can religiously defend it. We trust they are destined to be dislodged from even this point of defence. The argument, to be availing in their hands, must show that human life is made inviolable by the precept under all circumstances, that only excepted, which, according to their construction, makes it a rule for the shedding of man's blood. If society may extend the occasions of taking human life, it may as justly diminish them, without infracting the Divine law, but it can make no departure from a Divine law, on either hand, with impunity. On what principle then can it perpetrate wars, or inflict sanguinary penalties for offences not required to be so punished by the precept?

In an "Essay on the Ground and Reason of Punishment with special reference to the penalty of Death; by Taylor Lewis, Esq." its author endeavours to show that this penalty, in case of murder, is demanded both by the Jewish law, and the "solemn declaration made to the whole human family directly after its departure from the ark." To the latter he assigns the higher authority implied by the remark "that it was given not to a particular nation, but to the whole race then existing, and that too under circumstances of the most awfully solemn and impressive kind;" N. Y. edition, page 69: and yet in the preceding page this sentiment was expressed,—"We would that our law sentenced the adulterer to death. We admire the wisdom of the Jewish legislation, that affixed this penalty, not to offences involving injury to property, as in the severe code of commercial England, but to those crimes that struck directly at the life of society, in the destruction of the individual life, and in the invasion of the sacred, domestic and marriage relation!" Consistency is a jewel! The friends of capital punishment must carry out their construction of the precept to Noah, in its intubations, as well as in its permissions, ere we can do them the credit to believe they are fully sincere in their interpretation of it.

We hoped to have been furnished for the present number, by our correspondent Aleph, with a continuation of his remarks on this precept, though his other engagements, we are aware, have been peculiar and absorbing. We trust he will show that in this much quoted text there is no abiding place for the doctrine of capital punishment, but that it makes all taking of human life a desecration of the Divine image.

WILLIAM KIRKWOOD.—To few in the present day can the saying of our Saviour, when he saw Nathaniel coming to him—"Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile," be more applicable than it was to the humble Christian—the genuine philanthropist—the evangelical minister—whose death we record.

After several months of confinement and suffering, William Kirkwood departed this life on the 14th of last month, in his 66th year. He became a member of the religious Society of Friends through a conviction of the truth of its principles and testimonies, which he maintained with remarkable firmness and simplicity.

For more than forty years he had been deeply concerned on the subject of slavery, and believed that the principles he professed required an abstinence, as far as practicable, from its productions; so that when a few Friends convened in Philadelphia in the Fourth month, 1845, to form a Free Produce Association, he was prepared cordially to unite with them, and to sign the Address which was subsequently published. A few weeks before his decease, in a letter addressed to a friend, he gave strong evidence of the continuance of his interest in this concern. "I have often felt," said he, "great sympathy and unity with thy exercise on account of the use of slave-produce. The more I dwell under the exercise, the more I believe it to be a righteous testimony, and to be of the Lord. It appears to me that I can no longer consider myself other than a partner and supporter of all the atrocities of slavery when I freely partake of the produce, and particularly when the choice of free and slave produce is in my power. Oh! the sweet peace that flows from offering a willing sacrifice to the Lord's time! but when we meet with apathy where help might be expected, and opposition where we might expect a pleasant reception, there is need of other help than man's to enable us to persevere. John Woolman experienced elyria from valuable friends, and no doubt more than he writes. But this, in part, was on account of the great simplicity into which he was led, and I have often feared that Friends too much overlooked that subject: for one unnecessary thing may almost imperceptibly be introduced after another till little or no distinction can be made in many things between the Quaker who so often hears about plainness and simplicity and the worldling who thinks there is nothing in these things. But to return to the subject of slavery. Stolen goods, generally, are gotten and come through a less objectionable and corrupt channel than goods that come through the channel of slavery. A thief does not disturb the owner of the property he takes, if he can avoid it; and he leaves more than he takes, if he is not opposed: for the thief does not hinder him from using his exertions to get more or from living with his wife and children. But to commence with the poor African torn from his country and every thing dear—bereft of every thing but life, and that, by reason of oppression, a burthen—confined and almost starved to death in the slave-ship—afterward sold to be under the caprice of a master till released by death—and if, in his bondage, he may get wife or children he will have the painful reflection that they also must remain under the lash till death—the fruits of his labour all torn from him and sold to us. Knowing all this, can we be less guilty in buying those fruits, than in buying goods from a thief, knowing them to be stolen, but without otherwise injuring the owner?"

Truly may it be said of the work in which our dear friend felt so lively an interest, that the harvest is great and the labourers few; and earnestly do we crave, that the Lord of the harvest would send more such labourers as he.

During his protracted sickness, he experienced much of the peace and tranquillity which are the reward of obedience. In the letter to which we have alluded, he remarked—"Ever since my great weakness of body commenced I have been shielded from the buffetings of the enemy. The time to me has been as a day without clouds. In the time of such weakness of body and keen outward trials [the death of a daughter and her husband,] Oh! what an unspeakable favour—what cause of gratefulness of heart—what cause of continual rejoicing instead of mourning or repining: for truly I can adopt the language of the Psalmist, 'Thy mercies are new every morning—great is thy faithfulness!'"

THE ANNIVERSARIES.—The annual meetings of various national and state societies in the city of New York, made the week commencing the 10th ultimo one of great interest.

The anniversary of the American Anti-Slavery Society, and of the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, were held on the 11th; the one in the morning, the other in the afternoon of that day. The attendance at each was large and respectable, and the proceedings at these, and successive business meetings, such as gave full assurance of an undiminished hostility to slavery. We select the following from the more numerous resolutions of the two Societies as indicating their respective opinions on various important subjects.

By the American Anti-Slavery Society:

Resolved, That the duty of every American is, to give his sympathy and aid to the Anti-Slavery movement;—and the first duty of every citizen is, to devote himself to the destruction of that Union and that Constitution, which have already shipwrecked the experiment of civil liberty here, and bids fair, in the end, to swallow up the hopes of honest men in a worse than military despotism; assured, ourselves, that out of the wreck we may confidently expect a state which will unfold in noble proportions the principles of that Declaration of Independence, whose promise made us once the admiration of the world.

Resolved, That if it be a self-evident truth, that all men are endowed by their Creator with an inalienable right to liberty, then it is a truth equally self-evident, that all those who enslave their fellow-men, or who justify or connive at their enslavement, are sinners of the first rank—guilty of the highest kind of theft—men-stealers;—that if it be a practical act for an American citizen to seize or purchase a native-born African, in Africa, with the design of making him a slave; then it is equally practical to seize or purchase a native-born American, in America, for a similar purpose;—That if a person engaged in the African Slave Trade is justly deserving of capital punishment, no matter what may be his defence of his conduct, then the American slaveholder as justly deserves the same punishment—for he claims an absolute right to possess, buy, and sell human beings, and stimulate the foreign trafficker, by opening for him a profitable market.

Resolved, That the Whig party, in declaring the present war with Mexico to have been unconstitutional, waged by the President of the United States, for a purpose no less diabolical than that of extending and perpetuating the system of Slavery, and then voting for all the supplies required to give energy and success to the war, involves itself in far greater condemnation and guilt than its rival, which, with almost unparalleled audacity and untruthfulness, affirms that the war is a just and righteous one, on the part of the United States, and that it ought to cover the present national administration with glory.

Resolved, That the eagerness manifested by the leading Whig presses to turn the murderous exploits of Gen. Taylor to party account—to find in him an 'available' candidate for the Presidency—to crown him with unfading laurels, and place him on the pedestal of patriotic renown—while they are denouncing the war which he is prosecuting with such terrible success, as inhuman, aggressive, and infamous—indicates the deepest and most disgusting political profligacy, the most wanton violation of all the principles of morality, and the blackest treason to the cause of free Government and popular liberty. Nevertheless,

Resolved, That the man who holds in the galling chains of Slavery, as his property, two hundred human beings—who gives his example and sanction to the enslavement of three millions of his fellow-countrymen—who goes for wholesale concubinage, robbery, and murder—who conducted the horrid war against the Seminole Indians, and employed as his auxiliaries blood-hounds imported from Cuba expressly to hunt them down—who is now the leader in the war for the conquest of Mexico for the extension of Slavery—is precisely the man to represent both the Whig and the Democratic parties, both the Church and the State, in the Presidential chair.

Resolved, That a paper, located in the District of Columbia,—in the capital of the country,—at the head quarters of the slave-traffickers, and surrounded by slave prisons and slave auctions,—and ostensibly by name and position the grand organ of the Anti-Slavery movement in the United States,—yet conducted in such a doubtful, cool, pointless manner as to elicit no outbreak of slaveocratic feeling in any quarter, not even a single animadversion from the Washington Union, (the national organ of the Slave Power,) nor the slightest expression of alarm or indignation in all the slaveholding regions, but, on the contrary, commendation from the Southern press for its lack of all the characteristics of unadulterated abolitionism,—is a paper which neither represents the Anti-Slavery cause, nor deserves the patronage of real Abolitionists; and such is the National Era, established under the auspices of the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society.

Resolved, That any movement ostensibly seeking the religious improvement of the slave population, without first demanding their immediate and complete emancipation, is not only to be regarded with distrust and jealousy, but denounced as worthless and impracticable, and as substituting a sham for a reality, and a shadow for the substance, and giving an opiate to the consciences of those who are not willing to bear the odium of uncompromising abolitionism, and yet would fain be regarded as deeply concerned for the temporal and eternal welfare of those who are reduced to the condition of things. Therefore,

Resolved, That we regard the project of giving the Bible to the slaves, which has been started in Massachusetts, by those who claim to be Abolitionists, as delusive, and calculated to retard the Anti-Slavery cause, by diverting attention from the great question of immediate emancipation, and discarding a doctrine which is morally, philosophically, and historically true, that the liberation of the slave is essential to his intellectual and religious elevation.

Resolved, That it behoves the Abolitionists of this country, and of all who regard with jealousy the predominance of the Slave-Power in the councils of the nation, to watch with especial vigilance the evolution of the plot now developing itself, of annexing fresh provinces of Mexico, now free from human slavery, for the purpose of cursing them anew with that abominable crime, and to be instant in season and out of season, to expose, and, if possible, to defeat it.

Resolved, That the proposition to furnish the Bible to slaves, who are forbidden to learn to read it by penal laws in every State except in Kentucky, (in which, according to Henry Clay, it is forbidden by a public sentiment, stronger than law itself,) is as preposterous a farce and as absurd a burlesque of a philanthropic movement as would be one to supply all the blind in the United States with telescopes and spectacles before their restoration to sight.

Resolved, That this Society repeats and asserts anew its denotive principle, which separates it from all political parties alike, of No Union with Slaverholders, by which it will be guided until Slavery be abolished, or we are convinced that there is some more excellent way for the deliverance of the slave from his woe, and of ourselves, from our participation in the guilt of his tyrant.

By the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society:

Resolved, That in view of the wide diffusion of anti-slavery information throughout the country, and the thorough discussions the iniquitous system of slavery is undergoing, we have great cause of thankfulness to Him who has caused light to spring up to those which sat in the region and shadow of death, who maketh the wrath of man to praise him, and who encourages us to labor with unabated zeal by the gracious assurance that the Lord taketh part with those who plead the cause of the poor and needy.

Resolved, That the avowal that the Bible sanctions American slavery is blasphemous and heretical; that it tends to drive men into infidelity; that it should be thus considered in every 'doctrinal basis' formed to promote union among Christians; and that no slaveholder ought to be fellowshipped as a Christian, because of the countenance he affords to immorality and heresy.

Resolved, That it is the right of every individual man, throughout the world, bond or free, to possess and read the Bible, and obey it for himself, under his responsibility to God, who has given that revelation to be a lamp to his feet and a light to his path; that it is the right of every man to enjoy the rest of the Lord's day, to be protected in his family relations, to enjoy the fruits of his own labour, to educate his children, and to sit under his own vine and fig tree, without any to make him afraid.

Resolved, That we view with peculiar satisfaction the establishment of the 'National Era' at the seat of Government; and that we recommend to all the friends of impartial liberty to sustain this paper, without abating their liberal support of other anti-slavery papers, in the expectation that ere long it will be published daily, and long continue an ornament to the press, and a powerful auxiliary to the cause of human rights.

Resolved, That we look upon the existing war being waged by this country against Mexico, for the support and extension of slavery, with unmingled abhorrence; that no victories won during its continuance can add true glory to the nation or the combatants; that we believe, in the language of Jefferson, 'the Almighty has no attribute which can take side with us in such a contest'; and that we fervently hope that peace will speedily be restored to both the invading and invaded nation, leaving each in the enjoyment of its original rights and territory, with not a foot of the true Mexican soil converted into an area for the extension of American slavery.

Resolved, That, while we would not relax our efforts to move the hearts and consciences of men by direct moral suasion, we most cordially approve the principles of the Liberty party of the United States; that we rejoice in the increase of its numbers and influence; in its determination, under no circumstances, to vote for a slaveholder to fill any office; and that we recommend that a National Convention be held, at a suitable time, to select candidates for the high offices of President and Vice President, who will unite the suffrages of those who have already broken away from the two great political parties, and those who will forsake them, determining no longer to follow a multitude to do evil.

Resolved, That we hail with fraternal respect and sympathy, brethren in foreign lands who are labouring for the downfall of slavery and its natural ally, the slave trade, and who mourn with us over the prevalence and extension of slavery in this land of boasted freedom and equality, while it is nearly banished from other parts of the civilized world, and even from semi-civilized countries; and that, while we assure them of our uncompromising and determined opposition to slavery, and our entire confidence in its ultimate extinction in this country, we earnestly bid them God speed in their labours to put an end to it throughout the world.

Resolved, That we tender our sincere sympathy to our brethren, the people of colour of the United States, both bond and free, lamenting that they are the victims of oppression and prejudice; exhorting them to patience, meekness, trust in God, hope of deliverance, a diligent and faithful use of the means and advantages they enjoy for self-culture, the education of their children, their own moral and religious improvement; assuring them of our determination not to relax our labors while a single slave exists in this nation; reminding them of the advice of that great Abolitionist of ancient times, not to be cast down and disheartened, 'but if thou mayest be made free, use it rather.'

Resolved, That we lament and pity the ignorance, wickedness, delusion, and impolicy, of our countrymen who hold their fellow-men in slavery, and those who, with still greater folly and criminality, not being slaveholders, uphold the accursed system, by false doctrine, evil example, political subservience, ecclesiastical expediency, treachery to liberty, or love of gain, while we conjure them to remember the prohibition and warning in Holy Writ, 'Thou shalt neither vex a stranger, nor oppress him. Ye shall not afflict any widow or fatherless child. If thou afflict them in any wise, and they cry at all unto me, I will surely hear their cry; and my wrath shall wax hot, and I will kill you with the sword; and your wives shall be widows, and your children fatherless.'

The following resolution submitted to the American Society by Henry Grew, is noticed in the proceedings as "laid on the table, and not called up by any one." An amendment offered by William Lloyd Garrison is stated to have been mislaid, which, we fear is the last we shall know of it.

"Whereas, The purchase and use of the unrequited products of the coerced and cruel toil of our brethren in bonds, constitutes a commercial union with slaveholders which is the pecuniary basis and vital principle of the whole system of Slavery; therefore,

Resolved, That the principle we have proclaimed to the world, of 'No union with slaveholders,' requires abstinence on our part from the purchase and use of the fruits of robbery and oppression."

The National Era makes the following appropriate remarks on the resolution of the American Society respecting that paper:

"THE ERA DISSENTS.—The reader, by turning to the letter of our special correspondent from New York, will see that the Era has been publicly denounced at the anniversary of the American Anti-Slavery Society, because, it seems, we have not been mobbed!"

It has been our lot to differ with many Anti-Slavery men, as to the mode of advocating the cause of human rights. The necessity or wisdom of violence has never been apparent to us. We could not see what was to be gained by always appearing to be in a passion. The importunity of facts, in our estimation, was more potent than the repetition of bald declamation. The example of Luther, so often appealed to as a cover for the bad temper of minor reformers, had little weight with us. He would have been a better reformer had he manifested more of the spirit of Christ; and the Reformation would have proved a far greater blessing, had it not been alloyed with so many of the evil passions of human nature.

We have been mobbed more than once, and have no fear of violence before our eyes. The truth we spoke in Cincinnati, we speak here; the principles we urged there, we insist upon here. If our language be somewhat more studied, (and of this we are not conscious,) it is not from fear of violence, but a desire to remove prejudice, and keep open the channels through which information may be communicated to minds strangely ignorant of the true nature of our enterprise.

If Mr. Garrison and his party think this all wrong, we have no objection to their saying so. Let every one be fully persuaded in his own mind. Their philosophy of reform and ours widely differ."

FREE PRODUCE MEETING IN NEW YORK.—We have received the gratifying intelligence that the annual meeting of the Free Produce Association of Friends of New York Yearly Meeting, held on the evening of Third day last, in the Yearly Meeting House, was very numerously attended by the members of that Yearly Meeting. This large attendance was probably the result, in part, of notice being given by the Clerk, in the Yearly Meeting, of the intended meeting of the Association, and its purpose being there approvingly spoken of by several influential members; but it is believed, it may be more attributed to an increasing, deepening sense throughout the Yearly Meeting of the duty of working with clean hands in our efforts to subvert the system of slavery. A subscription was opened at the meeting toward the establishment of a Free Produce Store in New York, and the sum of $850 raised, additional to previous collections. A large committee consisting of several members within each quarterly meeting, was appointed to collect further sums. We hope to give a fuller account next month.

JOHN WOOLMAN.—We are glad to find in the communication which has for its title the name of this good and truly great man, a notice of the omission of any reference to his dispute, on principle, of the products of slave labour, in a book which to some extent has become a school book amongst Friends. We think a just portraiture of John Woolman's character cannot be given, without including this peculiar aspect of it. Such, unquestionably, was the opinion of Friends when a testimony concerning him was issued by Burlington Monthly Meeting, and approved by Philadelphia Yearly Meeting; from which we extract the following:—

"He was particularly desirous that Friends should not be instrumental to lay burdens on this oppressed people, ('the poor enslaved Africans' and their descendants;) but remember the days of suffering from which they had been providentially delivered, that if times of trouble should return, no injustice dealt to those in slavery might rise in judgment against us, but, being clear, we might on such occasions address the Almighty, with a degree of confidence, for his interposition and relief; being particularly careful, as to himself, not to countenance slavery even by the use of those conveniences of life which were furnished by their labour."

ELIZABETH HEYRICK'S PAMPHLET.—We have heretofore had occasion to refer to the connection which this book had with the second great effort of British Abolitionists, and to the influence its principles exerted in the overthrow of British West India Slavery. Some of our subscribers have not seen the book, and desire to learn its contents. Others who have read it frequently, still feel refreshed by its perusal. It is a document worthy of all the peripatety we can give it.—Under these several considerations we publish a moiety of it to-day, and expect to give the remainder in our next number.

INTELLIGENCE.

From the London Anti-Slavery Reporter.

FREDERICK DOUGLASS AND THE BRITISH AND NORTH AMERICAN ROYAL MAIL COMPANY.

The following letter detailing the particulars of the outrage committed, in refusing him a place in the saloon of the Cambria, after having paid for the accommodation, was addressed by Mr. Douglass to the editor of the Times and other papers.

MR. EDITOR,—I take up my pen to lay before you a few facts respecting an unjust proscription to which I find myself subjected on board the steam ship Cambria, to sail from this port (Liverpool) at ten o'clock to-morrow morning (April 4) for Boston, United States.

On the 4th of March last, in company with George Moxhay, Esq., of the Hull of Commerce, London, I called upon Mr. Ford, the London agent of the United line of steamers, for the purpose of securing a passage on board the steamship Cambria to Boston, United States. On inquiring the amount of the passage, I was told £40 19s. I inquired further, if a second-class passage could be obtained? He answered, No; there was but one fare, all distinctions having been abolished. I then gave him £40 19s., and received from him in return a ticket entitling me to berth No. 72, on board the steamship Cambria, at the same time asking him if my colour would prove any barrier to my enjoying all the rights and privileges enjoyed by other passengers? He said, No. I then left the office, supposing all well, and thought nothing more of the matter until this morning, when, in company with a few friends, agreeably to public notice, I went on board the Cambria with my luggage, and on inquiring for my berth, found to my surprise and mortification that it had been given to another passenger, and was told that the agent in London had acted without authority in selling me the ticket. I expressed my surprise and disappointment to the captain, and inquired what I had better do in the matter. He suggested my accompanying him to the office of the agent in Water-street, Liverpool, for the purpose of ascertaining what could be done. On stating the fact of my having purchased the ticket of the London agent, Mr. Mulver (the Liverpool agent) answered that the London agent, in selling me the ticket, had acted without authority, and that I should not go on board the ship unless I agreed to take my meals alone and not to mix with the saloon company, and give up the berth for which I had paid. Being without legal remedy, and anxious to return to the United States, I have felt it due to my own rights as a man, as well as to the honour and dignity of the British public, to lay these facts before them, well knowing that the British public will pronounce a just verdict on such proceedings.

I have travelled in this country nineteen months and have always enjoyed equal rights and privileges with other passengers, and it was not until I turned my face towards America, that I met with anything like proscription on account of my colour.

Yours respectfully,
FREDERICK DOUGLASS.

From the London Times.

The tyranny complained of in a letter signed "Frederick Douglass," which appeared in our paper of Tuesday, ought not to be allowed to pass in this country without some public expression of disapprobation and disgust at a proceeding wholly repugnant to our English notions of justice and humanity. A highly respectable gentleman of colour, after visiting England, being about to return to America, had taken and paid for a berth in the steamship Cambria, when, on going on board with his luggage, he is informed that the accommodation he had purchased for himself has been allotted to another passenger. On seeking for an explanation of this piece of manifest dishonesty (for it is certainly dishonest to take a sum of money and refuse to perform the condition on which it has been received), the aggrieved person was told that if he wished to go by the ship he must take his meals alone, forego mixing with the company in the saloon, and relinquish to another the berth he had paid to secure. The plain fact of the matter appears to be, that Mr. Douglass, being a man of colour, was not allowed to go out on an equal footing with the rest of the passengers on board the Cambria. It signifies very little to us how contemptible the Americans may make themselves by the prejudices they act upon in their own country, and it concerns, perhaps, none but themselves, that they should present the anomaly of a nation talking largely of equality and liberality while practically drawing one of the meanest and most senseless distinctions that it is possible to conceive. The shame is theirs alone of giving the lie to their own boasted theory of freedom both in action and opinion, by the habitual exercise of the most despotic restraint over the former in the case of the coloured population, and the subjugation of the latter in their own case to a most paltry prejudice. We are unfortunately compelled to witness in some points a deviation on the part of America from those general principles of enlightenment which are acknowledged by the people of every other civilized nation in the world. We, however, are not in any way bound to tolerate the introduction into this country of any of the degrading peculiarities of society in the United States, nor can we observe with calm indifference any tendency to import among us prejudices utterly at variance with our feelings and character. We therefore do not refrain from expressing our most intense disgust at the conduct of the agents of the Cambria, in having succumbed to a miserable and meaningless assumption of skin-deep superiority by the American portion of their passengers. We do not know who the over-sensitive individuals may have been that feared contamination in taking out a person of colour as a fellow-passenger in the Cambria, but we cannot believe them to have been superior either in education, position, or refinement, either natural or acquired, to the average run of our English colonial governors. The latter—although acting as the representatives of Her Majesty—do not refuse to receive at their tables the class of gentlemen whom American society will not admit even into equal participation of the advantages of a public conveyance, which is free to all except in the land making special claim to freedom.

It is one of the most inexcusable aggravations of the gross injustice of the case we have been alluding to, that the ship in which Mr. Douglass had paid for the berth he was not allowed to occupy, on account of his colour, belongs to a partly English company, which draws an immense sum of English money annually for its conveyance of the mail, and is otherwise greatly indebted to English connexion. Common decency should have taught the agents of the Cambria not to offend our notions of justice and common sense for the sake of truckling to an unworthy prejudice of our transatlantic neighbours. Mr. Douglass had, by his sojourn and reception in this country, earned at least some title to be regarded as not unfit to mix in the society of a vessel accessible to the public in general. The breach of the contract entered into with him seems to us as dishonourable, as the prejudice against him is ignorant and contemptible.

From the London Morning Chronicle.

We have waited, with a patience which the event shows to have been most woefully misplaced, to see whether the Cunard steam-ship company would put forth anything in the shape of a contradiction, defence, or explanation of the disgraceful charge lately brought against them, by a gentleman who had the ill fortune to confide in their punctual performance of an express contract. As the company, however, are silent under Mr. Frederick Douglass's accusation, we have nothing left for it but to conclude that this gentleman's account of the transaction alluded to is true to the letter, and that a commercial company, largely dependent on British capital and confidence, and actually patronized by the British Government, have been deliberately guilty of a particularly disgusting act of meanness and bad faith.

The history of this shameful piece of "repudiation" is too fresh in the public memory to need recapitulation; and its moral features are too obvious to call for any other comment than the simple expression of intense and unmitigated disgust. This Anglo-American mail-packet company, for the sake of propagating as base and vile a prejudice as ever disgraced any community, ancient or modern, Christian or heathen, have impudently broken at Liverpool the contract they signed in London. They have dared to attempt importing into England the infamous transatlantic doctrine that commercial faith need not be kept with persons of a particular race and lineage, and that the commonest rights and decencies of social life may be disregarded in the case of gentlemen of a particular complexion.

Our readers will probably share our regret that Mr. Douglass so hastily took for granted the non-existence of any "legal remedy" for the dishonest insolence of which he was the victim. We beg to assure him that he was very much mistaken; and had it consisted with his personal convenience to stand on his legal rights, and hold the company to their contract, and bring an action of damages for its audacious violation, twelve men, good and true, would have had the greatest pleasure imaginable in convincing him of his error. After Mr. Douglass had known us so long, and had such excellent opportunities for becoming acquainted with our morals, manners, and institutions, he really should have given us credit for possessing some available legal remedy for a barefaced breach of a legal contract. "Repudiation" has no place either in the theory or practice of English law; and it would have done an English jury's heart good to give tangible expression to their abhorrence of the innovation. Mr. Douglass is quite safe in "believing that the British public will pronounce a just verdict on such proceedings." But we do feel vexed that the British public have not had the opportunity afforded them of throwing their "verdict" into that particular shape in which it would be most effectual for the moral instruction and reformation of the repudiators.

The subjoined letter is in reply to a most scurrilous effusion that appeared in the Times, under the signature of Charles M. Burop, and which, as will be seen, turned out to be altogether fictitious!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "TIMES."

Sir,—Observing in the Times of this day a letter signed "Charles M. Burop, of Argill, Virginia, United States; Head Manager of the Cunard Company of Liners," I beg to inform you that no such person, or any other individual in the United States, holds any share or interest in the steamships alluded to, and that the statements set forth in that letter are entirely untrue.

No one can regret more than I do the unpleasant circumstances respecting Mr. Douglass's passage; but I can assure you that nothing of the kind will again take place in the steamships with which I am connected.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

S. CUNARD.

22, Duke-street, St. James's, April 13.

From the Anti-Slavery Reporter.

SUPPRESSION OF THE SLAVE-TRADE.

The following petition of the Cork Anti-Slavery Society has lately been presented to both Houses of Parliament; that in the Lords by Lord Brougham, and that in the Commons by Dr. Bowring.

The petition of the Cork Anti-Slavery Society respectfully sheweth:

That your petitioners acknowledge with pleasure and satisfaction, the desire which the British Government has for many years evinced to abolish the abominable and demoralizing traffic in human beings, known as the African slave-trade.

That your petitioners have viewed with great interest the increased vigilance and activity that have characterized the later efforts of the Legislature and Government of their country for the above purpose. But while they acknowledge the testimony which that vigilance and activity afford of increased interest in, and appreciation of, the importance of abolishing the African slave-trade, yet the facts which have been brought to light by those late efforts, have impressed them with the conviction that the means used for the suppression of the traffic are not calculated to effect the end proposed, but rather tend to aggravate its evils and add to its horrors.

That your petitioners will not intrude upon the time and patience of the Legislature by any detailed recapitulation of the facts alluded to, as many of them have been already laid before you, and all are within the reach of those who wish to become acquainted with them; but they would simply allude to the character of those facts, and their bearing on the matter under consideration.

First,—The attempt to suppress the African slave-trade by the employment of ships of war, and other applications of force, have caused the attention of those engaged in the trade to be applied, almost solely, to methods of transmitting their cargoes rapidly and securely; and that, consequently, the miseries of the wretched people who formed those cargoes are fearfully increased. They are crowded into vessels of inadequate bulk and structure, with imperfect and deficient preparations for their accommodation, and in which the health and comfort of the unfortunate victims are wholly unattended to. The hardships and cruelties which they suffer before shipment, are also manifestly aggravated from the same cause; a fearful instance of which lately occurred in the destruction of 4,000 human beings in one of the depots of Africa, in consequence of the vigilance of one of the English cruisers depriving their brutal holders from having the opportunity of selling them.

Your petitioners will not further dwell upon this portion of their reasons for a change in the mode at present adopted for the suppression of the traffic, although it discloses scenes of misery and horror of the most revolting character, and which cannot fail to impress upon all the importance of thoughtful consideration as to the means which are employed for the promotion of even good and benevolent objects.

The second reason, which your petitioners would urge upon your consideration, is derived from the known waste and destruction of life, and very great expense, caused by maintaining a naval force on the coast of Africa; the service there being amongst the most unhealthy and dangerous in which British subjects can be engaged.

The third class of facts, to which your petitioners would direct attention, are those which prove—that the means adopted for the suppression of the slave-trade have altogether failed of effecting that object. They respectfully propose to your attention the official communications of your own subordinates upon this subject, which have already been laid before the Executive; from which it is perfectly manifest, that the slave-markets in Cuba, Brazil, &c., are as fully supplied now as they were before the adoption of the present system of prevention; that the number of slaves disposed of is as large as ever, and that the restriction only serves to increase the price, and thus stimulate those engaged in the trade to make greater efforts and encounter greater risks; whilst the number lost by sickness and hardship from the causes before alluded to, induce a much larger amount of loss of life, and a fearful increase of all the cruelties and barbarities which are consequent on the seizure of slaves in Africa.

From all these considerations your petitioners would impress upon you, as Christian legislators, the necessity of the complete abandonment of the use of armed vessels, and all other, than moral means, for the suppression of the African slave-trade, and that the efforts of Government be directed to the abolition of the slave-markets, as they are convinced, that so long as those markets exist, the slave trade cannot be suppressed.

That your petitioners see in national negotiation—in the encouragement of the produce of articles of free-states, which are generally cultivated by slaves, for which produce large districts in your own East India colonies are admirably adapted, which would be a means of preventing the Coolie immigration, which we believe to be bad both in principle and practice, and in the spread of knowledge and civilization amongst mankind generally, and amongst the people of Africa in particular, means by which this desirable condition of human society might be advanced and ultimately matured.

That your petitioners lay these facts and reasonings before you, hoping that you will give them your most earnest consideration, and legislate accordingly.

And your petitioners will be ever grateful.

Signed on behalf of the Cork Anti-Slavery Society.

ANDREW T. ROSE, Ald. Chairman.
RALPH VARIAN, Sec.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FREE PRODUCE MEETING.

A general Meeting of the Free Produce Association of Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, will be held at Clarkson Hall, north side of Cherry street, above Sixth, on Sixth day, 6th mo. 11th, at 8 o'clock, P. M. Friends generally, of both sexes, are invited to attend.

Geo. W. TAYLOR, Secretary.

Philada., 5th mo. 29th, 1847.

The Free Produce Store.

The undersigned has now the satisfaction to inform the friends of the Free Produce cause that he has received some very superior fine shirting and sheeting muslins, bleached and brown, light and heavy; also prints of fine quality, neat styles; and hopes to be able to secure a constant supply of these articles. He has also received a few pieces of fine 6-4 plaid muslins.

A fresh importation of brown sugars of very superior quality just opened, which will be sold at a considerable reduction from former rates.

The attention of housekeepers is particularly invited to his stock of Green and Black Teas, both as to fineness of quality and flavour and business of price.

Geo. W. TAYLOR,

N. W. corner 5th and Cherry Sts.

Philada., 5th mo. 29th, 1847.

Friends' Catechism.

A Catechism designed for the use of the schools and families of the Religious Society of Friends. Approved by the Representatives of the Yearly Meeting of New York, the 5th of Fourth month, 1837. Published by Collins & Brother, 98 Pearl St., New York, and for sale by them; also for sale by Henry Langstreth, Philadelphia, and by James Hammond, Newport, R. I.

Life of William Allen.

The first volume of this very interesting work, comprising about one-half, is now ready for delivery, and will be forwarded to Subscribers as fast as possible. Those Agents who have not sent names of subscribers will please do so at once. Those Preparative and Monthly Meetings who wish to secure copies for their libraries, will please inform the Publisher immediately. He has fixed the following prices:

In 2 vols.	Muslin, 25.00; with Portrait, 3.25.
"	Sheep, 3.25; " " 3.50.
In 1 vol.	Muslin, 2.50; " " 2.75.
"	Sheep, 2.75; " " 3.00.

It is also proposed to put to Press the Life of Elizabeth Fry in one or two volumes, same size and price as that of William Allen. It is rarely that two works of such interest are brought to the notice of Friends. The Agents of the Non-Slaveholder, and others interested, are requested to collect names of subscribers for the above and forward them to the Subscriber with as little delay as possible.

HENRY LANGSTRETH,
347 Market St., Philadelphia.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

Edited by ABRAHAM L. PENNOCK, SAMUEL RHOADS, and GEORGE W. TAYLOR, is published on the first of each month, at ONE DOLLAR per annum, for one copy, or FIVE DOLLARS per annum, for six copies.

All communications should be addressed and payments made to the Publisher, George W. Taylor, N. W. corner of Fifth and Cherry sts. Philadelphia. Papers per mail should be endorsed, Non-Slaveholder, Philadelphia.

PRINTED AT

MERRIEM & THOMPSON'S BOOK AND JOB OFFICE,
No. 7 Carter's Alley.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

"Whoso gives the motive, makes his brother's sin his own."

VOL. II.] PHILADELPHIA, SEVENTH MONTH, 1847. [NO. 7.

COMMUNICATIONS.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE SCRIPTURAL DEFENCE OF SLAVERY.

(Concluded.)

Having shown, as I trust conclusively, in the preceding numbers, that the slavery of our age and country can derive no authority from the usages of the patriarchal age, or the institutions of Moses, it seems almost needless to inquire whether it can deduce any sanction from the precepts and doctrines of our Saviour and his apostles. And I wish it to be understood that the servitude to which my observations apply, is slavery as it exists in law and practice in the United States; not an utopian system which may perhaps be imagined, but has never been found. Slavery then is a forced and unnatural condition, in which the will of the slave is subject to that of the master. A condition of involuntary servitude is one to which no man would submit, except by constraint. The reduction of a man to that condition or his detention in it, is of course a direct and palpable violation of the precept which condenses the morality of the law and the gospel: "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them." To suppose that our blessed Lord, in whom were hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, after pronouncing this maxim in broad and unqualified terms, gave his authority to a system which is totally irreconcilable with it, is to suppose that he is inconsistent with himself. In other words, we must either discover not only that some, but that all who are held in slavery continue in that condition without constraint on their wills, or we must agree that slavery is incompatible with the doctrines of Christianity. To advance arguments in proof of the position that slavery, as maintained in the United States, must be supported, if supported at all, by the fear or application of force, and in direct opposition to the will of the slave, would be to insult rather than to enlighten the understandings of my readers. And yet the advocates of the scriptural lawfulness of slavery have not flinched from an effort to evade the force and application of this self-evident truth. For we are gravely told that there is nothing in the maxim above quoted which is prohibitory of slavery, but what is contained in the precept of Moses, "thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself;" and that this injunction and slavery are found in the same code.* To such arguments it would be useless to make a formal reply; as they merely shew the desperate expedients of a desperate cause. It may, however, be observed that among the Jews the neighbour whom they were required to love as themselves, seems to have been considered as one of their own nation; and it is agreed on all hands that Hebrew servants could not be held beyond a limited time, without violating the laws of Moses. Our Saviour, both in his sermon on the mount, and his parable of the good Samaritan, gives an extension to the Mosaic precept which includes the whole human race.† Hence the principles of the Mosaic laws, with our Lord's explanation, clearly condemn perpetual and hereditary slavery.

But it is said that our Saviour and his apostles have not condemned slavery; and that some of the latter have expressly sanctioned it. This argument, as far as it relates to our Lord, is merely negative. If he has no where uttered a direct prohibition of slavery, we may reasonably ask in what passage has he forbidden the exhibition of gladiators? Are we therefore to infer that such abominable sports are to be maintained by Christians? The truth is, that every practice which is inconsistent with the tenor of his doctrines, and with the purity of life which he inculcated by his precepts and example, is virtually forbidden, whether specified or not. He is emphatically called the Prince of Peace. The ruling principle of his government is love. He enjoined his followers to love one another, as he had loved them.

* Stringfellow's Examinations.

† Matt. 6: 43-44. Luke 10: 29, 37.

And this love was not to be restricted to their friends, but to include their enemies also. That he never specifically prohibited servitude in all its degrees and modifications is no matter of surprise, when we reflect on the various capacities and characters of men. There are some whom natural imbecility places under guardians during life. There are others whose insanity or vicious propensities render them proper objects of restraint. But in these cases there is no necessary violation of the law of love. An idiot, a maniac, or a criminal may be held under such restraint as his own safety, and that of the community may require, and be employed in occupations suited to his capacity and condition; under the supervision of others, in conformity with the precepts of our Saviour. The relation of parents and children, or of masters and apprentices, including a species of servitude, may be maintained for mutual advantage, in full accordance with the law of love. Our Lord did not subject his followers to the interminable labour of learning their duty by studying and committing to memory, a code of laws in which all actions, with their countless distinctions and modifications, were specifically defined and described; but he has laid down the principles by which all our actions are to be regulated. He has taught us to rectify our conduct by the righteousness which purifies the springs and motives of action. Of course the enquiry, whether he has sanctioned the slavery of our age and country, amounts simply to this, whether that slavery could be introduced and supported in strict conformity with the spirit and tenor of the Gospel. Such an enquiry certainly need not detain us long. Whatever may be conceded to the kindness and humanity of individual slaveholders, and I freely admit there are many who conscientiously endeavour to exercise their authority with all the tenderness of which the case is susceptible, it is still undeniably true, that no man would voluntarily place himself or his descendants, under the absolute control of another. The condition of a slave is that of compulsion, not of choice. Consequently to reduce a human being to that condition, or to continue him in it, is to violate a positive maxim of Christian morality.

But if we examine the precepts of our Saviour we may perhaps find that he has directly and positively prohibited the slavery in the United States. He has distinctly affirmed the moral maxims of the Mosaic code. "Think not that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets; I am not come to destroy but to fulfil. For verily I say unto you, till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law till all be fulfilled."* Now what says this law on the subject of slavery? "He that stealeth a man and selleth him, or if he be found in his hand, he shall surely be put to death."†

Without stopping to enquire whether our Saviour has given his sanction to the penal provision of this statute, there can be no reasonable doubt that his general affirmance of the moral law includes a prohibition of the act thus rendered capital. And as the essence of the crime is the reduction of a freeman into slavery, or the converting of a human being into an article of merchandise, the law which prohibited the least violent modes of effecting this object, must also prohibit the more violent. The slavery of the United States originated, as is well known, in the African slave trade; and the right of ownership claimed by the slaveholders of our day, must be traced to that traffic. The supposition that the trade which supplied the United States with its original stock of slaves, was compatible with the principles of the Christian religion, is too reckless for the boldest infidel to avow. Indeed the denunciation of this nefarious commerce as piracy, by the federal legislature, and by the British Parliament, at the suggestion of our government, joined to the unequivocal abhorrence with which it is generally regarded, sufficiently attests the sentiments of the Christian world respecting it.

If then, the negroes were transported from their native land, and consigned to slavery in the western world, in total defiance not only of Christianity, but of common morality, I would seriously ask the advocates of slavery, at what period of time, or with what generation of the descendants of the slaves first imported, did the religion of our Saviour adopt the system? Christianity does not deal in technical subtleties. By adopting and refining the morality of the Mosaic law, it adopted its principles. Stealing a man was forbidden by the latter, consequently every act, whatever shape or character it may assume, if it accomplishes the same purposes, is forbidden by the former. The slaves of each generation, whatever may have been the condition of their parents, are as completely debased from their natural rights, as those who are seized on the African shore. If Christianity repudiates and condemns the reduction of the first generation into slavery, it is impossible to assign a valid reason, or to adduce a solitary precept of our Lord for the detention of the second or any subsequent one, in that unnatural condition.

The argument in favour of slavery, derived from our Lord's supposed silence on the subject, is singularly unfortunate. For it is admitted on all hands, that the slavery of the Roman world, at the time of his personal appearance, was excessively cruel and oppressive. The excruciating death by crucifixion appears to have been introduced for the punishment of slaves. Tacitus informs us, that during the reign of Nero, four hundred slaves were executed, in conformity with an ancient law of the empire, because their master was murdered by one of their number.* Indeed some of the pro-slavery writers urge the well known barbarity of Roman slavery, which they assert our Saviour and his apostles did not condemn, as an argument to prove that the more modified servitude of our day is not inconsistent with the Christian religion. But they seem to forget that, according to their own admission, the slavery which they would have us to believe our Lord tacitly sanctioned, was extremely odious and cruel. Their argument of course implies that the Saviour of men, who came to save his people from their sins, silently sanctioned a system of cruelty and oppression. Such a declaration may suit the lips of an infidel, but certainly not of a Christian.

* Matt. 5: 17, 18.

† Ex. 21: 16.

It is true that our Saviour, in his instructions to the people, sometimes speaks of masters and servants, and even mentions the case of a servant being ordered for sale, with his wife and children, and all that he had.† And he also speaks of a man falling among thieves who stripped, wounded, and left him half dead. But there is no recognition of the lawfulness of the acts alluded to. He refers to existing practices, for the purpose of illustrating his doctrines, but not of justifying the practices themselves.

The precepts and doctrines of the Master being clearly prohibitory of American slavery, we need not search the writings of the Apostles for its support. For they certainly neither claimed nor possessed any authority to abrogate the mandates of their Lord. But as a few passages from some of their epistles have been adduced by pro-slavery authors, a brief examination of those texts will be made. "Servants be obedient to them that are your masters, according to the flesh, with fear and trembling, in singleness of heart, as unto Christ. Not with eye service as men pleasers, but as the servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart; with good will doing service as to the Lord, and not to men. Knowing that whatsoever good thing any man doeth, the same shall he receive of the Lord, whether he be bond or free. And ye masters do the same things unto them, forbearing threatening; knowing that your master also is in heaven; neither is there respect of persons with him.* Servants obey in all things your masters according to the flesh, not with eye service, as men pleasers, but with singleness of heart, fearing God. And whatsoever ye do, do it heartily as to the Lord, and not unto men; knowing that of the Lord ye shall receive the inheritance; for ye serve the Lord Christ. But he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done; and there is no respect of persons. Masters give unto your servants that which is just and equal; knowing that ye also have a master in heaven.† Let as many servants as are under the yoke count their own masters worthy of all honour, that the name of God and his doctrine be not blasphemed. And they that have believing masters, let them not despise them, because they are brethren; but rather do them service, because they are faithful and beloved, partakers of the benefit.‡ Exhort servants to be obedient unto their own masters, and to please them well in all things, not answering again; not purloining, but showing all good fidelity, that they may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things.§ Servants be subject to your masters, with all fear, not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward. For this is thankworthy, if a man for conscience toward God endure grief, suffering wrongfully; for what glory is it, if when ye be buffeted for your faults, ye take it patiently; but if when ye do well, and suffer for it, ye take it patiently, this is acceptable with God.¶

It has been remarked by a recent commentator, that the Greek words here translated servants, being the plural of doulos and oiketes, are not those usually employed to designate slaves; and that the words kurios and despotes, which are here used in the plural, do not properly signify slaveholders; the word andrapoda being commonly used for the former, and andrapodistai for the latter. Hence it has been inferred that the servants and masters, mentioned or addressed in these passages, were not slaves and slaveholders, but freemen at service, or servants engaged for a limited time, and their employers.

Whether we admit this inference or not, it is not easy to discover any thing in these passages which might not be rationally applied to ser-

* Epb. 6: 5, 9.

† Col. 3: 22—25; 4: 1.

‡ 1 Tim. 6: 1, 2. § Ib. 2: 9, 10. ¶ 1 Pet. 2: 18, 20.

* Annals B. 14, sec. 45.

† Matt. 18: 25.

vants and employers, where slavery, in the present acceptation, is totally unknown. And if we were to suppose the servants to have been slaves, held as those in the South usually are, I can see nothing in these admonitions, which a sober abolitionist would not willingly address to a slave. The advice to masters, if faithfully followed, would certainly divest slavery of its most objectionable features, if not totally destroy its existence. If masters were to treat their servants as the apostle advises, and to render a just equivalent for their service, the slaves would be, in fact, whatever they might be in name, transformed into hired laborers. The value of a slave depends upon the service which can be extracted from him, beyond the equivalent returned. Restore the equilibrium, by rendering the equivalent, and the relation is instantly changed.

The case of Onesimus, who is assumed to have been a slave that eloped from his master, and being converted by the apostle Paul, was sent back to his owner, has been frequently cited in defence of slavery under the gospel dispensation. But if we read the epistle to Philemon, with which this supposed fugitive slave was intrusted, we must perceive, that whatever his previous condition may have been, he was not to be received as a slave, (a doulos) but as a brother beloved. Consequently he was not sent back into slavery, if indeed he ever was a slave, but into freedom. And in the epistle to the Colossians, we find Onesimus, no doubt the same man, commended by the same apostle as a faithful and beloved brother. If my recollection is not deceptive, ecclesiastical history has recorded the name of Onesimus as one of the bishops of the primitive ages.

From this brief review of the question I confidently infer the conclusion that the advocates of American slavery must revert to some other testimony than the Bible, if they would defend their cause with effect, and that the opponents of the Christian religion may search the sacred volume in vain for arguments drawn from any alliance with slavery, which can, with the show of reason or justice, be fastened upon it. E. L.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

I recently found in an old family library, a small work,* entitled "The American Defence of the Christian Golden Rule. By John Hepburn, 1714." So far as I can ascertain, it was the earliest publication by a Friend in America, against slavery. A claim was made for that title a number of years ago, in behalf of a tract by Wm. Burling, of Long Island, 1718. Ralph Sandiford's tract, "The Mystery of Iniquity, &c.," was published in 1729, and Elihu Coleman's "Testimony against making slaves of men," in 1733.

*It appears to have belonged to one of my ancestors, "Thomas Scattergood, 1730."

I should like to know something more of John Hepburn. This work is not accurately written, but it evinces the earnestness of thorough conviction. The film of "gradual emancipation" does not appear to have dimmed his vision. Connected with his own tract he republished "Arguments against making Slaves of Men. Written by a native of America, September 14th, 1713." "The Athenian Oracle," from the second London edition, 1704. Also some tracts on Predestination, The Salvation of Children, and Water Baptism, by Thomas Laury. The whole pamphlet concludes with some observations by himself on Baptism, which he says he gave to the Anabaptists at their Yearly Meeting at Middletown, New Jersey, 1712, desiring an answer, which they did not give. I transcribe the preface to the "American Defence," and propose to send hereafter, if it meets the views of the editors, some extracts from the work itself.

SAMUEL ALLINSON, JR.

"Christian Reader: It is not singularity or ostentation that I appear in print, but my Christian duty, in honour to God, and the salvation and well being of the souls of men, in the detection of the Anti-Christian practice of making slaves of them who bear the image of God, viz. their fellow-creature, Man. A practice so evil and inhuman, that the more it is thought upon by judicious men, the more they do abhor it; it being so vile a contradiction of the Gospel of the Blessed Messiah.

And if our Negro Masters were put to it, to bring an instance that a man denied the Christian faith, I think they could not bring a stronger instance, than that he was found in the practice of making slaves of men. And furthermore, I doubt not but this may be to some a very unwelcome theme, and they would wonder to find their beloved Delilah, the making slaves of Negroes and others, rejected; although the more moderate Christians do full well know that I have the Truth on my side. And if these lines should come to the Island of Great Britain, (my native land,) I hope the sincere Christians there, of all sects, will commend my Christian care in detecting so gross a corruption as this, crept in by reason of the ease and gains it brings to our American Christians. And I hope the learned Christians there will admonish their American brethren for putting such an affront upon the ever blessed Messiah and his glorious Gospel, as this their practice doth, in making slaves of men. This practice can not but be very offensive to sincere and honest hearted Christians, that this practice should be heard among the heathen, to harden them in their heathenish practices.

And now, Reader, I am going to show thee a wonder, and that is, this thirty years I have been in America, this practice has been carried on in almost profound silence, which it is like the Negro-Masters will take it the harder to be opposed now. It is true, John Tillotson, of Canterbury, hath two sermons in print, concerning Restitution; and he tells them there that they cannot have admittance into Heaven without making restitution of the wrong done to their fellow-creatures. And if this be applied to the wrong done to Negroes, I have Bishop Tillotson on my side. This and many other excellent things have dropt from the pen of that (in many things no doubt, an) excellent man.

And Cotton Mather calls the enslaving of Negroes, a crying sin in the land.

And George Fox printed against this practice, and sent it to the Barbadoes Quakers. Such was the early care of this excellent man above forty years ago; but his Christian admonition was rejected. It is true there are some excellent souls among them still, who came out of Old England, that have kept their integrity, namely, John Saltkill, Thomas Chalkley, and others, who, when they see this abomination acted by their American brethren, they openly bear testimony in their public assemblies, and declare against it, (as I am credibly informed.) There was another paper printed by (I think,) G. Keith his party, at Philadelphia: and half a sheet was printed against this practice at London, called "The Athenian Oracle." But the most of all those writings, I doubt are destroyed by negro masters; that the reader will find them almost as scarce to be found as the Phoenix Egg. And, last of all, I have appeared against this practice, although I have lain dormant above this thirty years: for the which I acknowledge my failure before God and man, and I desire forgiveness of God, and next I desire forgiveness of man; for the reason that I was silent so long, because I waited for my betters to undertake the work; and if any had appeared in this work, it is like I had been silent still.

Now, whether they will hear or forbear for the future, I hope to be clear of their blood, and if they will not repent and make restitution, I cannot help it; for I have faithfully warned them of their danger; for I earnestly contended for the truth and honestly declared against this enriching sin, in making slaves of men. And now I think to end my preface as I began it, and that is I chiefly design the honour of God and next the welfare and salvation of souls. If happily I might be instrumental to deter one soul from being caught with this enriching sin, or instrumental of the repentance of restitution made by one soul that is already guilty, then I desire they should give God the glory, and I make no question in having my reward.

And now to find the Longitude,

Many a man hath gone about,

But the Perpetual Motion,

Our Negro Masters have found out.

JOHN HEPBURN.

New Jersey, 1st mo., 1714.

To the Editors of the Non-Slaveholder.

MORRISTON, Vt., 3d mo. 28th, 1847.

The reading of the letter of Ellwood Harvey, copied from the Pennsylvania Freeman, in the last Non-Slaveholder, has reminded me of an occurrence that I was witness to a few months since. The account of it you are at liberty to publish, if you think it will not be a breach of faith, a needless exposure of domestic affairs, too common, I fear in the Old Dominion. I may not have given the exact words that were used on the occasion, although I think they are nearly the same.

"William, take a pass as thou goes to the Post Office this evening." "Take a pass?" inquired the friend on whose errand William was going, (to a Post Office in Virginia,) "Is William a slave, that he requires a pass to go so short a distance with?" "William will be free when he is twenty one," was the answer; "until then he is regarded in the eye of the law as a slave, and to be out after eight o'clock in the evening without a pass, would expose him to the severity of the law. It was only a few weeks since, (in the 9th month) that we sent him to the store, less than a mile distant, towards evening, and had he been waited upon in season he might have returned home before eight o'clock; but he was detained in the store till after that hour, and as he set his foot upon the pavement, there was an authority in waiting there ready to take him to the watch-house. Thither he was compelled to go, and there he remained 'in durance vile' from that (seventh day) evening until second day morning, with one solitary meal, and that not of the "choicest viands."*

It did not appear that William had voluntarily transgressed any wholesome law—he did not appear of a disposition inclining to disobedience, but on the contrary was mild and inoffensive. What then constituted "the head and front of his offending?" It was that he had a portion of African blood coursing through his veins—"his skin was not coloured like our own"—he was a "moral leper." A few days before, I had been told by a slaveholder in Richmond, that "the blacks were the happiest people on earth!" What kind of happiness, I felt ready to inquire, can these people enjoy who are daily and hourly exposed to such, and far worse treatment than this? Is it the kind of happiness to which reference was had as one of the inalienable rights of man, in the Declaration of Independence? Far otherwise we all know.

Although I saw nothing of slave auctions in Virginia, yet as I passed through one of the back streets of Richmond, I took the liberty of casting an inquisitive eye into one of the auction rooms. There stood the desk on which doubtless many a heaven defying deed of sale had been made out—and there the table, on which, in another hour, the poor down-trodden slave would have to stand, stripped of all his rights. To know that this room was appropriated to this loathsome purpose—to think of the many bleeding hearts that had in that room been torn asunder—of the many hopes disappointed; of the fears realized; of the tears that had been shed—the sobs and sighs and groans that had there been wrung from the victims of our oppression, was sickening enough without seeing the auction. Well might the poet say

"There is no flesh in man's obdurate heart."

If we could be assured that that auction was the last foul act in the drama, it would be comparatively bearable, but to reflect that those auction rooms are but the portals to prolonged sufferings under severe toil, scanty food and desperate drivers, it greatly darkens the shading of the picture. And further, that much of this is done and endured that Christians may have cheap cotton, cheap rice, and cheap sugar; that practical abolitionists may have cheap cotton shirts to

* It is due to the individual in whose employ William is retained, that he is justly regarded as a friend to the blacks, and has been instrumental in securing what freedom the law allows to many, who, without his friendly aid, would have been robbed even of that—shadow that it is.

lecture against slavery in, or to vote against slavery in, is an anomaly hard to be reconciled to.

Numbered amongst those who have not yet observed the inconsistency of building up with one hand, what they are attempting to pull down with the other, may be found many of the fellow professors of John Woolman. Is it too much to say, that the mass of those who can point with honest satisfaction to the records of the oft-repeated testimony issued by the Society of Friends against slavery, and rightfully claim a little property therein, are as truly, in degree, the virtual upholders of slavery, as though no testimony had ever been issued against that atrocious institution?

But let us hope for better days—let us hope that the sentiment contained in the motto of your paper, may take deep root in the minds of its readers.

If we lay claim to the title of pioneers in the anti-slavery movement, let us not jeopardize that claim by indifference to the amount of motive we give to the slaveholder.

Yours respectfully,
HENRY MILES.

ASSOCIATED ACTION.

TO THE MANAGERS OF THE FREE PRODUCE ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDS OF NEW YORK YEARLY MEETING.

Dear Friends.—Your acceptable communication of 6th mo. 30th, 1846, was duly received, and we trust our correspondence may conduce to our mutual encouragement.

Although we are not able to inform you of any remarkable results from our labours the past year, yet we do not feel that we have been unprofitably occupied; and the evidences have not been few that the testimony which we have associated to promote, is spreading in our country, and that our field of labour is rapidly extending, and calls not only for renewed energy and perseverance on the part of those who have already entered into the work, but for an increase of faithful labourers. While our hearts are deeply affected under the consideration of the extent and enormity of the sin of slavery, and the difficulties of guarding on every hand against a participation therein, we desire that neither you nor we may be discouraged; but faithfully pursuing our convictions of duty, and remembering that it is "not by might, nor by power, but by my spirit, saith the Lord of hosts," let us have faith to believe that the "great mountain" before us shall yet "become a plain."

Notwithstanding the apathy which prevails in our religious society on this branch of our testimony against slavery, and which leads the mass of our members to continue in a practice directly promotive of both slavery and war, we hope the strong prejudices long existing on this subject amongst us are gradually passing away, and with them the hostility which our movements have had to encounter.

The truth to which we are endeavoring to draw the attention of our brethren, is so simple and so easy to be perceived when viewed apart from the influences of interest and prejudice, that, like the axioms of Euclid, it receives the intuitive assent of every mind. To present it, therefore, on every suitable occasion to the consideration of those with whom we have intercourse, may essentially promote its progress, and as "actions speak louder than words," and "example goes before precept," in no way, perhaps, can we more effectually impress the subject upon the minds of our friends than by faithfully abstaining, when at their tables, from articles in which a discrimination may be made between such as are produced by free labour and those which are the avails of slavery. While no reasonable doubt can be entertained that a general abstinence from the staple products of slave labour would inevitably put an end to slavery, it may well be assumed that abstinence on the part of a comparatively small number of persons may lead to an increased interest on the subject, and to the adoption of auxiliary modes of removing the evil, and thus by a combination of efforts, the great end may eventually be obtained. It has been stated that one of the salutary effects of abstinence from sugar in Great Britain during the struggles for the abolition of the African slave trade and of slavery itself, was the discussion which it introduced at tens of thousands of tea tables, and by which correct information and sound views were widely disseminated.

Among the evidences to which we have alluded, of the spreading of our testimony, may be mentioned the organization of Free Produce Associations among Friends in Ohio and Iowa, and of the Western Free Produce Association in Indiana; also the establishment of a wholesale Free Produce store in Cincinnati, and the opening of small Free Produce stores in various places.

We may also advert to the enlargement of the Free Produce store in this city, now belonging to our friend George W. Taylor. He is assisted by a committee of this Board in investigating the sources of his supplies, and will scrupulously guard against all kinds of deception. The cotton goods manufactured for our Association are deposited in his store for sale, and he intends to keep a large stock of other dry goods and of groceries and other articles produced by free labour.

It is also encouraging to find that our friends in England persevere in their efforts to promote the manufacture of goods from free cotton, and the exclusive use of free produce generally. A meeting of the friends of the cause was held in London on the 29th of 1st mo. last, when it was resolved that the duty of abstinence from slave produce, as far as practicable, should be earnestly urged on the attention of the friends of the slave throughout Great Britain, and that steps should be taken to increase the supply of goods manufactured exclusively from cotton raised by freemen. We doubt not that you rejoiced, as we did, when the committee of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, in the early part of the present year, issued an address to the friends of the Anti-Slavery cause throughout the world, on the disuse of slave produce. Notwithstanding the noble and laborious exertions of Christian philanthropists, and the measures which have been adopted by several governments for the suppression of the African slave trade, it is well known that this trade is still prosecuted with undiminished vigour, and it has become an admitted truism that it can only be suppressed by the abolition of slavery itself. The committee, in their address, set forth the present extent of the traffic in human beings, and express their belief that the increased consumption of slave-grown sugars in Great Britain will extend and strengthen the system of slavery and give a dreadful stimulus to the slave trade. Under these circumstances they call upon the friends of the anti-slavery cause to adopt the use of free grown produce as a practical and efficient measure, in combination with other efforts, for the abolition of slavery. "In asking you to adopt this recommendation in your daily practice, permit us," says the address, "to suggest it as a matter of consideration, whether those who needlessly purchase slave produce are less accessory to the crime of the slaveholder, than is the purchaser of stolen goods to the robbery by which they are obtained? Slaveholding involves in itself nearly every crime by which the physical and moral nature of men is wronged and outraged. The slave is robbed of his person and the fair reward of his toil; he is, in a multitude of instances, deprived of the means of mental and moral improvement; and doomed, after a life of suffering, frequently to a premature death. It must be obvious to all reflecting minds, that it is the demand which exists for slave produce which is the chief support of slavery. It is this which keeps open the slave markets. May it not, therefore, be said that to the commission of a great amount of crime, and the infliction of unparalleled sufferings on a large portion of mankind, do the consumers of slave produce, however unintentionally, furnish the motive? "To the female heads of families," continues the address, "we would especially and earnestly appeal on this important subject, under the well grounded persuasion, that their judgments and feelings will alike combine to lead them to the adoption of the course suggested in this address. They will not, we are convinced, turn a deaf ear to the cries of Africa, ravished of her children; or consent, by their practice, to add a pang to the sorrows of the slave in the land of his captivity and exile."

In turning again to our own land, we may remark that we believe, in the language of your letter, "there is a good and a strong spirit in many of the members of your Yearly Meeting," and that, if, instead of being scattered over a wide extent of country, they were in a position to concentrate their efforts, you would not have to regret the loss of their aid in carrying out your measures. That those who have the pecuniary means of rendering efficient aid in supplying themselves and their fellow members with the necessities of life unstained by the blood of the slave, should be ignorant or so unmindful of their duties as "good stewards," is, indeed, deeply to be regretted. We would, however, encourage you to persevere; and we deem it especially important that a Free Produce store should be established in New York, under your patronage. Many conscientious persons are discouraged from an attempt to avoid the use of slave produce by the uncertain channels through which articles, professedly free grown, have been in some instances introduced. A decided preference for free goods exists in the minds of so many Friends and others, that we cannot doubt that an establishment in which full confidence might be placed, would be liberally sustained, and afford a reasonable income to a qualified, conscientious person with a capital of 2000 or 3000 dollars.

One of the objects contemplated by you and by us in forming our respective associations, was to procure correct information of the condition of the countries with which we have commercial intercourse, in respect to free and slave labour, and the means of discriminating between their productions when they exist together. It is doubtless known to you that for several years past large quantities of sugar and molasses from the island of Porto Rico have been disposed of in your city as the productions of free labour. Porto Rico being a slave importing as well as a slaveholding island, it has become a matter of serious inquiry whether any of its plantations are cultivated, and their products manufactured, exclusively by free-men.

If upon due investigation this should be ascertained to be true, another question will arise—whether proper care is taken to keep the products of free labour unmixed with those of slave labour—and also whether any of the latter description are sold in New York under the character of the former. We respectfully and earnestly beg your immediate and thorough examination into this case. If those who are engaged in importing or selling the sugar and molasses to which we have alluded, possess the requisite evidence that the character of those articles is such as they represent, they cannot hesitate to present it to you; for a refusal on their part must necessarily be considered strong negative proof that no such evidence exists. Under this circumstance, or in case you clearly ascertain that the desired evidence cannot be furnished, the fact cannot be too soon communicated to those who, in attempting to avoid the use of slave produce, have been grossly deceived.

We would also solicit your attention to the source from whence the rice is obtained which is offered for sale in New York, as the production of free labour.

Your association and ours occupy a highly responsible position in relation to the thousands of conscientious persons, in various sections of our country, who rely upon us to make investigations of the kind we have suggested; and we trust none of us will be disposed to shrink from the performance of our duties.

Inquiries have been instituted relative to the practicability of procuring sugar and molasses from the English West India Islands. Considerable quantities of these articles are imported from states in South America, which have passed emancipation laws; and it is not improbable that when the invading armies of the United States shall have been withdrawn from Mexico, we may receive further supplies of sugar from that country. We are not without hope that the German and some other emigrants in Texas will furnish our market with free grown cotton, sugar and rice.

The annual meeting of our association was held on the evening of the 20th of 4th month. For a short statement of our proceedings the past year, together with our Annual Report, we may refer you to the Non-Slaverholder of the present month.

We have recently succeeded in getting sheeting and shirting muslins and print cloths manufactured of a much finer quality than any heretofore made for us. Some of the cloths are now in the hands of the calico printer.

We propose to send an agent into the south early in the autumn, for the purpose of obtaining a variety of information relative to the cultivation of cotton by free-men, and also to collect free grown cotton. Several manufacturers desire a full supply of this kind of cotton, and we hope an effort will be made this season to place a few hundred bales in the market for them. This plan, if successful, will furnish a large amount of free goods on the same terms with those made of slave grown cotton.

In conclusion, dear friends, permit us to say, what we believe you feel to be true, that the position of Friends of New York Yearly Meeting, as regards the impropriety of using the productions of slavery, is more clearly defined than that of other members of our religious society. As a body, you have recognized, in no equivocal terms, the obligation to cease being "customers in the market which makes slavery." Is it not, then, the duty of the members, individually, to conform, in their daily practice, to the principle which they have openly acknowledged? If, in pursuing this course, they meet with obstructions to a full performance of duty, does not consistency require that diligent means should be promptly applied for their removal?

However discouraging the prospect may sometimes appear, we yet feel that there is much to animate us with hope, and, dear friends, "let us not be weary in well doing; for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not."

Signed by direction and on behalf of a meeting of the Board of Managers of the Free Produce Association of Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, held 5th mo. 17th, 1847.

SAMUEL RHODES, Sec.

THE NON-SLAVERHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, SEVENTH MONTH 1, 1847.

NEW ENGLAND YEARLY MEETING.—The annual convention of this ancient Yearly Meeting of Friends, was held, for public worship, at Newport and Plymouth, Rhode Island, on First day, the 13th ultimo; and, for the transaction of its religious affairs, at Newport, on the five succeeding days; the morning of Fifth day being appropriated to public worship. Its interesting and harmonious session was terminated on Sixth day, the 18th of the month, immediately following the reading of a fraternal epistle from London Yearly Meeting, which had just arrived, and which, with the adjourning minute, constituted an impressive conclusion to the proceedings.

These several meetings were largely attended by the members, and the meetings for public worship by numerous inhabitants of the island, not in membership.

The course prescribed to ourselves for the conducting of this journal, does not permit us to enter into other business particulars than those which have relation to the great topics in which humanity is largely concerned, and which congregate, as to a common platform, the feelings of all who love their fellow men with that intensity which is demanded by the precept, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself."

The subject of war, in the various affecting aspects in which it ever presents itself to the Christian disciple, and the lover of his species, was feelingly dwelt upon. In contemplating the horrors usually associated with this mighty agent of wrong and evil, it did not escape attention that the calamitous war in which this nation is now engaged, has for its probable end, if not its intended purpose, a large extension of the area of slavery. It was felt to be a war not ending in its effects with the present hapless victims of its ruthless violence, or even with the present generation of men, but going deep down, in its withering, dehumanizing influences, into posterity. It was felt to be a renewed call to the carrying out by Friends, of their principles, both against war and slavery; that, in every possible way, they may be clear of the guilt of their brothers' blood. The concern of the meeting was embodied in the following minute.

"Among the exercises which have been with us during our deliberations at this time, has been a concern for the consistent and upright maintenance by all our members of our testimony to the unchristian nature of all wars and fightings—a testimony in accordance with the belief and practice of the primitive followers of Christ. We are liable at this time to some peculiar temptations on this account. Our country is involved in war with a neighbouring nation, and armies are contending in the field; and the testimony of the Scriptures, that 'every battle of the warrior is with confused noise and garments rolled in blood,' is brought home to us by frequent intelligence from the scene of strife. We earnestly desire that all our dear friends may be mercifully preserved in a christian frame of mind under these trying circumstances.

To the humble follower of Him whose kingdom is not of this world, but who, as a stranger and pilgrim here, is journeying towards another country, that is, a heavenly—how do the destruction and horrors of the field of battle, or the city made desolate by an encompassing foe, the tears of the widow and the cries of the orphan, fill his mind with sorrow! He can have no sentiment allied to rejoicing at scenes like these. His soul must be clothed with mourning and his spirit with lamentation, and his prayer will be, that that day may be hastened when the nations shall learn war no more.

Our dear friends are affectionately entreated to be careful how they expose themselves unnecessarily to temptations calculated to lead the mind from a right frame of thought on these subjects; or by mingling with those who take delight in such strife, become in any measure leavened into their spirit; that in all our intercourse with the world, we may manifest ourselves to be followers of Him whose advent was announced by the song of the heavenly host, of peace on earth and good will to men.

In contemplating the present war in which our country is engaged, its exceeding wickedness has been forcibly presented to us, not only in its direct consequences as a war, but in the principle object, which, as we believe, produced it, namely, the perpetuation and extension of slavery. We have been concerned that our members may keep ever before them the miseries and sinfulness inseparable from the practice of holding our fellow-men in bondage, and its utter inconsistency with the command of Christ, 'Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them;' and that we fail not, faithfully in the fear of the Lord, to bear our testimony against it, not feeling excused therefrom in consequence of its practical enactment not coming immediately before our view in this part of our land."

ECCLÉSIASTICAL TESTIMONIES.—Under this title an article appeared, some time since, in the National Era, of which the following is a copy:

"The Baptist Clergymen of New England are rapidly signing the strong protest against slavery, which has been alluded to in a previous number of the Era. In the New England Yearly Meeting of Friends, a division took place two years ago, upon doctrinal grounds. The smaller meeting has just issued an excellent 'Testimony' against slavery, decidedly in advance of any previous action of Friends in this section, who have too generally rested satisfied with the fact that slavery had no existence in the Society, and have been too ready to censure the manner in which others attempted to rid themselves and the country of the great evil. If the division shall have the effect to revive the ancient spirit of Quakerism on this subject, and provoke it to a rivalry of good works, it can scarcely be regarded as an evil.—J. G. W."

We were led by the high terms in which our friend Whittier speaks of the testimony referred to, to seek a copy of it. This we have only recently succeeded in obtaining; and we avail ourselves of the first opportunity to express the high gratification its perusal afforded us. With the occasion and merits of the secession or division which has separated, as we doubt not, very brethren, we have nothing, as journalists, to do. Not so with the important sentiments presented by this document. They belong to mankind, and the Church, and should be spread broadcast through the land. If, indeed, they contain not the whole truth, written out in palpable characters, they at least point to it with a significance which it were almost blindness not to perceive.

We present the following graphic description of slavery and its influences, and the inquiry succeeding it, as justifying these views.

"We have felt it a duty incumbent upon us, at this time, to revive our religious testimony against the iniquitous system of slavery. The present peculiar and alarming condition of our country, in its relation to this fearful important subject, has awakened in our minds feelings of deep solicitude; and we desire to give forth a faithful and honest expression of our concern and travail therein, with no other than a fervent hope that we may be found labouring, according to our ability, for the promotion of that peace on earth, and good will to men, which characterizes the Gospel of our blessed Redeemer.

The considerations growing out of this momentous subject are such as overwhelm us with sorrow, and fill us with the liveliest apprehensions for our country's welfare. The enormous wrong of slavery not only still continues in this highly professing land; but, notwithstanding the many noble examples and testimonies against it, and the indefatigable labours of Christians and philanthropists many years for its abolition, it is still multiplying its victims, and even now is seeking, by violence and blood, to enlarge its borders. The desolating scourge of war, with its host of revolting crimes and horrors, has been carried, by this nation, into the heart of a neighbouring republic, with the undisguised purpose of despoiling it of a large portion of its territory, and, as seems evident from the circumstances by which it is marked, with a view to re-establish slavery where it has already been abolished by a less enlightened people. The slave-trade, the abhorrence of all good men, is carried on in the midst of our country. From the border slave states to the far south and south-west, the vessels of the slave-trader, regularly ply, laden with youthful victims, reared like cattle for the market. All the tender ties of kindred and home are unfeelingly sundered, and they are bound, and tasked, and tortured, under the oppressor's lash in a distant clime,—and this with the sanction and under the protection of the laws.

Such is the sorrowful spectacle which this professedly Christian land now exhibits before the world. How great a reproach to the Christian name, and how widely opposite, in all its features, to the Christian character! Instead of love to our neighbour, a system of robbery and outrage upon him. Instead of endeavouring to raise the coloured man up from his degradation and woe, the foot is ruthlessly placed upon his neck, preventing even his own efforts for improvement. Throughout the whole land, whether bond or free, he is subjected to an inveterate prejudice against his colour and his race, which lies as an incubus upon him scarcely less cruel than slavery itself. Shall there be no end to oppression like this? How long shall the crushed bondman in vain appeal to a professedly Christian people for relief? How long shall he be ranked with the brute that periseth, by his brother man? Shall this devoted country continue always forging chains for the bondman's limbs, and putting shackles on his mind? Will not the Lord in righteousness visit for these things?—will he not be avenged on such a nation as this? Oh that we may lay these things to heart, and be wise before the judgments of the Most High come heavily upon us!

But how shall this deep-rooted evil be overcome? What power is potent enough to withstand its encroachments, and to turn back its overwhelming tide?"

We have only space for the following additional selection from this truly eloquent testimony:

"No mere profession of religion, no acknowledgement of the doctrines of the Gospel, nor yet the practice of a round of religious observances, will avail anything, so long as there is an unwillingness to do the Divine will, and the fruits of righteousness be wanting: 'For He hath showed thee, O man! what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and walk humbly with thy God?' Far better is it to be in fellowship with those who, though few in number, are walking by this rule, than with those who can boast of numbers, wealth, and influence, if the gain of oppression is in their hands; for the cry of the oppressed reaches the ear of Him who beholds with an equal eye all the children of men, and who will be avenged on the oppressor, however high may be his pretensions to religion."

"If the gain of oppression is in their hands!"—what a theme for quiet, individual, introverted enquiry!

WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON'S RESOLUTION.—In our account of the proceedings of the late Anniversary meeting of the American Anti-Slavery Society, we noticed the presentation of a resolution on the subject of the purchase and use of the products of slavery, by Henry Grew, and of another offered as a substitute for it by William Lloyd Garrison. The first only of these resolutions was published. The other was mislaid, but has since been supplied from memory. It will be found in the valuable paper bearing the signature of Henry Grew, which we transfer to our columns from another journal. We think our friend Garrison has stated, in his usually clear manner, a proposition, not intending it, however, as an expression of his own sentiment, which it will require all his ingenuity to subvert. It may be that in the terms "guilty," and "equally accountable," guilt and accountability having reference to consciousness of wrong; he may find a door of escape. There are supposable cases in which the kidnapper may be less accountable for the guilt he perpetrates, than he who, measuring all the consequences of his actions, remotely induces the wrong done by the other. Under equal degrees of intelligence, Paul, suffering the witnesses to lay down their clothes at his feet, was as guilty of the death of Stephen, as were the actual perpetrators of the death-doing deed.

OBJECTIONS TO ABSTINENCE FROM SLAVE PRODUCE.—We cheerfully comply with the request of our much valued friend, L. T., contained in the following memorandum:

"Objections are made to the sole use of the products of free labour, by some conscientious people. 1st. The poor can't afford to wear linen, silk, or woolen. 2d. We can't supply ourselves with free labour goods. Will you insert a short reply in the Non-Slaveholder to such objections?"

The first objection supposes that no goods are clear of slave labour, except linen, silk or woolen. This is not the fact. Cotton goods, the product of compensated toil, are to be obtained to an amount fully adequate to, and indeed largely exceeding the existing conscientious demand for free goods. He that doubts this, need only visit the free produce store at the north-west corner of Fifth and Cherry streets, in this city, and his doubts will be removed.—There are the goods—ready to meet a large demand of that character. Increase the demand, and an increased supply will certainly follow, or the axiom that "supply follows demand," will, for the first time in commercial history, be found to be untrue. Such a store we have reason to believe, will soon be established in New York, which will bring the evidence nearer to the door of our esteemed correspondent.

The same objection supposes that goods made of flax, silk and wool, are relatively dearer than goods made of cotton; usefulness and durability, forming, we suppose, the standard of value. It were reasonable to imagine, that this would be the case where the labourer is unpaid for the toil he expended in producing the cotton, but we do not know that it is so. The greater durability of the other fabrics, and the less frequent expense of converting them into garments, are important offsets to the opposite claim of less original cost. We have known rigid economists to differ on this question of cheapness, and therefore will not attempt to settle it; especially as it is not important to any practical issue, affecting the duty of using solely the products of free labour, there remaining enough free cotton and free cotton goods, to supply the demand created by a sense of that duty.

The whole difficulty which really exists to the poor carrying out the abstinence principle, is the difference which now unavoidably exists, between the cost of slave-grown and free-labour goods. This difference will be perpetually diminishing with the increasing demand for the latter description of merchandize, until an equality between them shall be obtained:—when, farewell to slavery! The conscience of the world will then be on the side of purchasing only the products of free and justly remunerated toil. Till then, we would hold up this encouraging language to the honest poor, who would keep themselves clear of the blood of the slave,—“Who ever saw the righteous forsaken, or his seed begging bread?”

To the second objection there has been given a sufficient answer, in the remarks which the first elicited. It may almost be regarded as a law of our being, that “where there is a will there is a way.” The result of the efforts of the humble few, who have embarked in the enterprise of bringing into the market the productions of uncoerced labour, is an earnest of what can be effected by the many. With the means which the many could bring into action, how quickly would the market be brought to that equilibrium, in which the motive for the continuance of slavery would cease to exist. Did this consummation never arrive—did the effort result in no other end, than keeping ourselves clear of the robbery practised on the bondman, the duty of non-participation in the wrong done him, would not be the less certain, nor the heart-cheering reward attending its fulfilment, the less sure.

ELIZABETH HEYRICK'S PAMPHLET.—In the remarks in our last number introductory to this valuable document, the word third, near the end, should be changed to second, or 1836 to 1837—the third Philadelphia edition having been published in the latter year.

FREE PRODUCE ASSOCIATION OF NEW YORK YEARLY MEETING.—We present, under the head of Associated action, an interesting document read at the annual meeting of that body in the Fifth month last. Further particulars of the meeting than have yet appeared in our columns are desirable.

TO CORRESPONDENTS AND READERS.—The communication which appears in this number, bearing the remote date of 3d mo. 28th, was mislaid at its receipt, and only recovered within a few days.

In a few instances, papers whose intended publication was necessarily delayed by the amount of other matter furnished to the printer, have been subsequently overlooked, up to a period when their insertion would have been considered as out of time.

The residence of two of our editors in the country, and the paramount anterior engagements of the third, which have rendered impracticable a fuller attention than we have bestowed upon this journal, we hope will be a sufficient apology for the above and any other deficiencies which have appeared in conducting it. For the typographical errors which have occurred, the kindness of our readers has, probably, already supplied an excuse or remedy.

SELECTIONS.

ELIZABETH HEYRICK'S PAMPHLET.

IMMEDIATE, NOT GRADUAL ABOLITION;
OR,

An Inquiry into the shortest, safest, and most effectual means of getting rid of West India Slavery.

(Concluded.)

Should the wretched African find the moment for breaking his own chains,—and asserting his own freedom,—he may well be expected to take terrible vengeance,—to push the law of retaliation to its utmost extreme. But, when presented with his freedom,—when the sacred rights of humanity are restored to him, would that be the moment for rage, for revenge and murder? To polished and Christianized Europeans, such abuses of liberty may appear natural and inevitable, since their own history abounds with them. But the history of negro emancipation abundantly proves that no such consequences are to be apprehended from the poor untutored and despised African.

“But, to demand immediate emancipation, however safe, however just and desirable in itself, would (we are told) be most impolitic—for it would never be granted; by striving to obtain too much, you would lose all. You must go cautiously and gradually to work. A very powerful interest and a very powerful influence are against you. You must try to conciliate, instead of provoke the West Indian planters; to convince them that their own interest is concerned in the better treatment and gradual emancipation of their slaves, or your object will never be accomplished.”

But you will strive and labour in vain; you will reason, however eloquently, however forcibly, in the ears of the “deaf adder.” The moral and rational perceptions of the slaveholder, are still more perverted than those of the slave; oppression, is more debasing and injurious to the intellect of the oppressor, than that of the oppressed. The gains of unrighteousness,—familiarity with injustice and cruelty, have rendered the slaveholder more obstinately, more incurably blind and inaccessible to reason, than the slave. And what justice or restitution would there be in the world, were unlawful possessions never to be reclaimed till there was a disposition in the possessor voluntarily to relinquish them,—till he was convinced that it was his interest to part with them?

The interests and the prejudices of the West Indian planters, have occupied much too prominent a place in the discussion of this great question. The abolitionists have shown a good deal too much politeness and accommodation towards these gentlemen. With reference to them, the question is said to be a very delicate one. (Was ever the word delicate so preposterously misapplied?) It is said to be beset with difficulties and dangers. Yes, the parties interested,—criminally interested, protest that the difficulties are insurmountable,—the dangers tremendous. But those difficulties and dangers have been proved to be visionary and futile, the offspring of idle, or of hypocritical fears. A little temporary pecuniary loss, would be the mighty amount of all the calamities which emancipation would entail upon its violent and infuriated opposers.* And is that a consideration to stand in competition with the liberation of eight hundred thousand of our fellow creatures from the heavy yoke of slavery? Must hundreds of thousands of human beings continue to be disinherited of those inherent rights of humanity, without which life becomes a curse instead of a blessing; must they continue to be roused and stimulated to uncompensated labour, night as well as day, during a great part of the year, by the impulse of the cart whip, that a few noble lords and honourable gentlemen may experience no privation of expensive luxury,—no contraction of profuse expenditure,—no curtailment of state and equipage? Must the scale in which is placed the just claims, the sacred rights of eight hundred thousand British subjects, be made to kick the beam, when weighed in the balance against pretensions so comparatively light and frivolous?

*The account of the London meeting of West India Planters, which took place in February last, perfectly justifies the application of these epithets.

Among the West Indian proprietors, there are doubtless, individuals of high character and respectability, whose education and circumstances may, nevertheless, disqualify them from taking a strictly impartial view of colonial slavery. Such, of course, must be exempt from the just odium,—the reprobation, which belongs to the general body, as far as they have rendered their own character notorious by their own declarations,—by the speeches they have published, and the decrees they have issued; by the violent abuse, the rage and calumny which they have heaped upon the abolitionists; by the alternatives of fawning servility and insolent threatening, with which they at one time “prostrate themselves at the foot of the throne;” at another protest, in the tone of defiance, not to say rebellion, against British interference with colonial legislation. Towards these gentlemen, there has been extended a great deal too much delicacy and tenderness. They are ultra, in the strictest sense of the word,—and as such, they ought to be regarded, notwithstanding their rank and consequence, by every honest, impartial moralist. They have received too long the gains of oppression; too long have they fattened on the spoils of humanity.

It matters not at all how, or when, the planter acquired his pretended right to the slave; whether by violence or robbery,—by purchase or by inheritance. His claim always was, and always will be, ill-founded, because it is opposed to nature, to reason, and to religion. It is also illegal, as far as legality has any foundation of justice, divine or human, to rest upon. His plea for protection against the designs of the abolitionists, on the ground that his property has been embarked in this nefarious speculation, on the faith of Parliament;—in the confidence that no change would be effected in the laws which sanction the enormous injustice and wickedness of slavery, is childish and futile. Are not commercial speculations of every kind, subject to perpetual vicissitudes and revolutions? Are not human laws perpetually undergoing new modifications and changes in accommodation to the ever-varying circumstances of the times,—to increasing light and civilization? It is absurd to imagine that the progress of humanity, of moral and political improvement, is to be arrested, because some individual perquisites, derived from institutions of brutal ignorance and barbarism, would be curtailed. A great deal more reasonably might the industrious artisan, whose daily subsistence depends on his daily labour—whose only property is his labour—and who, in many cases, has no means, like the West Indian capitalist, of transferring it from one channel to another; with a great deal more reason might he exclaim and cry out for protection against all mechanical improvements, which diminish labour, which deprive thousands of the laboring classes of their wonted resources, and drive them to beggary.

But if the West Indian gentlemen fail to obtain protection against the designs of the abolitionists, then they demand compensation, in the event of the emancipation of their slaves, to the immense amount of sixty-four millions. And is compensation demanded in no other quarter?—or, if not demanded, is it no where else due? If compensation be demanded as an act of justice to the slaveholder, in the event of the liberation of his slaves; let justice take her free, impartial course; let compensation be made in the first instance, when it is most due; let compensation be first made to the slave, for his long years of uncompensated labour, degradation, and suffering. It is in this quarter, that justice cries aloud for compensation,—and if our attention is turned, but for a moment, to these two substantial and well authenticated claims,—the demands of the slaveholder (even had they been couched in terms less arrogant and insulting) will become not a little questionable.

Experience has already sufficiently evinced the fallacy of the notion, of the superior policy of aiming at gradual, instead of immediate emancipation, on the ground of its meeting with less opposition; for the planters have shown themselves just as much enraged at the idea of gradual, as of immediate emancipation. They appear indeed, either incapable of perceiving, or determined to confound all distinction between them; for, in the bitterness of their invectives, they accuse the gradual abolitionist of endeavoring to bring upon their heads all the calamities and destruction which they formerly deprecated as the inevitable consequence of immediate emancipation.

On this great question, the spirit of accommodation and conciliation has been a spirit of delusion. The abolitionists have lost, rather than gained ground by it; their cause has been weakened, instead of strengthened. The great interests of truth and justice are betrayed, rather than supported, by all softening, qualifying concessions. Every iota which is yielded of their rightful claims, impairs the conviction of their rectitude, and consequently weakens their success. Truth and justice make their best way in the world, when they appear in bold and simple majesty; their demands are most willingly conceded when they are most fearlessly claimed.

Were the immediate freedom of the slave demanded, because, in the first instance, it was unlawfully and violently wrested from him!—because, ever since, it has been most unjustly and cruelly withheld from him; because it is his inalienable right, which he holds by a divine charter, which no human claims can disannul; were the immediate abolition of slavery in the British dominions demanded, because slavery is in direct opposition to the spirit of the British constitution, to the spirit and letter of the Christian religion, to every principle of humanity and justice; because, as long as it is suffered to exist, it must remain the fruitful source of the most atrocious crimes, the most cruel sufferings; because, as long as it is suffered to exist, its abettors and supporters, passive as well as active, (now that their eyes are wide open to its enormities) must lie under the divine malediction, and experience, sooner or later, the certain and awful visitations of retributive justice,—the fearful accomplishment of that solemn declaration—“With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again?”—demands so evidently just,—such plain appeals to reason and conscience,—to law and equity;—such serious reference to Divine authority,—to future retribution, would be more successful—would be better calculated to keep alive the public sympathy—would lead to more unwearied exertions—to greater sacrifices, than the slow, cautious, accommodating measures now proposed by the abolitionists; than any timorous suggestions of expediency—any attempts to conciliate the favour, or to disarm the opposition of West Indian slaveholders.

When an obvious and imperative duty is encumbered with considerations which do not properly belong to it; its obligations, instead of being enforced, are enfeebled; its motives, instead of being concentrated, are divided and scattered; and the duty, if not entirely neglected, will be but languidly and partially performed. We make slow progress in virtue, lose much time in labour, when, instead of going boldly forward in its straight and obvious path, we are continually inquiring how far we may proceed in it without difficulty, and without opposition.

Had the abolitionists preserved a single eye to their great object; had they kept it distinct and separate from all extraneous considerations; had they pursued it by a course more direct, through means more simple; had they confided more in the goodness of their cause, and threaded less the opposition of its adversaries; had they depended more upon divine, and less upon human support, their triumphs, instead of their defeats, would long since have been recorded. Surely their eyes must at length be opened; they must perceive that they have not gone the right way to work,—that the apprehension of losing all by asking too much, has driven them into the danger of losing all by having asked too little; that the spirit of compromise and accommodation has placed them nearly in the situation of the unfortunate man in the fable, who, by trying to please every body, pleased nobody, and lost the object of his solicitude into the bargain.

It had been well for the poor oppressed African, had the asserters of his rights entered the lists against his oppressors with more of the spirit of Christian combatants, and less of worldly politicians—had they remembered through the struggle that it was a conflict of sacred duty against sordid interests,—of right against might; that it was, in fact, an holy war—an attack upon the strongholds, the deep entrenchments of the very powers of darkness, in which courage would be more availing than caution; in which success was to be expected less from prudential or political expedients than from that all-controlling power which alone gives efficacy to human exertions—which often defeats the best concerted schemes of human sagacity and accomplishes His great purposes through the instrumentality of the simplest agency. Had the labours of the abolitionists been begun and continued on Divine, instead of human reliance, immediate emancipation would have appeared just as attainable as gradual emancipation. But, by substituting the latter object for the former, under the idea that its accomplishment was more probable, less exposed to objection; and by endeavouring to carry it through considerations of interest rather than obligations of duty, they have betrayed an unworthy diffidence in the cause in which they have embarked; they have converted the great business of emancipation into an object of political calculation; they have withdrawn it from Divine, and placed it under human patronage; and disappointment and defeat have been the inevitable consequence.

If the deadly root of slavery be ever extirpated out of British soil, it will be by such exertions as are prompted by duty rather than interest. We cannot sufficiently admire the great wisdom and goodness of those providential arrangements which have, in the general course of events, so inseparably connected our duty with our interest; but with regard to the broad and palpable distinctions between right and wrong, virtue and vice, the more simple and direct the reference to the will of our Divine Lawgiver, and that of his viceroy, conscience, the more determined will be our resolution—the more decisive our conduct. “How shall I do this great wickedness and sin against God,” will be the most influential of all considerations. And the solemn inquiry, pressed home to the conscience, how an enlightened and Christian government—how an enlightened and Christian community can, in any way, encourage or sanction such a complicated system of iniquity as that of slavery—“the greatest practical blunder, as well as the greatest calamity that has ever disgraced and afflicted human nature,”—without sharing its guilt, and, if there be a righteous Governor of the universe, its punishment also—will be followed up by propositions more consistent and energetic, than such as aim only at its gradual extermination.

The very able mover of the question in Parliament last year, proposed that our colonial slavery should be suffered “to expire of itself, to die a natural death.” But a natural death it never will die. It must be crushed at once, or not at all. While the abolitionists are endeavouring gradually to enfeeble and kill it by inches, it will gradually discover the means of reinforcing its strength, and will soon defy all the puny attacks of its assailants.

In the mean time, let the abolitionists remember, while they are reasoning and declaiming and petitioning Parliament for gradual emancipation, let them remember that the miseries they deplore remain unmitigated—the crimes they execrate are still perpetrated; still the tyrant frowns, and the slave trembles; the cart whip still plies at the will of the inhuman driver, and the hopeless victim still writhes under its lash. The ameliorating measures recommended by Parliament to the colonial legislators are neglected and spurned. The bad passions of the slaveholder are exasperated and infuriated by interference, and vengeance falls with accumulated weight on the slave. It had been better for him had no efforts been made for his emancipation, than that they should ultimately fail, or be feebly exerted—the interval of suspense will be an interval of restless perturbation,—of aggravated tyranny in the oppressor,—of aggravated suffering to the oppressed. Unsuccessful opposition to crimes of every description, invariably increases their power and malignity.

An immediate emancipation, then, is the object to be aimed at; it is more wise and rational—more politic and safe, as well as more just and humane, than gradual emancipation. The interest, moral and political, temporal and eternal, of all parties concerned will be best promoted by immediate emancipation. The sooner the planter is obliged to abandon a system which torments him with perpetual alarms of insurrection and massacre—which keeps him in the most debasing moral bondage—subjects him to a tyranny, of all others the most injurious and destructive, that of sordid and vindictive passions; the sooner he is obliged to adopt a more humane and more liberative policy in the cultivation of his plantations; the sooner the over-laboured, crouching slave is converted into a free labourer—his compulsory, unremunerated toil, under the impulse of the cart whip, exchanged for cheerful, well recompensed industry,—his bitter sufferings for peaceful enjoyment—his deep execration of his merciless tyrants, for respectful attachment to his humane and equitable masters; the sooner the Government and the people of this country purify themselves from the guilt of supporting or tolerating a system of such monstrous injustice, productive of such complicated enormities—the sooner all this mass of impolicy, crime, and suffering, is got rid of, the better.

It behoves the advocates of this great cause, then, to take the most direct, the most speedy and effectual means of accomplishing their object. If any can be devised more direct, more speedy and effectual, or less exceptionable in its operation than that which has been suggested, let it be immediately adopted; but let us no longer compromise the requisitions of humanity and justice for those of an artful and sordid policy; let there be no betraying of the cause by needless delay; delay is always dangerous; on this momentous question, (humanly speaking,) it will be fatal, if much longer protracted. The public sympathy is already declining, people are becoming tired of the subject, they grow listless and impatient when it is introduced; they tell you "they wish to hear no more of it; their minds are made up; no advantage can be gained by farther discussion; the subject must now be left to Parliament." Alas! and how has Parliament disposed of it? How has it realized the very modest hopes indulged by the abolitionists in consequence of its declarations in favour of gradual abolition, a year ago? By its recent decisions, the great work of emancipation appears to retrograde instead of advance. The bullying of the slaveholders is said to have proved completely triumphant. The royal proclamation just issued, is rightly denominated a hope extinguisher to the wretched slave population. Well may the abolitionists express their disappointment on finding the present measures of Government fall so far short of the expectations which the promises of last session had excited. Well may the right honourable secretary be charged with "having done nothing, or worse than nothing; with being satisfied, at most, to see his pledge in favour of a whole archipelago reduced to a single island; while a law is still to prevail in every island of the West Indies, except Trinidad, which authorizes a female negro to be stripped in the presence of her father, husband, or son, and flogged with a cart whip!"

There were some who anticipated these results; cheerless and melancholy as they are, they are such as might reasonably have been expected from the proposition for gradual emancipation, and if persisted in it will assuredly end in no emancipation. The time is critical. The general interest in this great subject is evidently on the wane, and it should be remembered that even the most humane and susceptible—those who are most under the influence of true Christian principle, are not always bound up to such a pitch of disinterested and ardent zeal as is requisite to cope with such a host of interested and powerful opponents as are the West Indian proprietors and slaveholders. Those who are "called to glory and virtue,"—invited to labour in the Divine vineyard, are admonished to "work while it is day, for the night cometh, in which no man can work;" whilst they have light, they are admonished to "walk in the light, lest darkness come upon them." Mental darkness, and spiritual night, steal fast upon those, who, when an imperious duty is presented to them—when sufficient ability is imparted for its accomplishment—falter and procrastinate.

If the great work of emancipation be not now accomplished, humanly speaking, it may be despaired of, as far as our agency is concerned. The rising generation may furnish no such zealous, devoted advocate, as a Clarkson, a Wilberforce, and a Buxton. If the clear light, the full information, they have so generally diffused; the deep interest and sympathy they have so generally excited, produce no other results than those at present contemplated by the abolitionists—this country may fall under the curse of being judicially hardened and blinded, in consequence of having been softened and enlightened to so little purpose; and the emancipation of eight hundred thousand British slaves may be effected through other means and other agency, which, when once roused into action, may realize all those terrific scenes of insurrection and carnage which the imagination of the planter has so often contemplated.

Since the preceding pages were written, the sentences passed upon the insurgents of Demerara and Kingston have reached us. Some had been hung, others had received corporeal punishment, to what extent, let those who have ears to hear, and hearts to feel, deeply ponder. Some had received, others were yet to receive—one thousand lashes—and were condemned to be worked in chains during the residue of their lives!! The horrid work, has probably, by this time been completed; human interposition, therefore, with respect to these individual victims of West Indian Justice, will now be of no avail.

But shall such sentences as these be suffered to pass the ordeal of public opinion? Shall they be established as precedents for future judgments, on future insurgents? Forbid it—every feeling of humanity—in every bosom. Let every principle of virtue which distinguishes the human from the brute creation,—the professors of the benignant, compassionate religion of Christ, from the savage and blood-thirsty worshippers of Moloch,—raise one united, determined, and solemn protest against the repetition of these barbarities, which blaspheme the sacred name of justice, and seem to imprecate Almighty vengeance.

Will the inhabitants of this benevolent, this Christian country, now want a stimulant to rouse their best exertions, to nerve their resolutions against all participation with these human blood-hounds? Will the British public now want a "spiral stirring" incentive to prohibit, and to interdict, henceforth and for ever, the merchandise of slavery? Let the produce of slave labor, henceforth and for ever, be regarded as "the accursed thing," and refused admission into our houses; or let us renounce our Christian profession, and disgrace it no longer, by a selfish, cold-hearted indifference, which, under such circumstances, would be reproachful to savages.

What was the offence which brought down this frightful vengeance on the heads of those devoted victims? What horrible crime could have instigated man to sentence his fellow man, to a punishment so tremendous?—to doom his brother to undergo the protracted torture of a thousand lashes?—to have his quivering flesh mangled and torn from his living body?—and to labour through life under the galling and ignominious weight of chains? It was insurrection. But in what cause did they become insurgents? Was it not in that cause, which, of all others, can best excuse, if it cannot justify insurrection? Was it not in the cause of self-defence from the most degrading, intolerable oppression?

But what was the immediate occasion of this insurrection? What goaded these poor wretches on to brave the dreadful hazards of rebellion? One of them, now hanging in chains at Demerara, was sold and separated from his wife and family of ten children, after a marriage of eighteen years, and thereby made a rebel. Another was a slave of no common intellect, whose wife, the object of his warmest affections, was torn from his bosom, and forced to become the mistress of an overseer. His domestic happiness thus destroyed for ever, he became (how should it have been otherwise!) disaffected and desperate. Such provocations, added to their common and every day wrongs, seem beyond human endurance, and might instigate "the very stones to mutiny."

How preposterously partial and inconsistent are we in the extension of our sympathy, our approbation, and our assistance towards the oppressed and miserable! We extol the resistance of the Greeks,—we deem it heroic and meritorious. We deem it an act of virtue,—of Christian charity, to supply them with arms and ammunition, to enable them to persist in insurrection. Possibly, in the longest list of magnificent subscribers to these Greek insurgents, the names of some noble lords and honorable gentlemen may be found—who sanction and approve the visitation of West Indian slave insurgents, with the gibbet, and the infliction of one thousand lashes!!

But let us, whose moral perceptions are unblinded by interest or prejudice—whose charity is unworped by partiality or hypocrisy; let us pursue a more rational and consistent course. Let us not overlook our own urgent duties in the pursuit of such as are less imperative. Let us first—mend our own business,—"pluck the beam out of our own eye." Let us first extend the helping hand to those who have the first claim to our assistance. Let us first liberate our own slaves—which we may do without furnishing them with arms or ammunition. Then, we shall have clean hands,—and the Divine blessing may then be expected to crown our exertions for the redemption of other captives.

Should the weak objection still haunt some inconsiderate reader, of the little good which can reasonably be expected to result from individual abstinence from West Indian produce; let him reflect, that the most wonderful productions of human skill and industry; the most astonishing effects of human power have been accomplished by combined exertions, which, when individually and separately considered, appear feeble and insignificant. Let him reflect, that the grandest objects of human observation consist of small agglomerated particles; that the globe itself is composed of atoms too minute for discernment; that extended ages consist of accumulated moments. Let him reflect, that greater victories have been achieved by the combined expression of individual opinion, than by fleets and armies; that greater moral revolutions have been accomplished by the combined exertion of individual resolution, than were ever effected by acts of Parliament.

The hydra-headed monster of slavery will never be destroyed by other means, than the united expression of individual opinion, and the united exertion of individual resolution. Let no man restrain the expression of the one, or the exertion of the other, from the apprehension that his single efforts will be of no avail. The greatest and the best work must have a beginning,—often, it is a very small and obscure one. And though the example in question should not become universal, we may surely hope that it will become general.

If it is too much to expect that the matter will be taken up, (otherwise, than to make a jest of it) by the thoughtless and the selfish; what proportion these bear to the considerate and the compassionate, remains to be ascertained. By these, we may reasonably expect that it will be taken up, with resolution and consistency. By Christian societies of every denomination,—pre-eminently by that which has hitherto stood foremost in the great cause of abolition. By the great body of the Catholics, too, who attach so much merit to abstinence and self-denial;—and by all the different Protestant professors, (who are at all sincere in their profession) of the one religion of universal compassion,—which requires us, “to love our neighbor as ourselves,” this testimony against slavery may be expected to be borne with scrupulous and conscientious fidelity.

Think, but for a moment, at what a trifling sacrifice the redemption of eight hundred thousand of our fellow creatures from the lowest condition of degradation and misery may be accomplished. Abstinence from one single article of luxury would annihilate the West Indian slavery! But abstinence it cannot be called;—we only need substitute East India, for West India sugar,—and the British atmosphere would be purified at once, from the poisonous infection of slavery. The antidote of this deadly bane, for which we have been so many years in laborious but unsuccessful search, is most simple and obvious,—too simple and obvious it should seem, to have been regarded. Like Naaman, of old, who expected to be cured of his leprosy by some grand and astonishing evolution, and disdained to wash, as he was directed, in the obscure waters of Damascus;—we look for the abolition of British slavery, not to the simple and obvious means of its accomplishment, which lie within our own power,—but through the slow and solemn process of Parliamentary discussion,—through the “pomp and circumstance” of legislative enactment;—most absurdly remonstrating and petitioning against that system of enormous wickedness, which we voluntarily tax ourselves to the annual amount of two millions sterling, to support!*

That abstinence from West Indian sugar alone, would sign the death warrant of West Indian slavery, is morally certain. The genuity of two millions annually, is acknowledged by the planters to be insufficient to bolster up their to tiring system,—and they scruple not to declare to Parliament, that they must be relieved, if the protecting duties against East Indian competition be not augmented.

One concluding word, to such as may be convinced of the duty, but may still be incredulous as to the efficacy of this species of abstinence, from the apprehension that it will never become sufficiently general to accomplish its purpose. Should your example not be followed, should it be utterly unavailing towards the attainment of its object; still, it will have its own abundant reward; it will be attended with the consciousness of sincerity and consistency,—of possessing “clean hands,” of having “no fellowship with the workers of iniquity;” still, it will be attended with the approbation of conscience,—and doubtless, with that of the Great Searcher of hearts, who regarded with favourable eye, the mile east by the poor widow into the treasury, and declared that a cup of cold water only, administered in Christian charity, “shall in no wise lose its reward.”

From the National Anti-Slavery Standard.
FREE LABOUR PRODUCE.

The voluntary purchase and use of the products of Slavery, a practical subversion of the principle avowed by Abolitionists of “No Union with Slaveholders.”

FRIEND GAY:—I avail myself of your kind offer, in compliance with my request, to publish a communication on the subject of abstaining, as far as practicable, from the purchase and use of those articles which we believe and declare to be the fruits of robbery and oppression.

Important as I consider this subject, I have no desire to demand for it undue attention. If my brethren think that I am doing this, I can truthfully assure them that I call their attention to the subject, not because I do not appreciate other appropriate means for the advancement of our benevolent enterprise; but because I am persuaded that this article of our duty has been too much overlooked and disregarded.

*Every reader may not be aware, that such is the amount of our duty laid on East India, to keep up the unnatural price of West India sugar.

At our late interesting convocations for Liberty in New York and Boston, our attention has very properly been called to first principles. Our noble and beloved Pioneer has done this, and our friend Hathaway has reminded us of our duty to carry out these principles into all our social, commercial, and religious action. What are these principles? We have declared, in vindication of our opposition to the great national sin of oppression, that man's right to liberty and the fruits of his own toil, are the gifts of the Creator, and inalienable. We therefore charge upon the slaveholder the sin of robbing his brother of the products of his toil, and unite with the spirit of truth in denouncing “We unto him that buildeth his house by unrighteousness and his chambers by wrong; that useth his neighbour's service without wages, and giveth him not for his work.”

We deny the oppressor's right to these fruits of robbery, and, by necessary consequence, his right to sell them. Where, then, have we obtained the right to buy of that oppressor or his agents? From which of our principles of righteousness do we deduce the right to become the receivers of goods which we know and declare to be stolen? From which of those principles do we infer that it is a mere matter of inconvenience to do this, and that it is not a moral wrong? Do our courts of common justice—do we ourselves admit that the man who is encouraging thieves, by receiving and paying them for the fruits of their iniquity, is chargeable with no moral guilt? My never-ceasing love of our brother Garrison, for his devotion to the cause of outraged humanity, cannot preclude the conviction, that, in respect to this subject, he descends from the high position of holy principle which he usually occupies.

If, as our friend Hathaway avers, we are bound to carry out our principles “in commercial and religious action,” does it not follow that we are bound to cease buying and selling the fruits of Slavery? Is it consistent anti-slavery action, to contribute into the hands of the slaveholder, voluntarily, that very profit which is the most effective motive for maintaining the whole system? The origin of the atrocious net of converting an intelligent being, whom God has made in his own image, into a chattel, is found in the avarice of the human heart. This “fire of hell” glows in the soul of the oppressor, and consumes all the interests of humanity which pertain to the life which now is, and to that which is to come. I now ask the purchasers of these products to pause one solemn moment, and consider the fearful fact that they are supplying the entire fuel to feed this infernal fire! From them the merchant receives the profit which induces him to purchase the fruits of unrighteousness of the slaveholder, together with the money which he remits to the latter, which is his inducement to rivet the chain of Slavery, and to encourage the slave-trader, by purchasing the victims of his cupidity. The slaveholder is accessory to the sin of the slave-traffic-er, who would discontinue his heinous traffic if the former did not open a market for him. The merchant is accessory to the sin of both, as he opens a market for both. The consumers are accessory to the sins of all the others, as they open the final market on which all the others are entirely dependent. Let the consumers stop this “union with slaveholders,” and the whole operation of the infernal machine ceases. The main-spring is broken. No more shall the wail of outraged humanity ascend from the slave-ship, the rice-swamp, the sugar plantation, or the cotton-field.

It is remarkable that during our Anniversary business meetings in New York, our esteemed friend Garrison offered a resolution which closes as follows: “That if a person engaged in the African Slave-Trade is justly deserving of capital punishment, no matter what may be his defence for his conduct, then the American slaveholder as justly deserves the same punishment—for he claims an absolute right to possess, buy and sell human beings, and stimulates the foreign trafficker, by opening for him a profitable market.” Why this man is to be charged with moral wrong, because he “stimulates the foreign trafficker, by opening for him a profitable market,” while the man who stimulates both the slaveholder and the slave-trader, by opening for both a “profitable market” is to be considered morally innocent, is a problem I leave my respected friend to solve at his leisure.

Abolitionists often quote Mr. Wesley's declaration, that “men-buyers are on a level with men-stealers.” If such is their moral position because they buy, what they know or ought to know is stolen, what must be the moral position of those who know and declare that the cotton and the sugar they buy are stolen?

It is objected by those who really appear to me to be building up the very system of abominations which they profess to destroy, that the principle of abstinence cannot be carried out. This objection seems to concede that the principle is a righteous one, for if it is not, the objector has no need to say that it cannot be carried out, but he may say at once, it ought not to be carried out. If it is a good principle, it is our duty to carry it out as far as practicable. It is our duty to do no more with respect to any principle. Neither morality nor religion require impossibilities.

It is indeed impossible to abstain from all use of the products of Slavery, or from other fruits of dishonesty. With all our consistent and honest endeavors to avoid encouraging evil-doers, by partaking of their evil-deeds, we shall occasionally do so. An honest man, intending to purchase those articles only which have been honestly obtained, will sometimes purchase such as have not been so obtained. Does this justify the man who voluntarily supplies himself continually at the shop which is notorious for the constant reception of stolen goods? Will you say that these two persons occupy the same moral position; and that the latter is doing that which is merely inevitable? An honest man may ignorantly receive and pass counterfeit money. Shall we therefore allow the man to excuse himself who knowingly purchases and uses it? We tell the slaveholder that liberty is the inalienable right of all men. He replies, "this is a mere abstraction," "a rhetorical flourish," "you cannot carry it out." He repels the charge of the Englishman against Slavery, with the charge of oppressing his own operatives in the manufactory; and, as my friend Phillips said, that he would as willingly go to the judgment in a shirt of cotton, as in one of Irish linen, so the slaveholder will tell you that he would as willingly go to the judgment with his slaves as with English operatives. "So they wrap it up." My esteemed friend will permit me to say, that if he affirms of the Irish shirt what he does of the American, i. e. that it is the fruit of robbery and oppression, he should have too much reverence for the holy commandment, "Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness," &c. to be willing to go to the judgment in either.

It is affirmed that the slaves are willing that their abolition friends should use the products of their labour. One fugitive, I think, affirmed this at our meeting in Boston. If the transaction were only between the slave and the consumer, and the former should freely sell or give the latter some of the fruits of his toil, there would be no moral wrong in the reception. But it is not so. The act of the slaveholder, in robbing the slave of the fruits of his toil, and selling what is not his own, is a moral wrong, in which the purchaser of the stolen article is accessory, voluntarily partaking of the sin, and in fact, presenting the chief inducement for its continuance. Now the slave has no right to be accessory to moral wrong. To be knowingly accessory to moral wrong, is itself a moral wrong, consequently, he can delegate no man to do it.

We are told that abstaining from the products of slave-labour will have little or no effect. Will the objector allow such an excuse for not avoiding other moral evils? No. Then, he will maintain principle, and say, that "he who is unjust in that which is least, is unjust also in much; and he who is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in much." We have proved, however, that this is not a small evil, either in its nature or consequences. Nor is it true that no effect is produced by a consistent practice in this matter. Our practical testimony has good effect in ending the attention of some to the great sin of slavery. Moreover, the diminution of the demand for the fruits of unrequited toil, if Abolitionists only abstained from the use, would be followed by a proportionate and considerable diminution of unrighteous and cruel slave-toil. The supply will be according to the demand. If there is an increasing demand for slave-products, there will be increased toil on the part of the slaves to supply, and vice versa. So in respect to free goods. If Abolitionists will demand them, and present a market for them, they will have them.

Although our friend Hathaway affirmed it to be our duty to carry out our anti-slavery principles "in commercial and religious action," Mr. Foster asserted that trading with slaveholders is no union with them: that union is aid, and that trading with them is not aid, and that slaveholders did not care for our abstaining. Is it necessary for me to attempt to refute such reckless assertions as these? Is it needful for me to prove that the men who fill their stores or their houses with the goods purchased from the slaveholder, have no commercial union with him? Will Mr. F. please to inform us in what commercial union consists? Will he affirm that the receivers and purchasers of stolen goods offer no aid to the villains who have stolen them? Will he affirm that the man, who has opened his store, cares not whether or not he has any customers?

The inconsistency of Abolitionists in this matter is obvious enough in other cases. If the man who is continually encouraging those who defraud others, by paying them for their stolen goods, should put out a sign declaring, "No union with thieves," we say that it is a mockery and a lie.

There is another subterfuge. As the slaveholder attempts to repel our charge of unrighteousness, by assuring us that he holds the slave in bondage for his own good, so the purchaser of slave products attempts to excuse himself by assuring us that he does it for the good of the slave. Admitting both to be sincere, they are both doing evil that good may come. Supposing, instead of being an anti-slavery society, that we were a society for detecting horse-thieves and abolishing horse-stealing. Some of our members, we ascertain, are in the practice of buying horses they know are stolen. We remonstrate against their practice. Oh, gentlemen, says one, I do this for the good of our cause. I buy the stolen horses so cheap that I have more money to put into our treasury. Another says, my practice enables me to pay the expense of my journeys when I go to lecture against horse-stealing, besides, horse-thieves care nothing about men abstaining from buying their stolen horses: buying their stolen horses affords them "no aid." The pirate, the slave-trafficker, the slaveholder, will all tell you that they do good with the fruits of their iniquities. The truth is, that the Abolitionist who cares not to abstain from the purchase and use of the fruits of robbery and oppression, is practically building up the very system of iniquity which he professes to hate and destroy.

It remains only for me to notice the manner in which my respected friend, Garrison, attempted to invalidate my resolution in New York, designed to show that our profession of "No union with slaveholders," required us to abstain from the continual voluntary use of the fruits of their unrighteousness and oppression. To my resolution, Mr. G. offered the following amendment, viz:

"That whosoever buys, sells, or consumes the productions of slave labour, is a participant in the crime of slaveholding, and guilty of assisting in the perpetuity of Slavery and the Slave-Trade; and therefore is to be held equally accountable with the African kidnapper and the American slaveholder, for all the crimes and horrors of the slave system."*

Mr. G. offered this amendment, not as his own sentiment, but to test my resolution, and to disprove the soundness of its principle.

My first remark on this amendment is, that it subverts my resolution, which requires the Abolitionists to cease stimulating the slaveholder and the slave-trader, "by opening for both a profitable market," it must certainly subvert that part of Mr. Garrison's own resolution at the same meeting, which condemns the slaveholder for stimulating "the foreign trafficker, by opening for him a profitable market." If the amendment proves the impropriety of the demand of abstainers to send back the doors which are the fruits of unrighteousness, it equally proves the impropriety of the cry in Mr. G.'s last paper, "SEND BACK THE MONEY."

*Mr. G.'s original amendment was not published with my resolution, nor could I obtain a copy at the Anti-Slavery office in New York. My friend gave me the above as corresponding with the original as near as he could remember.

It is, in my opinion, a truth worthy of the serious consideration of every man, that they who are freely buying, selling, and using the productions of slave labour, are, in an important sense, as I have already shown, accessory to the general crimes and horrors of the slave system. Their money is the ultimatum of the whole system. Some sins, however, pertaining to this monstrous evil, like those pertaining to other evils, are more heinous in the sight of God and men, than others. We are, indeed, "accountable" for every wrong action, but there is not only an important difference between that participation with moral evil, which is voluntary and with knowledge, and that participation which is unintentional; but there is also a great variety of degrees of criminality in different acts of voluntary participation.

After the most deliberate examination of this subject, it appears to me, that, on the very same principle that we call on our fellow-citizens either to abandon the Declaration of Independence which demands liberty for all men, or that Constitution which withholds it from millions, so we ought either to haul down our banner which we have unfurled to Freedom's breeze, "No union with slaveholders," or abandon our commercial union with oppressors. All which is respectfully submitted to the serious consideration of the friends of the slave, by their fellow-labourer in the cause of humanity, HENRY GAWW.

Milton, June 2d, 1847.

INTELLIGENCE.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY IN LONDON.

LONDON, May —, 1847.

Last night we had a most glorious meeting of the Anti-Slavery Society, in Finsbury Chapel, to which building it had been transferred from the Hall of Commerce, the place for which it had been convened, but which was found too small for the numbers who assembled. We were honoured, I cannot tell you why, with the presence of the Conde Montemolin and suite. That exiled prince, who now bears a relation to Spain, very similar to that which Charles Edward sustained to this country, is not very likely to sympathize with the free and manly sentiments which were uttered in his hearing last night; and which I believe he has English enough to understand. However, it is gratifying to know that, through the medium of the press, the grand doctrines which are expounded in our public assemblies, are constantly finding their way to the notice, not only of those who have influence, but to those by whom the reins of power are held.

The report of the Society was indeed one of progress.

The following resolutions were adopted:

Resolved, That this meeting feel it to be their duty to protest, in the strongest terms, against the recent legislative enactments which have gone into effect in the Crown Colonies, as not only abridging the just rights of the emancipated classes and of the immigrant laborers, and subjecting the former to enormous, unequal, and unjust taxation, for purposes other than those of civil government, but as giving to their masters or employers undue, and, when exercised, oppressive powers over them, both on the estates and in the courts of justice; and that, therefore, they strenuously recommend to all parties in the colonies injuriously affected by these enactments, as well as to their friends in this country, the necessity and importance of seeking by every constitutional means, the establishment of local representative Legislatures, upon a thoroughly liberal basis, as the best means of securing just laws, and an equitable system of taxation, and a pure administration of justice.

Resolved, That whilst this meeting express their unabated hostility to the immigration scheme, now in force, for supplying various emancipated colonies with foreign labourers, as unjust, inhuman, and impolitic, they would especially enter their protest against the proposed importation of negroes from parts of Africa out of British jurisdiction, as not only open in an eminent degree to the general objections urged against those schemes, but because it will furnish a pernicious example to foreign States, having slave colonies or territories, to supply them with nominally free but really slave labourers, and thus to beget a new and more extended form of the slave trade, and consequently the greater degradation and desolation of Africa.

Resolved, That this meeting, in reviewing the events of the past year, in connection with the anti-slavery cause, would record their sincere satisfaction and thankfulness, at its marked progress in various parts of the world, especially in the United States and in France; and that, whilst they would express their deep sympathy with abolitionists of every country, in the severe struggle in which they are engaged for human freedom, they would urge them to increased exertions to promote the abolition of slavery without delay and without compromise, as the only effectual way of terminating the atrocious traffic in human beings, and of securing the great objects they have in view.

Resolved, That this meeting, painfully alive to the fearful consequences likely to ensue from the introduction of slave-grown sugars, and other articles of slave produce, into the British markets, feel called upon to recommend to the friends of the oppressed and suffering slaves, not only in this country, but throughout the world, the duty of abstaining, as far as practicable, from the use of such produce, and of substituting the produce of free labour in its place, as an important means of promoting the universal and complete abolition of slavery and the slave-trade.

Resolved, That this meeting, regarding the attempt of Her Majesty's Government to introduce into the British colonies a system of compulsory education, to be sustained by a scheme of taxation and penalties, earnestly recommend to the friends of the anti-slavery cause, both in the colonies and the mother country, the duty of opposing it by all constitutional means as a gross infringement on the social rights and religious liberty of the emancipated classes, as well as calculated to do the greatest injury to the free schools already established.

Resolved, That this meeting would respectfully, yet urgently, press on the Government the importance of requiring, according to the stipulation of the treaties now existing between this country and Brazil and Spain for the suppression of the slave trade, the emancipation of all slaves who have been illicitly introduced into the territories and colonies of those countries, respectively, as a solemn duty which they owe to international faith, the claims of humanity, and the cause of freedom throughout the world.—National Era.

PENNSYLVANIA HALL.

In accordance with the decision of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, the County Commissioners have paid to the Trustees of the Pennsylvania Hall Association the sum of $27,942 77. The act of partial justice, it is said, will pay the liabilities of the Association and about twenty per cent of the capital stock—the balance being of course lost. It is nine years since the Hall was burnt by a small, but reckless, pro-slavery mob, aided by the cool indifference of the citizen spectators, and the tardy interference of the municipality. The violence then tacitly assented to, has been since imitated, on various occasions of popular outbreak, to the great discredit and cost of our community.

POETRY.

In our research for papers issued in the slave's behalf, following the parliamentary vote, in 1791, which negatived a motion to abolish the slave trade, we met with the following very beautiful poem by one of England's most gifted daughters. Some elegant selections from her writings are given in Frost's British Poets; but this does not appear among them, nor do we believe it can be found in any other American volume. We suppose that to most of our readers it will be as new and acceptable as it was to us.—Eds.

EPISTLE TO WILLIAM WILBERFORCE, ESQ. On the rejection of the bill for abolishing THE SLAVE TRADE.

BY ANNA LETITIA BARBAULD.
(London, J. Johnson, 36, DEC. 30, 1807.)

Cease, Wilberforce, to urge thy generous aim!
Thy Country knows the sin, and stands the shame!
The Preacher, Poet, Senator in vain
Has rattled in her sight the Negro's chain;
With his deep groans assailed her startled ear,
And rent the veil that hid his constant tear;
Fate'd her averted eyes his stripes to scan,
Beneath the bloody scourge laid bare the man,
Claim'd Pity's tear, urg'd Conscience's strong controul,
And flash'd conviction on her shrinking soul.
The Muse, too, soon awak'd, with ready tongue
At Mercy's shrine applaudive peans rung;
And Freedom's eager sons, in vain foretold
A new Astrean reign, an age of gold:
She knows and she persists—Still Afric bleeds;
Uncheck'd, the human traffic still proceeds;
She stamps her infamy to future time,
And on her harden'd forehead seals the crime.

In vain, to thy white standard gathering round,
Wit, Worth, and Parts and Eloquence are found;
In vain, to push to birth thy great design,
Contending chiefs, and hostile virtues join;
All, from conflicting ranks, of power possess
To rouse, to melt, or to inform the breast.
Where seasoned tools of Avarice prevail,
A Nation's eloquence, combined, must fail:
Each flimsy sophistry by turns they try;
The plausible argument, the daring lie,
The artful gloss, that moral sense confounds,
Th' acknowledged thirst of gain that honour wounds:
Bane of ingenuous minds, th' unfeeling sneer
Which, sudden, turns to stone the falling tear:
They search assiduous, with inverted skill,
For forms of wrong, and precedents of ill;
With impious mockery wrest the sacred page,
And glean up crimes from each remoter age:
Wrung Nature's tortures, shuddering, while you tell,
From scoffing fiends bursts forth the laugh of hell;
In Britain's senate, Misery's pangs give birth
To jests unseemly, and to horrid mirth—

Forbear!—thy virtues but provoke our doom,
And swell th' account of vengeance yet to come:
Far, not unmark'd in Heaven's impartial plan,
Shall man, proud worm, condemn his fellow-man?
And injured Afric, by herself redrest,
Darts her own serpents at her Tyrant's breast.
Each vice, to minds deprav'd by bondage known,
With sure contagion fastens on his own;
In sickly languors melts his nerveless frame,
And blows to rage impetuous Passion's flame:
Fermenting swift, the fiery venom gains
The milky innocence of infant veins;
There swells the stubborn will, damps learning's fire,
The whirlwind wakes of uncontrol'd desire,
Sears the young heart to images of woe,
And blasts the buds of Virtue as they blow.

Lo! where reclin'd, pale Beauty courts the breeze
Diffus'd on sofas of voluptuous ease;
With anxious awe, her mental train around,
Catch her faint whispers of half-utter'd sound;
See her, in monstrous fellowship, unite
At once the Scythian, and the Sybarite;
Blending repugnant vices, misall'd,
Which frugal nature purpos'd to divide;
See her, with indulgence to fierceness join'd,
Of body delicate, infern of mind,
With languid tones imperious mandates urge;
With arm recumbent wield the household scourge,
And with unruled mien, and placid sounds,
Contriving torture, and inflicting wounds.

Nor, in their palmy walks and spicy groves,
The form benign of rural Pleasure roves:
No milk-maids' song, or hum of village talk,
Sooths the lone Poet in his evening walk;
No willing arm the flail unwearied plies,
Where the mix'd sounds of cheerful labour rise:
No blooming maids, and frolic swains are seen
To pay gay homage to their harvest queen:
No heart-expanding scenes their eyes must prove
Of thriving industry, and faithful love:
But shrieks and yells disturb the balmy air,
Dumb sullen looks of woe announce despair,
And angry eyes thro' dusky features glare,
Far from the sounding lash the Muses fly,
And sensual riot drowns each finer joy.

Nor less from the gay East, on essenc'd wings,
Breathing unnam'd perfumes, Contagion springs;
The soft luxurious plague alike pervades
The marble palaces, and rural shades;
Hence, throng'd Augusta builds her rosy bowers,
And decks in summer wreaths her smoky towers;
And hence, in summer bow'rs, Art's costly band
Pours courtly splendours o'er the dazzled land:
The manners melt—One undistinguish'd blaze
O'erwhelms the sober pomp of elder days;
Corruption follows with gigantic stride,
And scarce vouchsafes his shameless front to hide:

The spreading leprosy taints ev'ry part,
Infects each limb, and sickens at the heart.
Simplicity! most dear of rural maids,
Weeping resigns her violated shades;
Stern Independence from his globe retires,
And anxious Freedom eyes her drooping fires;
By foreign wealth and British morals chang'd,
And Afric's sons, and India's, smile aveng'd.

For you, whose temper'd ardour long has borne
Untir'd the labour, and unmov'd the scorn;
In Virtue's fasts be inscrib'd your fame,
And utter'd your's with Howard's honour'd name;
Friends of the friendless—Hail, ye generous band!
Whose efforts yet arrest Heaven's lifted hand,
Around whose steady brows, in union bright,
The civic wreath, and Christian's palm unite:
Your merit stands, no greater and no less,
Without, or with the varnish of success;
But seek no more to break a Nation's fall,
For ye have sav'd yourselves—and that is all.
Succeeding times your struggles, and their fate,
With mingled shame and triumph shall relate,
While faithful History, in her various page,
Marking the features of this motley age,
To shed a glory, and to fix a stain,
Tells how you strove, and that you strove in vain.

GOOD BYE.

BY H. W. ELLISON.

Good bye, proud world! I'm going home:
Thou art not my friend, and I'm not thine;
Long through thy weary crowds I roam;
A river ark on the ocean brine,
Long I've been toss'd like the driven foam:
But now, proud world! I'm going home!
Good-bye to Flattery's fawning face;
To Grandeur with his wise grimace;
To upstart Wealth's averted eye;
To supple Office, low and high;
To crowded halls, to court and street;
To frozen hearts and hasting feet;
To those who go and those who come:
Good-bye, proud world! I'm going home.
I'm going to my own hearth-stone,
Beside my green hills alone—
A secret nook in a pleasant land,
Whose groves the frolic fancies planned;
Where arches green, the livelong day,
Echo the black-bird's roundelay,
And vulgar feet have never trod
A spot that is sacred to thought and God.
O, when I am safe in my sylvan home,
I tread on the pride of Greece and Rome;
And when I am stretched beneath the pines,
Where the evening star so holy shines,
I laugh at the lore and the pride of man,
At the sophist schools, and the learned clan,
For what are they all in their high conceit,
When man in the bush with God may meet?

ADVERTISEMENTS.

The Free Produce Store.

The undersigned has now the satisfaction to inform the friends of the Free Produce cause that he has received some very superior fine shirting and allover muslins, bleached and brown, light and heavy; also prints of fine quality, neat styles; and hopes to be able to secure a constant supply of those articles. He has also received a few pieces of fine 6-4 plaid muslins.

A fresh importation of brown sugars of very superior quality just opened, which will be sold at a considerable reduction from former rates.

The attention of housekeepers is particularly invited to his stock of Green and Black Teas, both as to fineness of quality and Bazaar and lowness of price.

GEO. W. TAYLOR.

N. W. corner Fifth and Cherry Sts.

Philadelphia, 5th mo. 29th, 1837.

Free Labour Dry Goods and Groceries,
WHOLESALE AND RETAIL.

Fresh and new goods just received, consisting in part of Shirting and Sheet Muslin, Bleached and Brown.

"Manchester" Glingham of superior quality, various styles.

24 quality do. assorted patterns.

Calico, do. do.

Coloured Cambric and Canton Flannel, assorted colours.

Bleached and Brown do. do. and Table Linen.

Coloured Table Cloth, Imitation of Linnen.

Cotton Hosiery, assorted styles.

Long and Half Hosiery, superior and heavy.

Apron and Family Linen.

Cotton Twilled Pantalon Stoff.

Knitting Cotton, various Nos., Bleached, Brown, and Coloured.

Cotton Laps and Wadding, white and coloured. Also,

Stitching and Chambray Handkerchiefs.

Muslin de Indes, plain and neatly figured, all wash.

Linen, warranted free from cotton.

Refined Lard, Crushed and Polysphered Sugar.

Brown Sugar, good quality, of different grades, by the barrel, bag, or pound.

Sugar House and West India Molasses, good quality.

Rice, Coffee and Chocolate.

Superior Teas, selected with care for family use on strong, viz. Fine Oolong, Souchong and other Black Teas; also, Green Tea of superior quality.

Various Spices and Confectionery, &c. &c. The whole stock exclusively of Free Labour Goods, to which the subscriber would invite the attention of Country Merchants, as well as his friends and the public generally.

GEO. W. TAYLOR.

N. W. corner Fifth and Cherry Sts.

Philadelphia, 5th mo. 29th, 1837.

WANTED, a young man of careful habits and good moral character, who writes a neat business hand, and would be willing to make himself generally useful in a lumber business carried on a few miles from Philadelphia. Compensation moderate. For further particulars, apply to G. W. Taylor, corner of Fifth and Cherry streets.

Life of William Allen.

The subscribers and others in the West who wish to receive copies of the above interesting work will please forward the amount of subscription without delay to the Publisher, stating number of copies, direction, &c. The books will be forwarded to Lemuel Jones, Mount Pleasant, Ohio, and Charles Coffin, Richmond, Ind. 500 pages. Six persons may unite and save one-half by remitting the price of five copies.

HENRY LONGSTRETH.

No. 347 Market street, Philadelphia.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

Edited by ABRAHAM L. PENNOCK, SAMUEL RHOADS, and GEORGE W. TAYLOR, is published on the first of each month, at ONE DOLLAR per annum, for one copy, at FIVE DOLLARS per annum, for six copies.

All communications should be addressed and payments made to the Publisher, George W. Taylor, N. W. corner of Fifth and Cherry sts., Philadelphia. Papers per mail should be endorsed, Non-Slaveholder, Philadelphia.

By decision of the Post Master General, the Non-Slaveholder is subject to newspaper postage only.

PRINTED AT

MERRIHEW & THOMPSON'S BOOK AND JOB OFFICE,
No. 7 Carter's Alley.

THE
NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

"Whoso gives the motive, makes his brother's sin his own."

VOL. II.]

PHILADELPHIA, EIGHTH MONTH, 1837.

[NO. 8.]

COMMUNICATIONS.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

BIBLICAL INVESTIGATIONS.—NO. IV.

The Precept to Noah—continued.

As no stream, by its own power, can rise higher than its fountain, so no translation of Holy Scripture can, of its own authority, establish an obligation which had no existence in the sacred original. I pursue my enquiry as to the import of the precept to Noah and his sons in full view of this truth, and with no desire for any other result than this truth will sustain.

In our last number the amount of knowledge which the Christian world had of this precept, during the many centuries in which they read the Scriptures in the Greek and Latin languages, was shown;—and shown to be adverse to the view that "by man," and "shall be shed," in an injunctive sense, were component parts of it. I proceed in the present number to a consideration of the views developed by modern versions—first withdrawing a suggestion made in the former, that, on the supposition that the expression in the copies whence the Septuagint was taken was בשרו, basem, it was probably the genuine reading. I consider on further reflection that the presence of בשרו, basem, in Samaritan copies written in the ancient Hebrew letter, as well as in Jewish copies written in the Chaldean character, as used by the Jews after the Babylonish captivity, shows basem to have been an ancient reading. Whether the more ancient I leave to the determination of others.

Whilst this reading is confirmed by the Samaritan version in the Aramaean dialect supposed to have been made at a date antecedent to the Christian era, and the Syriac, usually referred to the close of the first or commencement of the second century, the retention of בשרו, and the continued use of the merely indicative form of the future, without any attempt to take either out of their ordinary signification, widens the proof that basem ought to be accepted in the sense of in, and the verb understood according to its simple unstrained indication. This proof is further extended, if the Latin exemplification of the Arabic version made in the tenth century, as found in Bishop Walton's polyglott, is a literal rendering.

The English Protestant and Catholic translations have already been given to the reader. The German version of Martin Luther, the German Catholic, the French of John Calvin, the Italian of John Diodati, and the Spanish Catholic version, contain probably all the remaining important varieties of accepted versions. Of the modern Latin versions we need only refer to the literal interlinear rendering of the Hebrew in the polyglott adverted to, as most appropriate to our enquiry.

The following are intended to be exact English translations of the five intermediately named versions, omitting the reason of the precept common to all.

1. Whoso man's blood sheds, his blood shall also by man be shed.—Luther.
2. Whoso man's blood sheds, that one's blood shall also be shed.—German Catholic.
3. Who will have shed the blood of the man in the man, his blood will be shed.—Calvin.
4. The blood of him who will shed the blood of man will be shed of man.—Diodati.
5. All he that will shed human blood, his blood will be shed.—Spanish Catholic.

The polyglott interlinear translation of the precept is in these words,—Effundens sanguinem hominis in homine sanguis ejus effundetur, quia in imagine Dei fecit hominem; and may be thus literally rendered:—Pouring out (or shedding) the blood of man in man blood of him will be poured out, because in the image of God he has made man.

Luther's German version undoubtedly represents the future of the verb "shed" as indicating an appointed, or, at least, an inevitable retribution, by employing the verb sell, shall, in place of will, become, which denotes the ordinary future. Its rejection of the usual sense of both, using by, instead of in, is characteristic of the bold reformer.

The particle both, occurs twice in the precept in near proximity—and it is agreed on all hands, that its sense in one instance, at least, is in. Why should it not be so in the other? In the remaining parts of the address to Noah and his sons, it occurs fourteen times, in all of which its clear indication is in, and so the Hebrew scholar reads it; though in accommodation to the nicer discriminations, or requirements of the English idiom, the translators have rendered it once into, once therein, twice upon, four times of, once with, and once when. In verse 11th, of the same address, the Hebrew particle translated by, is in. If the sense by existed in the other case, why did not the same particle express it?

To make apparent the extent in which both is used in the primitive sense of in, throughout the Mosaic writings, and the relative claims of secondary significations to an expression by that particle, as also for other purposes of comparison, I have prepared, from a careful examination of the pentateuch, a table, showing the senses in which various Hebrew particles have been rendered by our Protestant translators, which I subjoin; and by which the questionable expression of the sense by, will be more clearly perceived than could be done by a conjecture of the facts short of this research. I have yet, however, to learn that Luther considered the precept to contain, within itself, a distinct commission to man to fulfil, without other divine appointment, its provisions.

The German Catholic version uses the same intense verb sell, as was done in the former, omitting the human agency; but, following the text is a reference to Matthew xxvi. 52, and Revelations xiii. 10, qualifying it, by shewing that in contemplation of the translator, the precept indicated predictively, not legally, the consequence of the offence of one man shedding the blood of another.

Calvin's French version was founded on the opinion that badem had the force of an emphatic amplification, much used in the Hebrew, and by which he supposed the high crime of voluntary homicide might be the better distinguished, and on the conviction that by man was wholly a "forced" construction. In his commentary on the passage, he interprets it in a denunciatory rather than in a legislative way, well observing "that though men are unworthy of his wonderful goodness, the Divine Being doth here reveal the grounds of his care for the sacredness of human life; and most sedulously should the doctrine of this passage be marked, that no person can injure his neighbour, but he injures God: a truth which if men would remember, there would be much less violence in human society."—Calvin, as quoted by Cheever.

Diodati's Italian version uses the term "of man" in a sense probably similar to the expression "among men," by which John Le Clerc rendered it. This distinguished biblical critic in a note on the word says, that if the sense had been per, by, then, "in accordance with the most frequent usage of the Hebrew language, it would have been said biad adam, [בִּידָאָדָם, bid adam,] by the hand of man," yet it is always read baadam, or in or among men; and he views the passage as conveying the idea that "homicides generally suffer a retributive punishment for their crimes, whether they fall into the hands of the laws, or by the just providence of God perish by some violent death."

The Spanish Catholic version is simply indicative of a consequence resulting from the crime of shedding human blood; not assigning that consequence to a divine appointment, except as may be inferred from the reason of the precept which is contrary to such an inference—and not requiring of man its fulfilment, any more than he is required to fulfil a mere prediction, or to bring upon himself the same consequence which the prediction is supposed to assure him, will ever attend the shedding of human blood.

We have no present comment to make upon Bishop Walton's interlinear translation, except this—that any version to be just and true, must be substantially comprehended within its terms.

The translations we have had under consideration disagree in several important particulars. It is not our purpose to magnify or reconcile this difference. It is, however, some evidence of ambiguity in the text that this want of agreement exists. It was a just remark of Schlegel, that "in the writings of Moses, whatever is meant to be a practical law is expressed with the greatest precision." From these translations, brought to the touchstone of this rule, we do not perceive that the precept, in whatever light they present it to us, is such a law as unequivocally imposes upon man the duty of enforcing the solemn consequence it pre-announces. If not to counteract the will of God be our duty, then we are admonished not to put upon the precept a construction contradictory to that holy and ever benignant will as thus expressed through the prophet Ezekiel: "Have I any pleasure at all that the wicked should die? saith the Lord God: and not that he shall return from his ways and live?"

There is no reason to suppose that any difference of views in relation to the right of taking human life in self-defence, including the right of capital punishment as a protective remedy, however disallowed by primitive Christianity, had any influence in producing a difference in the translations of this precept. On the contrary, it is to be presumed that an accordancy in the views of the translators on that subject from Jerome downwards, led them into the common adoption of an error, probably first suggested by the Jewish predilections of Onkelos, of prefixing to the precept a pronoun impersonating the offender. It will be seen on reference to the polyglot interlinear, that there is no counterpart in the original for the "whoso" or other pronominal expression with which the translators introduce their respective versions of the precept—the Hebrew text pointing to the doing of the crime, and not to the criminal. Will it be said that according to the Hebrew idiom the agent is implied, when his act merely is spoken of, and that therefore the introduction of the pronoun is proper? The precision which, according to Schlegel, characterizes the legal annunciations of Moses, is opposed a priori to the suggestion, and the comparative facts elicited by a careful examination of the pentateuch are a conclusive denial of it. In the 103 cases in which whoso, whosoever, whatman-soever, and whatsoever, appear as nominatives in our English translation, their exact counterparts are found in the Hebrew text in 102 instances, and supplied in the other by a connective particle; and in the cases in which He that, is so used, I have found no instance, involving a legal consequence, in which the pronoun was not directly or connectively represented in the original by an equivalent noun or pronoun.

Will it be said that, notwithstanding these facts, an intelligent rendering of the precept demands the adoption of the pronoun in order to make sense of the passage, and that therefore we are authorized to supply it as we are to supply any proven omission? This is to suppose that the spirit of the precept has been rightly ascertained by one or other of the translations which prefix the pronoun. To this suggestion we oppose the important consideration, that in none of these translations are the rule and reason coincident. A true translation, we submit, cannot exist unil-

these are in harmony. In the fact that man was created in the image of God, we can perceive no occasion why the blood of man should ever be shed by man, but we can see abundant reason why the shedding of the blood of man by man shall bring, both upon the individual and the class, blood-guiltiness, and why it should be in figurative effect a shedding of the hallowed blood of Him whose image man bears. The versions I may offer to the reader in my next number will have reference to these consequences, giving, as I finally must, a preference to that which is most purely literal.

ALFRED.

Table showing the English Protestant translation of sundry Hebrew particles in the Pentateuch, with notes.

Rendered	כ	ל	ם	על	כי
In	1658	110	16	73
Into	80	17	1	8
At	71	18	14	21
At, in connection with "hand" (1.) noting accountability or derivation (2.)	0	0	3	0
On	133	17	45	71
Upon	98	13	1	510
Over	22	2	0	89
Above	0	0	7	21
With	320	84	10	46
Among	50	6	5	3
Of	65	261	130	5
For, in the sense of "pro"	72	550	29	84
For, "because"					201
Throughout	21	38	0	0
Through = throughout	1	0	0	0
Through, noting passage (3.)	22	0	1	0
Through, "cause" (4.)	0	0	0	0
Through, "medium" (5.)	5	0	0	0
Against	56	17	2	58
By, noting asseveration (6.)	8	0	0	0
By, "place, time or class" (7.)	42	45	2	76
By, in connection with things, noting various instrumentality	39	18	7	5
By, in connection with "hand" noting personal agency	19	6	1	0
By, in connection with hand in the Hebrew, noting personal agency (8.)	1	0	0	0
By, in connection with persons, noting their agency, but this sense of ב, in each instance, denied (9.)	6	4	2	2
	3816	1209	695	1108	261

Notes.—(1.) Hand, כ, id, implies custody, authority, and power. (2.) Accountability noted, Gen. 9: 5—derivation noted, Gen. 23: 19. (3.) Example through the land, Gen. 12: 6. (4.) Ex. Through ignorance, Lev. 4: 2, 22, 27. (5.) Ex. Through famine, Gen. 41: 36—counsel, Num. 31: 18—a mighty hand, Deut. 5: 15. (6.) Ex. By myself have I sworn, Gen. 22: 16. (7.) Ex. By their names, Gen. 25: 13—the river—41: 32—the way, 42: 35.

day by day, Num. 28: 3. (8.) לֹא יִשְׁכַּח. By the land of Moses, Exod. 9: 35, rendered in the translation "by Moses." (9.) The instances are, 1st, Gen. 9: 6, sense in; 2d and 3d, Num. 12: 2, sense in or with; 4th, Num. 21: 18, sense according to and with; Martin's French bible has the latter, avoiding our supplied words; 5th, Num. 36: 2, occurring in the passage "my Lord was commanded by the Lord," sense of, agreeably to Martin; 6th, Deut. 33: 29, sense in or of.

ALLEN.

To the Editors of the Non-Slaveholder.

The following letter you may consider, if you choose, not to have come from the place whence it professes to have emanated. The moral is just as good whether it represents the case of a single individual, pining in the slave-prison at Baltimore, or the thousands constantly groaning in the greater prison-house of Southern bondage—suffering wrong and degradation by the infidelity of the friends of the slave to the great principles on which they demand his deliverance of others. And yet I think that William Lloyd Garrison would rest feverish on his pillow, did he realize that a single individual was incarcerated in prison on no higher plea of his being the occasion of it, than is contained in this letter, however much he may now rest content with his proportionate contribution to the wrong done to thousands. Of this, will you please let him and your readers be the judges?

Yours for the bondman,

WILLIAM SMITH.

To William Lloyd Garrison.

SLATER'S PRISON, BALT., JULY 4.

Sir,—I write you from this wretched receptacle for the slave, on this boasted day of liberty to the white—but not to the coloured—American. It was within the power of your fidelity to principle to have made me a happy freeman: your disobedience to it has kept me what I am, a hapless slave,—awaiting here the bid of some dealer in human thows, or, that failing to be offered, a shipment by the next packet as an "adventure to New Orleans." Wherever I go, bonds await me! The price demanded for my bones and sinews is their productive value in pounds-weight and money-worth of sugar, rice and cotton!—Users of these goods, what do you bid for me?

I was my master's favoured slave, and thus came to know that he contemplated the liberation of myself and his other slaves. Your paper—will you believe it!—was often in his hands, and I have many times heard him commend you to his friends as a man of noble bearing in behalf of suffering humanity, and above the influence of all feelings of personal convenionce or selfishness—a very example for others. They were more sceptical of your moral position, and when he announced to them his intended purpose of giving us our instant liberation, they were prepared to shew him, upon satisfactory evidence, that to the extent that slavery was convenient to you, you used it,—that you asked of others to do, what you did not exemplify in your own conduct, and that though you cried lustily STOP THIEF, it was but the better to disguise the fact, perhaps to your own conscience, certainly to the perception of others, that at the end of the thief's race, you kept a house for the reception and use of his stolen goods. The information and proof was decisive of our fate. No longer sustained by the beau-ideal he had cherished of your exalted virtue, his own fell to a corresponding point of deep depression, in which a cold, calculating, selfish expediency became his rule of action. We remained his hope-departed slaves. The golden opportunity was passed forever; for, in a few months an unexpected decree in chancery subjected us to seizure and sale; and husbands and wives, and parents and children, were forever severed. I was the purchase of a speculator. On my certainly kind master bidding me a last farewell, his voice choked as he uttered these words: "If I did you wrong, William, in not giving you the freedom to which the feelings of my heart prompted me, your friend did you the greater wrong in not setting me the example of that self-denial which I expected of him—inferior in degree to the self-sacrifice I contemplated, but which was necessary to my confirmation in a virtuous purpose."

Sir,—I am your prisoner!

WILLIAM SMITH.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

Being a few years ago, at the table of a valued minister, (for whose recent removal the church yet deeply mourns,) some one present spoke sneeringly of abstinence from slave produce. I felt tried with the approving smiles which followed, believing that as that abstinence had its origin in conscientious feelings, sneers and ridicule were not the proper weapons with which to meet it, and I asked our noble-minded host,* whether, if the products of slavery were now for the first time to be offered in our markets, any of us would buy them. He seriously replied, after a moment's pause, "No, I think we would not." Other prominent Friends were present, but no one attempted to gainsay it. I have often since thought of that reply, and believe it may be laid down as a truth:—We would not buy or use, knowingly, the productions of slavery, were they now for the first time to be introduced for sale.

*He was one to whom a child might come with an honest difference of opinion, and be certain of a candid and respectful hearing.

How then can the use of them now be right? Custom reconciles it. The practice was handed down to us from our predecessors in religious fellowship, whose memory we love and cherish, and whose faithfulness to their convictions of duty is unquestionable. But we must not receive as certainly correct, all the practices of good men. The first efforts of our society were against importing slaves,—then against trading in them; at length against holding them, and in favour of remunerating those who had been unjustly held in bondage. And yet slaveholding was as essentially sinful,—was as much opposed to truth and justice and holiness, when the discipline of the Society was established, as it was a hundred years afterwards, when the holding of men became a disciplinary offence. I would not try the practices of the men of that time of darkness, in relation to human rights, by the anti-slavery principles of the present day: so I hope to be preserved from improperly judging by the moral standard of a rapidly approaching day, those good men who, battling earnestly against slavery, are now in favour of a commercial union with slaveholders. And yet to my mind, that commercial union, which uses the means of the opponents of slavery to uphold slavery, is scarcely more defensible in a moral point of view, than a similar union with privateers or smugglers. Indeed, of the three offences, I should hold the last, the least.

Now do not condemn me, gentle reader, that I have told thee somewhat of my secret thoughts, but with introverted mind, go down to those still depths where human custom, human passion, human prejudice, lose all their power, and with childlike simplicity, listen to the Pure Teacher. If thou art there encouraged to trade unhesitatingly with the dealers in men,—show me thy better reason. Truth is but one. Let us agree.

S. A.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

The system of slaveholding is guarded and sustained by a great variety of means, and various are the degrees by which these means tend to that end; hence there may be a variety of means employed, each tending in its different degree to uproot the abhorrent system.

The surest or readiest method to destroy a tree is to pluck it up by the roots, though He who prefers cutting off the branches may with untiring perseverance eventually effect the same results. The anti-slavery field is one possessing widely extended labours. It is one inviting all classes, all the different religious denominations, all the different parties of political men, of various degrees of capacity, each to contribute their respective share of labour and influence for the entire overthrow of slavery.

Would it not be irrational to suppose that all these, under every variety of circumstance, and every degree of information upon the subject, (though acting with the same intention,) should employ means of like efficiency? Certainly it would. Then how sparing the friends of abolition ought to be of denunciation and censure one of another, and especially where there is no evidence of impure motives.

Every honest, candid man, will abandon the less efficient mode, on seeing one possessing greater efficiency; then labour is best bestowed in exhibiting the latter to advantage, rather than striving and arguing to render the former valueless. No man wishes to have his house (though a poor one) pulled down while he is yet in it, but erect and offer him a better, and he will readily abandon the first, though years of controversy and argument would not have otherwise effected its vacation. So with the different modes pursued for the abolishment of slavery. Had the professed friends of abolition for years past been sufficiently engaged in seeking out and practically exhibiting the best mode of action for its advancement, and less engaged in accusation and censure one of another, there is no doubt but at this day thousands, who are honestly labouring in lopping off the branches of the corrupt system, would have been engaged with equal perseverance and integrity in laying the axe to the root of slaveholding, by a refusal to purchase the products of the slave's toil. The free and unreserved purchase and consumption of these products, is a positive, practical acknowledgment of the right of the master in the man, whom, under an arbitrary law, he claims to be his property.

Does any man of reflection doubt, that to stop slave-purchasing would be a certain preventative of slave-selling? Certainly not. Then why is not the purchaser of slaves responsible for the sale of human beings and the evils connected with it? That he is, cannot be denied—if acting in full knowledge of all the facts in the case.

Candid reader, canst thou say in sincerity, in view of these plain truths, that it is less self-evident, that to stop the purchase of slave-labour products would be a certain preventative of the sale of such products, than ceasing to purchase slaves prevents the sale of slaves? And if no sale can be made of slave-labour products, is not the main inducement for slaveholding removed? Most certainly. Then wherein is the purchaser and consumer of slave-labour products contributing in a less degree to the holding of slaves and its attendant evils, than the purchaser of slaves is contributing to the slave-trade and its attendant evils? I see no difference. Again, if we tell the slaveholder that he has no moral right to his slave, that his claim is unjust and spurious, he with equal truth may tell us, however unjust and immoral we may declare his right to be to the slave, ours to the proceeds of his unrequited toil is precisely the same.

Reader, let us put the question to ourselves. Ought we not as far as practicable to cease from all participation in this vile system of man's claiming property in his fellow man, if desirous of promoting morality, philanthropy, or Christianity?

Now, if after all these convictions and acknowledgments, we still persist in the free and voluntary use of slave-labour products, do we not fully imitate the man, who "beholdeth himself in a glass and goeth his way, and straightway forgetteth what manner of man he was?"

20th of 7th mo., 1847.

D. I.

For the Non-Slaverholder.

WILLIAM ALLEN.

I take the liberty of offering for insertion the following extract from the Burlington Gazette. Its author is a Presbyterian minister, and it is always pleasant to notice in religious professors a full appreciation of the good which is to be found in other folds. The work referred to is in my estimation one which it would be a pity that any Friend should omit to read, and which will be likely to interest the leading minds of the age, irrespective of sects.

W. J. A.

"THE LATE WILLIAM ALLEN, OF LONDON."

"During the first quarter of this century, there were associated together in London, the most remarkable company of philanthropists, perhaps, whom the world has ever witnessed. 'Instant in season, and out of season,' to promote every object of benevolence—animated by the most fervent love for humanity, and pity for human suffering, this devoted band of heroic, humble men, ceased not, day nor night, to prosecute their mission of peace and good will to men. We love even now with grateful affection, to call over their honored names. There,—first and foremost in every good work,—was the benignant

Wilberforce—the man who awed down by his lofty integrity and consistency of purpose, the ribald scoffers who were prone to vent their sneers at "the honourable and religious gentleman," and made even the most profligate to feel "how awful virtue was." And there, too, was the gay and joyous Granville Sharpe, now singing one of David's psalms to his harp, and now moving all the powers of his age to abolish the infamous traffic in men on the coast of Africa—and beside him was the stout-hearted Buxton and Zachary Macaulay—the venerable Clarkson, now gone to receive his crown, and the good Joseph John Gurney, now gone to be with Clarkson—and Henry Thornton, too, and Forster, and (by no means out of place among so many bearded men) in their midst, we spy the meek face of that angel of mercy, Elizabeth Fry. Among all this group of eminent philanthropists there was none more influential and respected than William Allen. "Let me introduce you," said Wilberforce to Sir James Macintosh in the presence of our townsman, Dr. Grisebach, "Let me introduce you to William Allen; he is a plain Quaker, but he is the best man in London." And well did he deserve such an eulogy, if the biography now before us gives,—as we doubt not it does,—a true portraiture of his character. The first volume of his "Life" has just appeared, and we have seen nothing like it since the delightful memoir of Wilberforce by his sons. In fact there is a strong resemblance between them. The style is the same, being made up of familiar diaries and correspondence. The characters too are very much the same. We are still in the same delightful company. Like Wilberforce, Allen is continually "going about doing good." At one time we find him closeted with a committee of Parliament on the Slave-trade—not another devising with Clarkson and Sharpe some plan for relieving the starving poor of London—another time drawing up, with Gurney and Forster, memorials for peace—and then again, groping through the loathsome prisons with Elizabeth Fry. In all his missions of benevolence he found a most efficient co-worker in our venerable townsman, Stephen Grellet. The name of Mr. Grellet occurs very frequently through the work—often in such pleasant associations as the following:—

"12th month 31st.

"A meeting at six o'clock in the large meeting house, Bishopgate Street, at the request of Stephen Grellet, for the poor of Spitalfields. I accompanied our dear friend, not without some serious apprehensions for the consequences of drawing so many together of such a description of persons. The house was soon quite filled, and great numbers, perhaps some hundreds, stood. Dear Stephen, though at first interrupted with the noise,

THE NON-SLAVERHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, EIGHTH MONTH 1, 1847.

"ON THE SIDE OF THEIR OPPRESSORS THERE WAS POWER!"—We have recently had a verification of this truth in the following gross violations of right:

A Southerner, visiting at the Falls of Niagara, had with him a woman whom he claimed as a slave, but who, according to the laws of the State, as he knew, was a free woman. She was kept secluded—some say confined—under circumstances to induce the belief that she was illegally restrained of her liberty. On the 10th ultimo, he was proceeding to the cars for the purpose of leaving the place, accompanied by the woman under escort of the landlord and one or two other assistants, when a coloured man asked the woman if she wished to go back to the South. Her reply was that she did not. The enquirer was then knocked down, and a contest ensued in which several coloured men were very much injured. Finally the Southerner succeeded in taking the woman with him. In the evening the house of a coloured man was attacked with stones and other missiles. A gun was fired from the house, when the house and property in it, and one or two other houses occupied by coloured persons were entirely destroyed!

The barque Lembranca, Capt. La Caze, arrived at New York having on board a female servant, a cook, and a seaman, all slaves, and belonging to the Captain. On application of some humane friends, Judge Daly, of the Court of Common Pleas, issued a writ of habeas corpus requiring the captain to produce them, which he did on the 12th ultimo—his counsel submitting a protest, by the Brazilian consul, to the effect that the slaves belonged to Brazilian subjects, and were property lawfully acquired in Brazil; and that the Brazilian government would hold ours responsible for the loss of property in question, to the extent of its full value.

The return to the writ admitted the facts in regard to the persons being slaves, but rested for defence on the 12th section of the treaty with Brazil, which pledges the contracting parties to give their "special protection to the persons and property of all classes in the jurisdiction of each residing therein." For the slaves, the counsel, John Hopper, Esq., in reply, admitted the facts set forth in the return, but denied their sufficiency to cause the detention of the slaves, and moved for their discharge under the statute of 1840, which expressly says: "All slaves hereafter was favored to deliver a very impressive address, and stood about an hour and a half. He was afterwards engaged in supplication, followed by E. J. Fry."

"One of the most attractive portions of the volume to us is the account of the Emperor Alexander's visit to the Friends' Meeting, in company with William Allen. The modest Quaker tells us with charming simplicity how he "walked at a respectful distance before the Emperor and showed him and the two Dukes to a seat fronting the meeting—the Duchess preferring the first cross form on the women's side"—and how "the meeting remained in silence about a quarter of an hour, in which time my mind was sweetly calmed and refreshed"—and how "Richard Phillips then stood up, with a short, but respectable address to the meeting, and soon after John Wilkinson was engaged in explaining the effects of vital religion, beautifully applying the text, 'He is their sin and their shield.' After he sat down, John Bell uttered a few sentences, and John Wilkinson sweetly concluded in supplication."

"But we have no time or space to enumerate all the striking portions of this most agreeable biography, which contains every variety of information and reminiscence. For Mr. Allen is not merely a philanthropist, visiting schools, and establishing charity soup houses. He is a man of science, discussing galvanism with Davy, and reading papers before the Royal Agricultural Society. He is a man of letters too,—and a traveler throughout all Europe, giving very lively sketches of his pilgrimage. We are impatient to see the second volume—for in reading the first, we have had what good Mr. Allen himself calls, "a solid, satisfactory time." In laying aside this beautiful record of a good man, we could not but say with James Montgomery—

"Servant of God! well done;
Rest from thy loved employ;
Thy battle fought, thy victory won,
Enter thy Master's joy;
The pains of death are passed,
Labor and sorrow cease;
And, life's long warfare closed at last,
Thy soul is found in peace."

Burlington, July 12.

T. L. C.

[We took an early opportunity to express the high gratification we derived from a perusal of the Life of William Allen, on the first appearance of the London copy in this country. The first volume of a handsome American edition has been just issued, and may be had at the book store of the publisher, Henry Longstreth, 347 Market St., or at the Friends' Bible Depository, 50 N. Fourth St., Philadelphia. The second, which will be the concluding volume, will appear in about a month hence. We cannot but commend the publication to the well deserved notice and patronage of our readers and friends.—Editors.]

brought into this State shall be free." After a short hearing on the general merits of the case, in which the venerable Isaac T. Hopper took an active part, the further hearing was postponed.

The parties again appeared on the 14th, when, according to the Tribune, the following proceedings ensued:

"On Mr. Parroy making a return the previous day, he wished Messrs. Hopper, who appeared on behalf of the slaves, to demur or plead to it, but they did not consider it necessary to do either. They saw that the captain admitted the parties to be slaves, and supposed that to be sufficient for their purpose; and they admitted the facts set forth in the return to be correct, with the exception of the Treaty, with which they were unacquainted. Mr. Parroy yesterday got them to endorse such admission on the return. Mr. P. then presented his views, in which he referred to several decisions in favor of his point, and also read from portions of the Treaty. He was replied to by Mr. Moffat, a layman, on behalf of the slaves.

"The return of the Captain states, that the two men form part of the crew, were regularly shipped as such in Brazil, and, as a portion of the crew, came emphatically within the terms of the treaty, and the Captain is entitled to retain them. Mr. Moffat contended that the shipping articles should be produced, and proof gone into to show the fact. This, however, Mr. Parroy contended the admission of the return would not permit, as Mr. H., for the slaves, had acknowledged that they were part of the crew.

"Judge D. intimated that there is a case in Wendell where parties of the kind were discharged as slaves, and then committed as deserters, on account of forming part of the crew.

"The court then held the case for advisement and decision."

On the 17th, Judge Daly, denying a motion of John Jay, Esq., in behalf of the slaves, for a rehearing of the argument, decided that the slaves should be given up to the custody of their master—the men on the ground of the admission by their counsel (which he held bound them!) that they formed part of the crew, legally shipped, and the woman because she stated that she had not been deprived of her liberty. The slaves were then returned to the vessel, the men placed in irons, to prevent them from escaping, and two policemen stationed on board to assist the captain, should it be necessary, in securing them!

Some further proceedings have been instituted in the hope of changing this disastrous issue, but we are without particulars. If the decision of Judge Daly is to be accepted as sound law, foreign slaveholders can institute slavery within the precincts of the free States, in defiance of their civil institutions and of natural right, whilst slaveholders of our own country, bringing their slaves within the territorial jurisdiction of those States, will by such act forfeit all legal right of ownership in them—whatever aid they may else obtain in recovering their forfeited property.

ISAAC BROWN AND HIS JAILOR.—In bold relief to the discouraging circumstances we have just related, we present to the view of our readers the independent course of the Grand Inquest of Philadelphia County, in ignoring a bill presented to them, by order of the Court, against the jailor of the county for aiding the escape of a prisoner, founded on the fact of his having surrendered him to the Sheriff under a writ de homine replegiando issued out of the Supreme Court, without awaiting the direction of the Court which committed him.

The prisoner, Isaac Brown, was probably an absconding slave, and the sinister motive for his arrest, his re-capture. He was committed, however, in pursuance of a warrant from the Governor of the State, on demand of the Governor of Maryland, directing his seizure and return to the judicial authority of that Commonwealth, as a fugitive from its justice.

During the pendency of some proceedings in the court, enquiring into the sufficiency of the warrant for his delivery, the Governor issuing it, upon the recommendation of his legal adviser, the Attorney General, recalled it, so that his commitment became null and void, and his longer detainment an injustice. It was at this period that the writ was resorted to in order to effect his enlargement, the court having adjourned without directing it. To have waited any mode of delivering the prisoner less prompt than the one resorted to, would have been to subject him to the hazard of other measures being adopted, known to be in progress, and which probably would have issued in his re-enslavement. The method adopted was, therefore, alike prompted by Justice and Humanity.

The Court, in its charge to the Grand Jury, entered into an elaborate consideration of the case presented by the delivery of the prisoner without the intervention of the authority committing him, as involving "an utter prostration of all legal process"—a verity that the jailor should "have told the Sheriff when he came to the prison door, that he held the prisoner on a commitment issued by a judge of this Court on a criminal charge," (1) when "that officer would have gone his way, and so returned upon his writ, which would have been a performance of his duty and a sufficient legal return;"—and earnestly urging upon the jury the duty of finding a bill against the jailor for delivering up the prisoner, and so allowing his escape. The following article, taken from the Liberty Herald, a new and spirited anti-slavery journal, will show the action of the jury in the case:

JUDGE, JAILOR AND JURY IN A JAM.—It will be recollected that Judge Parsons of the Court of Quarter Sessions for this city and county, ordered the prosecution of the keeper of the prison for delivering Isaac Brown to the Sheriff in obedience to a writ of the Supreme Court, whereby the prisoner effected his escape from an illegal imprisonment. The pretence of an imputed crime upon which he was arrested, was a mere fraud. The real design was to recapture him and carry him again into Hope Slatter's slave-pen in Baltimore. The Judge, however, under his own views of law and order, held the jailor to answer for this offence, and took some pains to procure a finding against him by the grand jury. The judge insisted to the jury that the writ on which Brown was released, by its very terms excluded all persons from its benefits who are held on a criminal charge, but he forgot to mention that Brown was not so held. He was in jail—in legal freedom—in a clear interval between one warrant which the Governor had vacated, and another which Judge Parsons intended to issue, and so he slipped out of the clutches of the man-thieves. The grand jury understood all this perfectly well, and accordingly confined their inquiries to the point of ascertaining the prosecutor, that they might put the costs upon him; but as they could not settle it with certainty that the Judge could be so regarded while acting in his office upon the bench, they contented themselves with ignoring the bill unanimously.

FREDERICK DOUGLASS.—We published two months since an account of the gross injustice done to this estimable man, in depriving him of his purchased right to a cabin passage in the ship Cambria. This conduct was in strong contrast with the fact that during the nineteen previous months, his distinguished talents, his amiable manners and his high moral worth had given him a ready admission into the best English society. It was only when he came under commercial influences, that his colour was discovered to be a sufficient reason, not for denying to him, in advance, the right to acquire a conveyance in the ship on the advertised terms of passage, but for breaking a solemn contract already entered into, and ratified by the payment and acceptance of his money, and the delivery to him of his berth certificate. This sacrifice of veracity, honour, honesty, was made at the shrine of the American trade! Our readers will be glad to see in the letter we have taken from the British Friend, written since his return to America, the evidence of his Christian bearing and unsubdued moral firmness under the infliction of this outrageous wrong.

FREE PRODUCE MOVEMENTS IN GREAT BRITAIN.—We derive from various sources the information that the duty of dissuading the productions of slavery, and of substituting for them the products of free industry, continues to be faithfully urged on the attention of the British people by distinguished abolitionists in Great Britain. Among the labourers in that cause, we are happy to know, is one of our own countrymen, now on a mission of love to that country, whose enlarged mind, and quick perception of what is true and just, have led him to its advocacy, and whose acceptance with the people in other respects has given him a peculiar access to them in this relation. To the enterprise is indeed opposed a vast amount of selfish, and even conservative, feeling; but, faithfully sustained by its heralds, the Truth must be onward.

We are glad to find that at a meeting on the subject of Slavery, held at Friends Meeting House, in Grace Church Street, London, during the week of London Yearly Meeting, the subject of the disuse of the products of slavery, formed a prominent consideration. The amount of slavery, it was shown by the speakers, was contingent on the demand for its products, and so proven by the lamentable fact that the opening of the British ports to the slave sugars of Brazil and Cuba had largely increased the price of slaves, the price of lands, and the African slave-trade. The slave-trade, it was shown, could not be abolished by any naval or military equipments—were they morally allowable—whilst the cupidity which engendered the trade was fed by a commercial demand for the products of the labour of its victims, overpaying the risks of the trade. The duty, thence following, of meeting the system by countervailing operations in favour of free labour, was forcibly, and, we should judge, convincingly urged, and the practicability of making those countervailing movements illustrated by the exhibition of various articles of merchandise, made exclusively of free cotton—the produce of British India, where there was an ample territory for its cultivation, wanting but the moral impulse which should demand it—the number and variety of which articles it was said, would be shortly increased. The meeting is represented to have listened with deep, and, we doubt not, profitable attention to the statements made to them.

The conviction presses upon us, that the concern which has for its object the substitution of free for slave labour, is not to be limited to a particular community, or locality, but is to be wide spread, among all considerate classes, throughout all parts of the nation, depending much, it may be, on the fidelity now of a few. The extensiveness of that feeling would undoubtedly be greatly promoted, and its purpose accomplished at an earlier period than the most sanguine now look to, by the discovery of some new facilities within the wide range of the British Empire for the growing of the best cotton with the greatest advantage. We look with much hope at the indication of a feeling likely to be got up in Glasgow on this subject; if the facts set forth in the following extract of a letter, published a few days since in the North American, prove to be accurate.

"Ireland is not the only over-peopled land in these old countries which it is proposed to relieve by colonization—not Canada the only region whose wilds it is intended to reclaim by the outflowing of a surplus population. A plan is now proposed by Dr. Lang, 'Senior Minister of the Presbyterian Church, and Member of the Legislative Council of New South Wales,' which promises to relieve Scotland, benefit Australia, and, indirectly, to influence America. Dr. Lang has travelled in cotton-growing countries, the Brazils, the Southern United States, and he lived 25 years in Australia. He finds in North Eastern Australia from 30° south lat. to the tropic of Capricorn, the same range of latitude as Egypt in the Northern Hemisphere, an immense tract equally—or better—capable of producing Cotton as the Carolinas; and inconceivably superior in point of salubrity of climate, while it is unsurpassed in the world for bays, estuaries, rivers, &c., all navigable by steamboats. He proposes that Glasgow—where the cotton from this tract has been pronounced 'a very valuable kind, which, if imported in quantity, would readily bring from 11d. to 1s. per lb.'—should send out some five or six thousand of the destitute they are now supporting, as a beginning; and he has little doubt but that they would produce a better article than the cotton of the Brazils, and by this free labor, drive your American slave-produce article out of the market. The experiment succeeding, there would be a comfortable settlement for the industrious but destitute of Britain: an ample supply of raw material for British manufactures; and, Dr. Lang is confident, 'it would tend more directly and more effectually than all the abolitionist and evangelical agitation to give ultimate freedom to the American slave.' To prove all this the doctor has prepared a book which is to be soon published, and meanwhile is to deliver some lectures in Glasgow—to prove that it is the best means of affording remunerating and permanent employment to the destitute of home,—will provide a superior article for our manufactures, much cheaper, being perennial—as it is in India and Egypt—and by underselling America, not only in cotton, but other articles of tropical produce, 'slavery will be extinguished as a matter of course, being no longer either profitable or remunerative.' In what way the experiment will be made, and if made, with what success, is a problem yet to be solved."

LETTER OF A NEW ORLEANS MERCHANT.—We cannot but contemplate with feelings of burning indignation the cold, business-like complacency with which the following letter was written. We derive the document from a source of unquestioned authenticity, else we should not have dared to have entered on our pages what we consider to be a libel on our common human nature; usual as we believe such papers to be, and necessary as we suppose they are to the existence of that vile system which makes goods and chattels of men. It strikes us as being among the highest evidences of our wretchedly fallen nature, not so much that a man shall commit crime under the impulse of some sudden gust of passion, as that he shall deliberately set down to contrive and plan it. This is the condemnation of the writer of the letter before us—that he deliberately prostituted the talents and faculties he largely possessed to the base purpose of suggesting ways and means by which a conversion of his fellow men into articles of commerce might be most efficiently and gainfully secured!

And yet what instigated him to this deprecation of those talents and faculties? Did it result from the spontaneous impulses of a wicked heart—or was it partly and greatly instigated by the wickedness of the world without him? We believe the latter. Without the connivance of that world there was no motive to action. The electric chain by which motive was conveyed to him, was held at the other end by the users of the products of that labour which this commerce existed to furnish.

Copy of a Letter written by John Clay, Esq., Merchant of New Orleans, to Theodore Mansfield, on the subject of a Negro Trade from Maryland or Virginia to Louisiana.

New Orleans, 10th February, 1800.

MR. THEODORE MANSFIELD.

Dear Sir,—Agreeable to my promise made to you in our several conversations on the subject of a negro speculation in Maryland and Virginia, I now undertake to give you the outlines of advantages and profits which would result from the purchase of negroes in those places, and bringing them to Louisiana for sale. Since this law has expired, which permitted the introduction of negroes into the Carolinas, a negro trade from Virginia and Maryland must be attended with great profit.

I have had several cargoes sent to me for sale within the last four months, which were involved at average $225 in Virginia. The sales which I effected of them here, and which were nearly all prompt payments, averaged $450 per head; the freight and other charges inclusive did not exceed more than $60 per head; so that there was a profit produced of upwards of seventy per cent.

This country would now, although labouring under the disadvantages of a restricted commerce, justify the introduction of several thousand negroes, owing to the valuable exports which are raised for sale, and many of the planters have been laying up their funds for the express purpose of purchasing negroes.

Should commerce open, the advantages resulting from a negro trade are incalculable, and, of course, the prices which might be obtained here would far exceed those I have quoted. If your friend, Mr. T., from this sketch, should be induced to go into the trade, I would recommend him to Norfolk in Virginia, and by laying down one-fourth of the purchase money, he would be enabled to obtain a credit of 6 and 12 months for the residue.

By advancing $10,000, and in the purchase of young negroes from 9 to 24 years of age, this capital in the course of three voyages would produce to him a profit of $50,000. If Mr. Turner should not undertake this trade, perhaps you might induce some other merchant of capital to go into the speculation.

If it is undertaken by any of your friends, and you are charged with it, I would recommend you to give me early advice, that I may make contracts and engage purchasers for the slaves.

I give you a list of prices which I have sold negroes at here recently, and which will govern you in the prices which you might offer in Virginia. If negroes bring those prices under the present limitations in commerce, what must they do when it becomes free?

Wishing you a pleasant voyage,

I remain, dear Sir, your friend,

(Signed) JOHN CLAY.

A girl, 7 years old, sold for	300.	Cost in Va.	100
" 9 " " "	450.	"	175
A boy, 9 " " "	450.	"	200
A man " " "	550.	"	275
" " " "	600.	"	300
Two families, viz.:
2 men,
2 women and
5 children,	1900.		1005

14 in all. Sold for 4250.

Cost 2055

Some calculations on the profits of a negro trade from Virginia and Maryland to Louisiana, made from the preceding letter, together with some remarks on that trade.

It appears that from actual sales made at New Orleans, that 14 negroes sold there for $4250. And that those 14 negroes cost $2055

To which add for freight and other charges, as stated in said letter, at $60 per head average, 840

In whole, 2895

Leaving a profit on 14 of Or 66 per cent on first cost. $1355

Thus, 100 negroes, say assorted as quoted herein, would cost in Virginia, $14,678 57 And would sell, say for 30,357 14

Leaving a balance of $15,678 57 From which deduct $60 per head for freight and other charges, 6,000 00

$9,678 57

But on still following the statement made by Mr. Clay as to the terms of credit on which they are to be purchased in Virginia, and the profit on the cash actually engaged in the voyage would become immense.

Thus, as before stated, 100 negroes cost in Virginia $14,678 57, for three-fourths of which you are to have a time of 6 and 12 months, on paying one-fourth down, makes your cash actually advanced, 3,669 64

And the profit remains the same as before stated, viz. $9,678 57 Which is a profit of 263 per cent.

Note.—The principal on which this is grounded would perhaps be incorrect in common transactions, but it is presumed it is not so in this, as in fact the fourth part advanced in cash is all the capital actually employed in the business, as, on a voyage of this nature, the proceeds of the cargo would be in hand a long time before the expiration of the credit of 6 and 12 months.

Some Observations on a Negro Speculation from Maryland or Virginia to Louisiana.

From the enormous prices the planters have obtained the last season for their sugars, viz., from 9 to 11 dollars per cwt., when the usual prices have been about 6 dollars, it may be naturally concluded that much greater quantities of land will this season be laid down in cane, which must tend to enhance the price of slaves very considerably, as a much greater number of negroes are required for the culture of the cane than are needed on a plantation of the same number of acres in cotton.

Whenever the trade of the United States is restored to its accustomed activity, the cotton plantations in that country must have a rapid increase, which will also require more slaves, as the culture of this plant is known to be very profitable; and the tobacco trade, as well as the various other productions of that country, being now on a rapid increase, and the resources almost inexhaustible must always warrant the introduction of a large number of slaves into that country, and must always insure great prices for them. The only way under the present laws of the Union prohibiting the introduction of slaves into the United States by which they get supplied, is from Virginia or Maryland, from both which states they are permitted to be exported, although it is believed the same permission is not granted by the legislative authority of the Carolinas or Georgia.

The introduction of negroes from Africa to Louisiana not being permitted by law, there is little or no chance of smuggling them into the country; in fact, the situation of the land at and about the mouth of the Mississippi, almost renders a plan of that nature chimerical, for about 80 miles from the entrance of the river you find but one settlement, viz., the Balize, where are a few houses devoted solely to the accommodation of the pilots and officers of the custom house stationed there, whose duty it is to board every ship entering the river, and to seize her if she is found infringing the laws of her country. After passing this place, the country is uninhabitable by man or beast, being on each side of the river, nothing but a deep morass, and covered with an almost impenetrable growth of weeds springing up from the mud and water, until you come to the fort at Plaquemine, about 36 miles from the mouth of the river, where the first settlements begin; and at which fort you are obliged to come to and submit to an examination by the commanding officers, where you are again liable to seizure, unless your papers, &c., are perfectly regular. In addition to which you will probably be boarded in the river frequently by gun boats or revenue cutters, so that it is almost impossible to succeed in an attempt of the kind.

The negroes also from the states are usually preferred to those direct from Africa, or as they are called new negroes, because they are more inured to the toils of slavery; they are in some measure habituated to the labours of the field, and they are purchased with more confidence, as their characters are already framed, and usually designated in their certificates from their former masters. Even in prosecuting this trade from Virginia a great deal of care is necessary to avoid the risque of seizure, and consequently of condemnation, as it is necessary to have each individual slave entered, and the vessel furnished with regular papers from the Collector of the port you may sail from. The last winter several vessels were seized and condemned for want of this necessary precaution, and one in particular belonging to Philadelphia was condemned for having only one slave on board, although she was a servant to a passenger, yet not being regularly cleared at the Custom House, the vessel was actually condemned. From what I have observed on the coast, I believe it may be concluded that the American planters in general prefer the Maryland negroes when they are to be had, but the French planters, which are by far the most numerous, do not make any difference between those of Maryland or Virginia. It would be as well, however, in an undertaking of the kind, to have some from each state.

Although negroes who are imprisoned for some crime may frequently be purchased much lower than others, yet I should not think it an advisable thing to do, as they would undoubtedly command a more ready sale and better prices when furnished with characters from their former masters, which is a thing that ought by all means to be attended to; and the procuring of which it is presumed would not be difficult, as those who wish to sell will generally not be averse to giving a character, and perhaps sometimes may give them a better one than they deserve.

Was it intended to prosecute a trade of this kind, I should think it would be well to adopt the following mode: let the person charged with the management of it go to Maryland and Virginia, as far as Norfolk, by land, buying as many as he could on the route, or on the eastern shores of those two states, contracting to have them delivered in Norfolk, provided that was the port from which the expedition should sail, and to avoid the expense of having a vessel employed while they were collecting, and before they were ready for embarkation; a vessel might be sent on for the purpose after this agent had commenced his operations, or one might be chartered in Norfolk, as might be deemed most advantageous. It would be well to establish a credit in Norfolk or Baltimore, or perhaps in both, for the purpose of drawing on either one place or the other for those slaves which might be obtained in the country. It might also be calculated, that the freight which might be made out occasionally, independent of the negroes, would nearly or quite defray the expenses of the vessel on the voyage; perhaps a good brigantine of 180 or 200 tons, with two

SELECTIONS.

ORIGINAL LETTER OF ANTHONY BENEZET.

Through the kindness of an esteemed friend, we are put in possession of an original letter of Anthony Benezet, and make no apology for giving our readers a copy of it:

PHILAD<sup>a</sup> y<sup>e</sup> 14th 6th mo., 1758.

DEAR FRIEND:

The acct. of a number of Indians having past the Delaware, was yesterday confirmed by a letter dated fort Allen, wrote by Charles Thompson; so that we may expect to hear of the Destruction of numbers of our Back Inhabitants which is very afflicting to a sympathizing mind, and naturally leads, with deep concern, to consider the neglect which so much prevails amongst your politicians, with respect to Indian Affairs. Your declaration of war against the Indians is still in force, which joined to the mutinous and wrathful Dispositions of your back Inhabitants, may occasion their being guilty of some rash and cruel Act: Should they endeavour to destroy the people and settlement, now making, at Wicomico, of which I am not without fear, the consequences might be dreadful both to your Province and this.

When I was last at Easton I was told by french Margaret that the Minisink Indians had done the most mischief and I understood were the most averse to peace with y<sup>e</sup> English, which has since been confirmed to me by y<sup>e</sup> chief amongst y<sup>e</sup> Montvians, and indeed, I believe, those people have been greatly abused both by your and our back Inhabitants, in several Respects, more especially in y<sup>e</sup> settlement of their lands, for which, I doubt they have received little or no consideration. I cannot find that they had any representative, nor that any inquiry was [made] on your behalf when your Commissioners met the Indians at Crosswicks this spring tho' I apprehend them to be the greatest number and most able to do mischief than any other Indians which y<sup>e</sup> Prov<sup>ce</sup> is concerned with. They have been mistakenly looked upon as a Branch of y<sup>e</sup> Delawares, and so have not been particularly considered in y<sup>e</sup> sale of Land, and yet I believe received no part of y<sup>e</sup> consideration from y<sup>e</sup> Delawares; for I see by y<sup>e</sup> treatise that they were looked upon by y<sup>e</sup> Delawares as a separate nation under their own king. I understand Charles Read proposes to get your Indian Commissioners to meet next second day at Trenttown to consider what is expedient to be done; if some of the Burlington Friends were present, I am apt to think there would be more likelihood of matters being stocks, would be as good a vessel as could be employed in this business, but this might be fixed at any time.

As the constituted authorities of New Orleans permit no Spanish ship to ascend the Mississippi, even to their own settlements on that river, no slaves can be introduced to Louisiana by that channel.

FREE LABOUR PRODUCTS.—At the suggestion of our correspondent, D. T., we may state, that so far no difficulty, other than some extra labour, care and expense, has been encountered by the Free Produce Association of Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, in procuring cotton, the product of free labour exclusively, in the newly settled districts, where the planter, though owning the land, has no capital to invest in slaves. The Association has rendered some assistance to such, in furnishing gins to be paid for in cotton. Sugar and coffee are obtained from the British West Indies and from the Northern Republics of South America. It is hoped that increased facilities will ere long be added for obtaining those articles and some others from other places. Molasses can be had from the British West Indies, though not without an advance on the price over a similar article of slave produce. The supply of rice raised by free labour is quite limited, as to any channels yet opened for procuring it. Small quantities are raised by the poorer people in North Carolina. There are ample rice lands in South Eastern Virginia, we are informed by a Friend, who recently visited those parts, from whence a full supply may be obtained for our Free Produce Store, should any free persons be found willing to cultivate it. Of this, however, we entertain some doubts, since corresponding with several Friends residing there. We may say, once for all, to all friends of the Free Produce cause, that they may rely on the goods of whatever kind kept at the Free Produce Store, N. W. corner of 5th and Cherry streets, in this city, as being uncontaminated with slave labour.

THE MEMORY OF THE JUST IS BLESSED.—We revive the memorial of Benjamin Bates of Virginia, in especial reference to the fragment relating to Slavery and War. We believe that it is only as the followers of the Prince of Peace are engaged to let their lights shine before men that they can expect to have any agency in hastening and extending His reign. The memorial briefly relates the life and death of a pious and exemplary man. Some of our readers will possibly add to it the ejaculation—"Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his!"

effectually looked into. Certainly Time calls for a strict inquiry into y<sup>e</sup> situation of your Indians in General, more especially y<sup>e</sup> Minisink Indians. The Proclamation of war being still in force, is also a material point to be considered as well that all possible care be taken to prevent your back Inhabitants from taking any inconsiderate step which may continue and increase y<sup>e</sup> enmity between us and the Indians. I remain in haste but with affectionate love to you all, thy Fr<sup>d</sup>.

ANTHONY BENEZET.

For John Smith, at Burlington.

TESTIMONY OF THE UPPER QUARTERLY MEETING OF VIRGINIA CONCERNING BENJAMIN BATES, DECEASED.

Our beloved friend Benjamin Bates having terminated a life of active usefulness, both in civil and religious society, we feel our minds engaged to preserve some testimony concerning him, not only as a tribute due to his memory, but as transmitting to posterity a worthy example, and a commemoration of that divine preserving power which influenced the tenour of his life and forsook him not at his death.

He was born at Skirmens, in York county, the 10th day of 12th month, 1769, having a birthright and education in our religious society. In his minority, he received a very limited school education; but being endued with active mental powers, and having a turn for literary pursuits, he applied himself with success to the study of various branches of science. Being thus furnished with qualifications and the employment suiting his turn of mind, he engaged in the business of tuition, in which he continued many years, discharging the duties of his profession with reputation, and generally securing the affection of those who were placed under his care. But we may here remark, that his mind was not involved in temporal engagements so as to become diverted from the more important business of life,—a preparation for the world to come,—but as he yielded to the impressions of heavenly goodness, extended in the morning of his days, he found a principle of preservation near, and his understanding becoming enlarged in divine things, he was gradually qualified for singular usefulness in religious society, wherein he filled many important stations. With the general approbation of Friends, he served the Monthly, Quarterly, and Yearly Meeting as Clerk, for a number of years, and was frequently employed in writing on behalf of the Society, and in preparing the written communications of the meeting to which he belonged.

Among the records of the Yearly Meeting, which he had been employed in collecting and arranging, a loose paper, in his hand-writing, was found, in which he expresses himself in the following manner.

"On taking a view of the records it will be seen, that although many, and indeed the greater part of Friends in this country were concerned in Slavery, its inconsistency was early acknowledged, and testimonies were borne against the inhuman practice, and however small this branch of our religious testimony was, in its first appearance, and slow in its progress, it continued, through the divine blessing, still to go on, through every difficulty and discouragement, at length obtaining a triumphant prevalence in the Society. We believe the light held up by Friends, in discharging their various duties in relation to this subject, has been extensively felt and acknowledged, and that it affords encouragement to persevere in this and all other branches of their religious testimonies. Should the total eradication of this crying evil be effected, and another of great magnitude, the prevalence of war, should cease (and who can limit the power of the Almighty?)—should the followers of the Prince of peace, be so engaged to let their lights shine before men, that his reign may be hastened and extended in the earth, when the destructive weapons of war shall be beaten into the useful instruments of husbandry, then will generations yet unborn, on reviewing the progress and final prevalence of these testimonies, glorify our Father who is in heaven."

In a private capacity also, both by letters and in conversation, as occasions occurred, he zealously and ably defended the general doctrines of the Gospel, as well as those testimonies which have peculiarly devolved upon us to hold up to the world.

In the various duties of private life he was exemplary; as a son he was assiduously dutiful; as a husband he was affectionate and kind. He exercised authority over his children and family more by the influence of persuasive love than by rigid commands, and the mildness of his manners, and the usefulness his life, engaged the love and esteem of a numerous acquaintance of various ranks and denominations.

In an early stage of his disorder, he desired those who were present with him to leave the room except his wife, and his brother Fleming, to whom in a clear, calm, and impressive manner, he expressed a prospect that he should not survive the present illness. He then proceeded to give instructions relative to his affairs and the care of his children, in the event of his death. On being requested by his wife and brother to send for a physician, he replied, "I submit to do what you judge best, but think not I am solicitous about the event; my mind is resigned to the Divine will." Soon after this the violence of the fever so affected his head, that his understanding became much weakened, yet he had some clear intervals, and continued much in a state of serenity of mind, and lively tenderness of spirit, wherein he often expressed sentiments of piety and love. In the latter stage of his illness, while the symptoms were assuming an appearance of extreme violence, he appeared to be engaged in solemn prayer. He continued speaking with great earnestness for a considerable time, but his speech was generally unintelligible till the conclusion, when he distinctly uttered the name of the blessed Redeemer, with Amen and Amen. A tremour and strong convulsions coming on, he appeared to sink under them; his breathing ceased, and dissolution seemed to have taken place, but he again revived, though the spasms continued to return at intervals for some hours, when he became calm and his reason returned. He then melted into tenderness, and affectionately embraced his friends. His son Micajah being present, he called him to his bed, took him by the hand, and said, "my dear son, take heed to thy ways and refrain thy feet from evil."

He continued in this tender frame of mind for some time, till his debility greatly increasing, he fell asleep, from which he awaked no more, but quietly passed away the 12th day of the 12th month, 1812, aged about 43 years.

DEACON GILES'S DREAM.

INTRODUCTION.

In an address to the Mayor and Corporation of the town of Galway, in 1584, Sir John Perrot, the Lord Deputy of Ireland, "among other articles touching reformation in the commonwealth," advised, "That a more straiter order be taken to bar the making of aqua vitæ of corn than hitherto hath been used, for that the same is a consumption of all the provision of corn in the commonwealth;" and he said, "That the aqua vitæ that is sold in towne ought rather to be called aqua mortis to poyson the people, than comfort them in any good sorte, and in like manner byre and all wherein the officers in reforming the same have neede to be more vigilant and inquisitive than they be."

Ireland, now happily regenerated, was thus cursed with distilleries, converting the staff of life into the waters of death, long before the Pilgrim fathers set their feet upon the rock of Plymouth. The people were "mad upon their idols." Magistrates viewed with fearful apprehensions the waste of the means of feeding the population and the waste of public morals, public health and human life, by that bewitching beverage called aqua vitæ, but which they even then properly denominated "poyson."

By means of the distillery, ardent spirit, or alcohol, described as "a thin, colourless fluid, lighter than water, somewhat volatile, of a pungent smell and taste, readily inflamed by the application of a lighted taper, and burning with a dim blue or purple flame,"—a fluid produced only by the decomposition of animal and vegetable productions in state of fermentation,—is separated from all other substances passed off in the form of vapour, and by a cooling process converted into a liquid poison. It is originally the intoxicating principle of all fermented drinks, as wine, cider, beer, etc.; and, as separated by the distillery, is known as alcohol, or pure spirit. Could it have remained hidden to the end of the world, in the fermented mass, happy would it have been, for the successive generations of men.

Its mildness, as combined with the native juices of the grape and the apple, could have done but comparatively little evil. It is manifest that most of the drunkenness of antiquity proceeded not from purely fermented drinks, but from their combination with drugs, whose poisonous nature soon overthrew the strongest constitutions. When the art of distillation was discovered, then was there brought, as it were from the bottomless pit, a pestilence which, in the language of a European writer, has been "more destructive than any plague that ever reigned in Christendom, more malignant than any other epidemic pestilence that ever desolated our suffering race, whether in the shape of the burning and contagious typhus, the loathsome and mortal small pox, the cholera of the east, or the yellow fever of the West—a disease far more loathsome, infectious, and destructive, than all of them put together, with all their dread array of suffering and death, united in one ghastly assemblage of horrific and appalling misery."

Curiosity has searched the annals of nations to learn the individual or people who first produced this terrible engine of evil. It is evident that the Greeks and Romans were entire strangers to the art. No allusion is made to it either in the works of Pliny, a Roman of great distinction in the first century, or of Galen, an eminent physician, who lived a century later. Among the Chinese there had long been a species of distillation, by which they were enabled to extract the essence or aroma of flowers; but it never seemed to be used for the purpose of preparing an intoxicating liquor.

The first European writer who mentions the use of ardent spirits was Arnoldus de Villa, a Spanish physician of the thirteenth century; but it is generally believed that its great discoverer was a Mahomedan alchemist of Arabia, who lived in the ninth century, and who was torturing nature in pursuit of an universal solvent by which man might convert all things into gold. The name of Alcohol was first applied to the fluid produced by the distilling process, by Raymond Lully, a disciple of Arnoldus, who believed it to be an emanation of the Divinity, which was at once to effect a physical renovation of the human race.

The new medicine, for such it was esteemed, and not an ordinary beverage, spread by his recommendation through the northern sections of Europe. It was first used for the purposes of common life by the labourers in the Hungarian mines, to preserve them from the cold and damps. Distillation was introduced into Ireland earlier than into England. In 1556, an act of Parliament was passed at Drogheda against it, the distilled liquor being described in the act, "as a drink nothing profitable to be daily drunk or used." In the reign of Henry II., it found its way into England, and from that period it was no longer considered merely as a medical agent, but went into general use as an article of diet; and such has been the passion for ardent spirit among the British population, that 40,000,000 gallons annually have been consumed, besides an immense amount of fermented drinks.

About 1587, the French began the distillation of brandy from wine. Over the North of Europe distilleries have frightfully multiplied. In Sweden alone, with three millions of people, 160,000 distilleries have been run; most of them, however, have been small, and more than 50,000 have been closed by the temperance reformation.

In America, the business of distillation commenced at Boston, about 1700, with some merchants trading at the West Indies, who, perceiving that the molasses at the sugar houses was thrown away, caused it to be purchased by their agents and sent to Boston, where it was entered free of duty, and speedily converted into New England rum. The business so increased that it was extended to the Dutch and Danish Colonies; and molasses was purchased in exchange for horses, mules, lumber, fish, etc. In 1715, the British islands complained of the cutting off their supplies, and the diminution of their trade. Fierce disputes followed, and in 1733 a duty of six-pence was laid on molasses imported into the colonies from any foreign port or place. But the New Englanders eluded it. A British fleet was sent to enforce it, and violent conflicts continued about the Molasses Act till the war of the Revolution.

The article thus manufactured was soon extensively used by the continental colonies, in carrying on the Indian trade and its fisheries. Anderson, in his "Origin of Commerce," remarks, "The consumption of rum in New England is so great, that an author on the subject asserts, that there have been 20,000 barrels of French molasses manufactured into rum, at Boston, in one year, so vast is the demand for that liquor." And Sir William Douglass, in a work printed at Boston, in 1775, says, "that spirit, (spiritus ardentus) not above a century ago, were used only as official cordials, but are now become an epidemical plague, being a pernicious ingredient in most of our beverages."

In 1794, distilleries, chiefly for grain, had become numerous in the States, especially in Pennsylvania, a rich grain-growing region. Congress laid a duty upon spirits distilled in the country; but in the four western counties of Pennsylvania the collection of the duty was violently resisted, in an open rebellion, which was only suppressed by the energy of Washington, and the appearance of an armed force.

In 1815, the number of distilleries had increased to 40,000; consuming in successive years more than 10,000,000 bushels of bread stuffs, and pouring over the land more than 30,000,000 gallons of ardent spirits distilled from grain, and more than 10,000,000 gallons distilled from molasses.

In 1832, Judge Cranch, of Washington city, computed the distilled spirit consumed in the United States, much of which, indeed, was imported, at 72,000,000 gallons, or six gallons to every man, woman, and child; costing the nation, in the purchase of the liquor, loss of the labour of drunkards, support of paupers, criminals, etc., 94,525,000 dollars annually, without taking into account loss from shipwrecks, fires caused by intemperance, costs of litigation, etc., etc.

With the mass of the population, distilleries were long considered a blessing to the country. They furnished, it was said, a ready market for the surplus grain of the country, and encouraged the growing; they gave a new value to the orchard, whose superabundant fruit could at once be converted into brandy; they brought ready employ to the carpenter, the cooper, the carrier; and furnished the nation with an excellent article, which it was importing from Holland and the West Indies at great cost. Pious men, deacons of churches, owned and laboured in them without any loss of character. Many a neighbourhood was filled with joy that an immense distillery was to be built, and a spring given to business which would bring riches to every family.

But when the community began to see men gathered in and about these establishments, not a little resembling the inmates of almshouses and hospitals; when they found drunkenness spreading in all the country round, and once thriving farmers, who could conveniently take for their wood and grain a barrel of whiskey, becoming idle, frequenters of taverns and dram shops, and with their sons, fast travelling the road to ruin; when they saw how from these great establishments went out over the country hogsheds of liquid fire, to afflict and curse every neighbourhood, fill up jails and poorhouses with wretched victims, and send 30,000 of their fellow-citizens falling year after year, to the drunkard's grave—they then saw their error. They then understood that, but, perhaps, for the mechanic arts, every distillery in the land was a curse, and that it was the duty of every philanthropist and Christian to unite in its condemnation. But how were they to be broken up? Distilleries were generally run by men of wealth and influence in the community. They were powerfully supported by public sentiment. Interest pleaded for their continuance. Sober argument was tried in vain. The distiller, rolling in wealth, was covered with a coat of mail, and laughed at the shaking of our spear.

There was one weapon yet to be tried. But who should draw it from the armory of truth? Who should wield it, and cause it to expose the horrid secrets of this work of death? Where should the stripping be found who, with his sling and stone, should slay this Goliath? GEORGE B. CHEEVER was at that time a young minister in Salem, Mass. He had commenced his ministry with an uncompromising spirit toward whatever hindered the spread of the gospel kingdom. He often passed those murky establishments where, day and night, Sabbath and week days those lurid fires were burning, and that horrid machinery was in motion. From four distilleries there, no less than six hundred thousand gallons of ardent spirits were annually poured forth; through whose instrumentality, it was believed, a thousand individuals were reduced to pauperism, and four hundred were sent to the drunkard's grave. Of three thousand persons admitted to the workhouse within a few minutes' walk of his study, two thousand and nine hundred were there, directly or indirectly, through intemperance. Over these evils, and an untold corruption of public sentiment, desecration of the Sabbath, and ruin of souls, connected with them, he could not sleep. And if he slept, he dreamed. He dreamed "a dream which was not all a dream:"—

"INQUIRE AT AMOS GILES'S DISTILLERY."

Upon its appearance in the Salem "Landmark," of February, 1835, the public excitement was tremendous. A spear had pierced and extinguished the eye of the horrid Cyclop.

"Clamorem immensum tollit, quo pontus et omnes
Intremere undæ penitusque exterrita tellus
Italæ, cunctisque inangit Ætæa caverna."*

Every distiller and importer, every vender and moderate drinker, almost the entire community, believing that what was legally right must yet be respected and honored, how horrid soever might be its moral results, cried against it as an outrage upon society. With one accord, they rushed to the halls of justice for protection. Among the four distilleries of the place, one was singled out as answering more directly to the description; and the proprietor himself a deacon of a Christian Church, and a man of unexceptionable character, feeling aggrieved and injured in his person and property, a prosecution was commenced by the Commonwealth, for a libel. Mr. Cheever pleaded not guilty to the charge, solely avowing that it was never written or intended as an attack upon any individual; the object of the piece was to portray, in as forcible a light as possible, through the medium of the fiction he had conceived, the real nature and consequences of the manufacture of ardent spirits. Such, however, was the state of the public mind, that he was condemned; and on making his defence, he submitted meekly to the sentence of the court. But the whole procedure gave wings to the production of his genius, and caused it to become one of the great instruments of opening the eyes of a suffering community to the true character of distillation.

The history of this transaction forms a part of the history of the temperance reformation. While it presents to posterity one of those signal incidents by which the mighty engine of drunkenness has been nearly overthrown, it reflects nothing upon those who then felt themselves injured, both in their good name and worldly prosperity. The

* "he roared aloud; the dreadful cry
Shakes earth, and air, and seas; the billows fly
Before the bellowing noise, to distant Italy;
The neighbouring Ætæa trembling all around,
The winding caverns echo to the sound;
His brother Cyclops hear the yelling roar,
And rushing down the mountains, crowd the shore."

darkness that overshadowed them and the community in which they dwelt, is the apology for their faults. Haply it may be, that they are now foremost in the condemnation of the business whose character was exposed. Tempora mutantur. The old distillery has since been abandoned, and the building, now converted to useful purposes, was recently the scene of a joyful temperance tea-party.

But other distilleries are still in operation. In the census of 1849, there were returned 10,395, distilling in a single year 41,402,627 gallons, with a reasonable certainty that, for every 1,200 gallons distilled and sold, one human being is destroyed. And now, without the most strenuous efforts by the friends of temperance, giving broadcast through the community whatever exhibits the true character of this business, they will continue to pour over this land, and over heathen lands, what Robert Hall justly termed a flood of "liquid fire and distilled damnation."

Frequent inquiries, after a lapse of nine years, for a true history of the production, with the grounds of prosecution, have led to this publication. In his defence, Mr. Cheever showed that, while it was no part of his object to defame, vilify, or injure the character of any particular distiller whatever, or to bring indignation or disgrace upon any one's family connections, he had a right, and it was his duty, to show, in the most forcible manner in his power, the horrid business of distillation. It is a production demanding the attention of every philanthropist and statesman. The whole is an IMAGINATION, a REALITY, a DREAM, which should never die. It is a story which should be familiar to every child, in all coming generations; for while there is a distillery on earth, there will be drunkenness, lamentation and woe.

THE DREAM.

"INQUIRE AT AMOS GILES' DISTILLERY."

Some time ago the writer's notice was arrested by an advertisement in one of the newspapers, which closed with words similar to the following: "Inquire at Amos Giles' Distillery." The reader may suppose, if he choose, that the following story was a dream, suggested by that phrase.

Deacon Giles was a man who loved money, and was never troubled with tenderness of conscience. His father and his grandfather before him had been distillers, and the same occupation had come to him as an heir-loom in the family. The still-house was black with age, as well as with the smoke of furnaces that never went out, and the furnes of tortured ingredients, ceaselessly converted into alcohol. It looked like one of Vulcan's Stithies, translated from the infernal regions into this world. Its stench filled the atmosphere, and it seemed as if drops of poisonous alcoholic perspiration might be made to ooze out from any one of its timbers or clapboards on a slight pressure. Its owner was a treasurer to a Bible Society; and he had a little counting room in one corner of the distillery where he sold Bibles.

He that is greedy of gain troubleth his own house. Any one of those Bibles would have told him this; but he chose to learn it from experience. It was said that the Worm of the Still lay coiled in the bosom of his own family, and certain it is that one of his members had drowned himself in the vat of hot liquor, in the bottom of which a skeleton was sometimes after found, with heavy weights tied to the rattle bones. Moreover, Deacon Giles' temper was none of the sweetest, naturally, and the liquor he drank, and the fires and spirituous fumes among which he lived, did nothing to soften it. If his workmen sometimes fell into his vats, he himself oftener fell out with his workmen. This was not to be wondered at, considering the nature of their wages which, according to no infrequent stipulation, would be as much raw rum as they could drink.

Deacon Giles worked on the Sabbath. He would neither suffer the fires of the distillery to go out, nor to burn while he was idle; so he kept as busy as they. One Saturday afternoon his workmen had quarrelled, and all went off in anger. He was in much perplexity for want of hands to do the work of the devil on the Lord's day. In the dusk of the evening a gang of singular looking fellows entered the door of the distillery. Their dress was wild and uncouth, their eyes glared, and their language had a tone that was awful. They offered to work for the Deacon; and he, on his part, was overjoyed, for he thought within himself that, as they had probably been turned out of employment elsewhere, he could engage them on his own terms.

He made them his accustomed offer; as much rum every day, when work was done, as they could drink; but they would not take it. Some of them broke out and told him that they had enough of hot things where they came from, without drinking damnation in the distillery. And when they said that, it seemed to the Deacon as if their breath burned blue; but he was not certain, and could not tell what to make of it. Then he offered them a pittance of money; but they set up such a laugh that he thought the roof of the building would fall in. They demanded a sum which the Deacon said he could not give, and would not to the best set of workmen that ever lived, much less to such piratical looking scapajaws as they. Finally, he said, he would give half what they asked, if they would take two-thirds of that in Bibles. When he mentioned the word Bibles, they all looked towards the door, and made a step backwards, and the Deacon thought they trembled; but whether it was with anger or delirious tremors, or something else, he could not tell. However, they winked, and made signs to each other, and then one of them, who seemed to be the head man, agreed with the Deacon, that if he would let them work by night instead of day, they would stay with him awhile, and work on his own terms. To this he agreed, and they immediately went to work.

The Deacon had a fresh cargo of molasses to be worked up, and a great many hogsheads then in from his country customers, to be filled with liquor. When he went home, he locked up the doors, leaving the distillery to his new workmen. As soon as he was gone, you would have thought that one of the chambers of hell had been transported to earth with all its inmates. The distillery glowed with fires that burned hotter than ever before; and the figures of the demons passing to and fro, and leaping and yelling in the midst of their work, made it look like the entrance to the bottomless pit.

Some of them set astride the rafters, over the heads of the others, and amused themselves with blowing flames out of their mouths. The work of distilling seemed play to them, and they carried it on with supernatural rapidity. It was hot enough to have boiled the molasses in any part of the distillery; but they did not seem to mind it at all. Some lifted the hogsheads as easily as you would raise a teacup, and turned their contents into the proper receptacles; some scummed the boiling liquids; some, with huge ladles, dipped the smoking fluid from the different vats, and raising it high in the air, seemed to take great delight in watching the fiery stream, as they spouted it back again; some drafted the distilled liquor into empty casks and hogsheads; some stirred up the fires; all were boisterous and horribly profane, and seemed to engage in their work with such familiar and malignant satisfaction, that I concluded the business of distilling was as natural as hell, and must have originated there.

I gathered from their talk that they were going to play a trick upon the Deacon, that should cure him of offering rum and Bibles to his workmen; and I soon found out from their conversation and movements, what it was. They were going to write certain inscriptions on all his rum casks, that should remain invisible until they were sold by the Deacon, but should flame out in characters of fire as soon as they were broached by his retailers, or exposed for the use of the drunkards.

When they had filled a few casks with liquor, one of them took a great coal of fire, and having quenched it in a mixture of rum and molasses, proceeded to write, apparently by way of experiment, upon the heads of the different vessels. Just as it was dawn, they left off work, and all vanished together.

In the morning the Deacon was puzzled to know how the workmen got out of the distillery, which he found fast locked as he had left it. He was still more amazed to find that they had done more work in one night, than could have been accomplished, in the ordinary way in three weeks. He pondered the thing not a little, and almost concluded that it was the work of supernatural agents. At any rate, they had done so much that he thought he could afford to attend meeting that day, as it was the Sabbath. Accordingly he went to church, and heard his minister say that God could pardon sin without an atonement, that the words hell and devils were mere figures of speech, and that all men would certainly be saved. He was much pleased, and inwardly resolved he would send his minister a half cask of wine; and as it happened to be communion Sabbath, he attended meeting all day.

In the evening the men came again, and again the Deacon locked them in to themselves, and they went to work. They finished all his molasses, and filled all his rum barrels, and kegs, and hogsheads, with liquor, and marked them all as on the preceding night, with invisible inscriptions. Most of the titles ran thus:

"CONSUMPTION SOLD DEAR. Inquire at Deacon Giles' Distillery."

"CONVULSIONS AND EPILEPSIES. Inquire at Amos Giles' Distillery."

"INSANITY AND MURDER. Inquire at Deacon Giles' Distillery."

"DROPSY AND RHEUMATISM." "PETRID FEVER, AND CHOLERA IN THE COLLAPSE. Inquire at Amos Giles' Distillery."

"DELIRIUM TREMENS. Inquire at Deacon Giles' Distillery."

Many of the casks had on them inscriptions like the following:

"DISTILLED DEATH AND LIQUID DAMNATION." "The Elixir of Hell for the bodies of those whose souls are coming there."

Some of the demons had even taken sentences from the Scriptures, and marked the hogsheads thus:

"WHO HATH WO? Inquire at Deacon Giles' Distillery."

"WHO HATH REDNESS OF EYES? Inquire at Deacon Giles' Distillery."

Others had written sentences like the following:

"A POTION FROM THE LAKE OF FIRE AND BRIMSTONE. Inquire at Deacon Giles' Distillery."

All these inscriptions burned, when visible, a "still and awful red." One of the most terrible in its appearance was as follows:

"WEeping AND WAILING AND GRASHING OF TEETH. Inquire at Deacon Giles' Distillery."

In the morning the workmen vanished as before, just as it was dawn; but in the dusk of the evening they came again, and told the Deacon it was against their principles to take any wages for work done between Saturday night and Monday morning, and as they could not stay with him any longer, he was welcome to what they had done. The Deacon was very urgent to have them remain, and offered to hire them for the season at any wages, but they would not. So he thanked them and they went away, and he saw them no more.

In the course of the week most of the casks were sent into the country, and duly hoisted on their stumps, in conspicuous situations in the taverns, and groceries, and rum-shops. But no sooner had the first glass been drawn, from any of them, than the invisible inscriptions flamed out on the cask-head to every beholder. "CONSUMPTION SOLD HERE." "DELIRIUM TREMENS, DAMNATION AND HELL FIRE." The drunkards were terrified from the dram-shops; the bar-rooms were emptied of their customers; but in their place a gaping crowd filled every store that possessed a cask of the Deacon's devil-distilled liquor, to wonder and be affrighted at the spectacle. For no art could efface the inscriptions. And even when the liquor was drawn into new casks, the same deadly letters broke out in blue and red flame all over the surface.

The rum-sellers, and grocers and tavern-keepers were full of fury. They loaded their teams with the accursed liquor, and drove it back to the distillery. All around and before the door of the Deacon's establishment the returned casks were piled one upon another, and it seemed as if the inscriptions burned brighter than ever. Consumption, Damnation, Death and Hell, mingled together in frightful confusion; and in equal prominence, in every case, flamed out the direction, "INQUIRE AT DEACON GILES' DISTILLERY." One would have thought that the bare sight would have been enough to terrify every drunkard from his cups, and every trader from the dreadful traffic in ardent spirits. Indeed, it had some effect for a time, but it was not lasting, and the demons knew it would not be, when they played the trick; for they knew the Deacon would continue to make rum, and that so long as he continued to make it, there would be people to buy and drink it. And so it proved.

The Deacon had to turn a vast quantity of liquor into the streets, and burn up the hogsheads; and his distillery has smelled of brimstone ever since; but he would not give up the trade. He carries it on still, and every time I see his advertisement, "Inquire at Deacon Giles' Distillery," I think I see **** and ***** and he the proprietor.

From the Emancipator.

DEATH OF DANIEL O'CONNELL.

The last steamer brings us the tidings of the death of Daniel O'Connell, at Genoa, Italy, on the 15th of May. Though this event was not anticipated, the demise of no man has produced a more profound and general sensation in Europe, since the decease of Napoleon. Mr. O'Connell was one of the most remarkable persons that has figured in European politics during this century, and for the last twenty years no man has exerted a more powerful influence upon British affairs, while his sway over his own immediate countrymen since he entered upon public life has probably never been equalled. His character, like that of all men who leave a deep impress on their age, is variously and differently estimated by those who, on the one hand, have received his powerful support and warm sympathy, or, on the other, have encountered his vigorous opposition and fierce reprobation. But all classes of friends and foes unite in the sentiment, that a most extraordinary man has ceased to influence human affairs. We shall not attempt to give a sketch of his life and character—for this would fill a volume—but shall glance at a few of the prominent events which have marked his career.

Mr. O'Connell was born in the county of Kerry, Ireland, on the 6th of August, 1775. Consequently he was in his 72d year when he died. His family was respectable, but neither very wealthy or powerful. He received a complete literary education in Ireland and in France, and while a boy at the school of St. Omer's, his preceptor, writing to his uncle, said: "With respect to Daniel, I have but one sentence to write about him, and that is, that I never was so much mistaken in my life as I shall be, unless he is destined to make a remarkable figure in society."

He was first intended for the priesthood; but early relinquishing the thoughts of so peaceful a profession, he studied for the bar, chiefly in London, and was admitted a barrister at Dublin, in May 1798. Though of a joyous, self-indulgent temperament, and always entering with full glee into all innocent sports and pastimes, yet he was a close student, and spared no pains to qualify himself for his arduous profession, so that when he entered upon his duties, he was prepared to grapple with the first minds which then adorned the Irish Courts. While a London student, he attended the trial of Hardy, who was prosecuted for High Treason for belonging to a society for Constitutional Reform, and his prejudices were at first strongly enlisted against the prisoner, and in favor of what was denominated "law and social order." But, during the progress of the trial (which lasted two or three weeks,) his generous mind revolted at this governmental persecution, and he was confirmed in his natural detestation of tyranny, and his desire to resist and overthrow it. The impulse thus received never ceased to influence him till the end of his long career.

Mr. O'Connell immediately entered into a large circle of professional business in Dublin. His first political effort was a speech against the then prominent national topic of a legislative Union between Great Britain and Ireland; and it is said not to have been surpassed in brilliancy and power by his speeches in the same cause, made in his maturer years.—It soon became evident that he was not to spend his whole life and energies in the monotonous perils of the Courts, looking after the interests of John Doe and Richard Roe, but he was to mingle with the more sober duties of the lawyer, the exciting and less profitable toils of the political agitator. The year which closed the last and opened the present century, was a marked epoch in the history of Ireland. Exciting discussion to vindicate Irish rights, and a bloody revolution to redress Irish wrongs, were the pastime of that oppressed and turbulent people. While young O'Connell participated largely in the civil strife, he repudiated the sanguinary conflict.

It was in 1804 that he commenced his efforts for Catholic Emancipation; a cause which ever had his powerful advocacy till, in 1828, his exertions were crowned with success by the passage of an Act of Parliament which placed the Roman Catholics, in regard to political and social rights, in the same position with the other dissenting bodies of religionists. And, indeed, it is very much to the great exertions of Mr. O'Connell during these twenty-four years, that the dissenters of all denominations in Great Britain are indebted for the political and religious rights they now enjoy. He always regarded this as the great achievement of his life; and it was this which secured him the enviable title of "THE LIBERATOR." His labors, during these years of doubtful struggles for the establishment of a great principle of civil and religious liberty, almost surpass belief; and they endeared him to large masses of Christian men, who differed widely, very widely, from him in religious opinion. It was this which gave him so strong a hold, Catholic though he was, upon the Baptists, Independents, and Quakers of Great Britain—men who repudiated his religious faith, but cherished the principles of toleration for which he contended.

During this controversy, of the bitterness of which Americans cannot conceive, Mr. O'Connell for once departed from the line of a pacific opposition. The Dublin Municipal Corporation was a High Church and Tory Municipality of the most bigotted and vindictive class. Its members were ever the objects of Mr. O'Connell's attacks. At last a number of them agreed to challenge him successively in duels till they had killed him. This was in 1815. A Mr. D'Esterre was the man designated to call him to the field. They met near Dublin. At the first fire Mr. O'Connell shot his antagonist dead. This broke up the sanguinary league; and the awful event left an abhorrence of blood on the sensitive mind of Mr. O'Connell, which ever after made him a man of peace, and caused him to inscribe on his Repeal banner, the memorable sentiment, "No political change is worth the shedding of human blood!" Never shall we forget the expression which glowed from the countenance of the great orator when, in Exeter Hall, in 1840, he alluded in terms of deep contrition, to "his first and last duel."

The passage of the Catholic Emancipation bill in 1828—which was accomplished by the repeal of "the test act," thus emancipating all the dissenters—opened the way for Mr. O'Connell to enter Parliament. Up to this time, his practice at the bar was probably equal to that of any other barrister in Dublin. Now, a field was open before him. And, with intrepid step, and firm heart did he enter upon its labors. Always on the side of freedom, while out of office, he did not desert his principles when he reached a place where he could best advance them. Giving his powerful aid to the passage of the Reform Bill, and thus extending the right of suffrage to the laboring classes of the kingdom, and equalizing parliamentary representation, he became identified in interest as he was in feeling with the Liberal party in politics known by the name of "Whigs." Gratian once said of Flood, "An oak of the forest is too old and too great to be transplanted at fifty." But, though O'Connell was forty-four when he entered the Commons, his parliamentary career, extending through nearly twenty years, was of the most sturdy and luxuriant growth. His speeches on the Reform Bill took rank with those of the most able and brilliant displays which that great controversy called forth. Though he watched with so vigilant and exclusive an eye the interests of his native country as to be styled "the member for all Ireland," yet he took part in all the chief questions which agitated the House; and at the earliest moment, and with his characteristic energy, threw his whole soul into the cause of Negro Emancipation, battling side by side, in Parliament and out of Parliament, with Clarkson, Buxton, Brougham, Sturge, Lushington and their compeers, till the West India slave became a British Freeman. His numerous speeches on that subject, official and popular, are among the most noble specimens of eloquence on record. No less true to principle than effective in argument, he at once embraced the doctrine of immediate and unconditional Emancipation, and was among the few members of the parliament who, in 1834, voted against the delusive scheme of Apprenticeship; having the firmness on that occasion to differ with the overwhelming mass of his Anti-Slavery colleagues. And it was in no small degree owing to his efforts that that ill contrived scheme was, in 1838, abolished, and the slave restored to his full rights as a man. Mr. O'Connell was an active member of "the World's Convention," in 1840, and addressed that body on several occasions with his accustomed power.

His speech at the closing meeting in Exeter Hall, before 6000 persons, when he replied to the scurrilous attack then recently made upon him by Mr. Stevenson, our Minister at St. James, was the most graceful but merciless exhortation we ever saw inflicted on a human being. To the day of his death Mr. O'Connell remained true to his Anti-Slavery faith, mingling with his speeches and writings on Irish Repeal, severe condemnation of slaveholders, and glowing sympathy with the friends of abolition throughout the world. Especially was he the champion of the Anti-Slavery party in this country, and his reply to a Repeal Association in Cincinnati, which had taken exception to his abolition sentiments, will be remembered as a production remarkable for its literary ability and high moral tone.

But, we have space only to allude to the events which marked the closing years of his life. From 1835, to within a year of his death, his chief efforts out of Parliament were devoted to procuring the repeal of the act, passed we think in 1800, abolishing the Irish Parliament, and establishing a legislative Union between Great Britain and Ireland—generally known as the Repeal Cause. The means he employed to secure this end were the same by which he effected Catholic Emancipation—POPULAR AGITATION. The excitement, which was fanned for three or four years by the conciliatory course of the Melbourne Ministry towards Ireland, broke out with increased intensity on the accession of Sir Robert Peel to power, in 1841-2. In the latter year, "repeal" was demanded by every parish from the Giant's Causeway to Cape Clear. In 1843 came the "Monster Meetings," when the assembled populace which swayed to and fro under the inspiring eloquence of "the Liberator," was counted by acres. The government was alarmed—O'Connell and five others were indicted for a conspiracy to change the laws of the Kingdom by illegal measures—the trial commenced in January, 1844, continuing twenty-five days—most of the defendants were convicted—O'Connell was sentenced to pay a fine of £2000, and he imprisoned one year—he appealed to the House of Lords—in the mean time he was sent to the Richmond Penitentiary—the House of Lords reversed the judgment—and O'Connell, after spending three months in prison, was released, and, surrounded by uncounted thousands of his countrymen, marched in triumphal procession to Dublin.

Clouds now hovered over his hitherto brilliant career. Having, by the pacific tenor of his repeal agitations, thwarted the government, and by his magic influence prevented any overt act of violence by those vast assemblies of his turbulent and wayward countrymen (one of the marked phenomena of the age,) the more violent of the sub-leaders grew bold, were impatient of delay, began to assume a fierce tone, and demanded that the pacific pledges of O'Connell should be repudiated by the National Repeal Association. Then arose the party of "Young Ireland"—then came division, bickering, strife,—one party clinging to, the other frowning upon the man who carried them safely through the imminent crisis of governmental proscription and prosecution. The alienation of large numbers of his friends overtaking him when his bodily powers were impaired by years of exhausting toil, broke the spirit of the old man, undermined his bodily constitution, and compelled him early in the past spring to repair to the Continent to resuscitate his wasted health. But, he left the field of exertion too late.

His energies rapidly waned—death overtook him while on his weary pilgrimage—his eye saw the sun for the last time in a foreign sky, and he sleeps his last sleep far from the land which gave him birth, and from that ocean by whose side his cradle was rocked. But, the remembrance of him will long linger in every country where humanity has a dwelling place. Preeminently was his reputation world-wide; for he plead for the victims of the hellish traffic on the dark shores of Africa; for the swarthy serfs of British cupidity on the banks of the Ganges; for the persecuted Jew of ancient Damascus; for the stricken slaves in the distant States of America; while to the starving millions of his own countrymen, his soothing tones were words of consolation and hope.

Mr. O'Connell had a massive physical frame, capable of enduring great toil, and he was one of the most industrious men that ever lived. His manners were frank and kindly, and he possessed social qualities of the most genial character, and was singularly affectionate as a husband and a father. He early reached the first rank in his profession, and modern times has not produced a more bold and successful political agitator. As a popular orator before mixed assemblies we have never heard his equal. Every cord of the human bosom lay open to his touch, and he played with its passions and emotions with a master's skill. His recital of facts charmed one like a romance—his imagination bore the hearer to a peerless height on its giddy wing—his logic was rapid and vigorous—his wit keen and electric—his humor broad and infectious, enabling him to give his anecdotes with extraordinary effect—his sarcasm and invective terrible, splitting his antagonist and then roasting him alive before a consuming fire—his denunciations merciless—his appeals, uttered in a musical voice and with the richest brogue of his native land, were tender and subduing. These qualities, sustained by a mind of uncommon natural strength, which had been trained and polished by a complete education, and matured and stored with a knowledge of men and things varied and ample, and all embodied in a commanding figure, and set off by a gesticulation at once graceful and forcible, might fully justify the assertion of John Randolph, of Roanoke, that he was the first popular orator in Europe.

Like other rare men, who have figured in turbulent times, Mr. O'Connell had faults, great, glaring faults. He was narrow and bigoted in religion—loved his native island too exclusively—was too willing to gain his ends by trick and artifice—and like other political leaders was too lavish in promising to do what he must have known he could never perform. We think him not entitled to be called either a good statesman or a bad statesman. He was no statesman at all; but simply a political agitator, generally advocating the right side, and indebted for his success in a considerable degree to the rottenness of the institutions which he assailed. Of a hasty, violent temper, his denunciations of bad principles and measures, too often degenerated into mere personal abuse of their propagators and supporters. But, all right minded and liberal-hearted men will ascribe these defects in part to the times in which he lived, while to a large extent they will be attributed to a generous nature impatient of unreasonable abuse and opposition. Impartial history will record, that his fury was usually poured out on the heads of meanness, fraud, corruption, injustice and oppression; that he was the friend, the champion, the brother of outraged man, irrespective of clime, color, creed or condition; and wherever humanity writhed under the heel of tyranny, there were found the fiery heart and trumpet voice of DANIEL O'CONNELL, sympathising with the victim and rebuking the tyrant.

From the British Friend.

FREDERICK DOUGLASS.

The Letter from which the following are extracts, was received from Frederick Douglass on the 15th ult., and they will, it is believed, be perused with interest by his numerous and attached friends in this country.

Lynn, Mass., 20th April.

